This is our interpretation of our participation in the 1981 Reactivation Plan. We know that it has been criticized by the reactionaries; these are precisely the aspects that do not suit the bourgeoisie. We realize that everything which is important to the progress of our revolution, to the people and to the consolidation of the process hurts the interests of the reactionaries.

We also realize that the political training of our comrades is important. We shall also promote sports among the members of the Sandinist Youth organization.

[Question] In order to gain a better understanding of JS-19's problems, could you explain to us the social origins of the youth organization's members?

[Answer] The vast majority of our mass organization consists of student comrades; in other words, they come from the middle class. But they are completely identified with the principles of our revolution, that is, with the interests of the workers and peasants.

We believe that the future direction of our youth will have to be aimed at the interests of the Nicaraguan proletariat.

[Question] I was referring to the fact that, although it is true that a high percentage of JS members consists of students, many of them are working in one way or another to support their family households. In this respect, could one tacitly say that there is an unproductive middle class student sector and a youth sector which is producing?

[Answer] That is exactly what we are aiming at by carrying out the work-study activity.

In other words, the student must understand that his training has to be linked with his education in work. By working, the student will understand the great necessity for being a worker and a creator of the revolution, in his training.

It must be understood that our members are also workers for the revolution and for our people.

[Question] Does the Sandinist Youth organization have any program for incorporating the working youth or peasant youth into its membership?

[Answer] This is understood to be voluntary. We do not require anyone to go to work, but our comrades engage in work out of their own conviction, and because they understand the enormous needs of our people.

[Question] Another task of the youth organization will be to join the student militias. How will that be done?

[Answer] This is another voluntary activity. We do not want to interfere with the studies of those who are going to graduate, because we realize that this is another one of the essential tasks for the very defense and consolidation of the revolution.

[Question] It is important to explain how the student organization will be set up. In the past, there was AES [Sandinist Students Association] and MES [Sandinist Students Movement]. Will the students' organization have a special name now?

[Answer] At the present time, the Sandinist Youth organization will take charge of the students' tasks and demands. We believe that conditions must be created, because it is impossible to create the students' organization by decree.

[Question] Finally, Comrade Herrera, in what other way is it intended to associate the youth with tasks in 1981? I am referring to whether there will be a more detailed study of the problems involved in reactivation.

[Answer] Not only that, the student must not only be familiar with the problems of the plan, but also know how to put it into practice; and he must essentially back that plan. There is a group of more specific tasks related to the nation's reactivation plans, which we shall announce later.

EXTENSIVE CROP DAMAGE FROM HEAVY RAINS NOTED

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 21 Oct 80 p 5

[Text] The damage caused by the recent rainfall to the coffee plantations of the People's Property Area (APP), run by the Nicaraguan Institute for Agrarian Reform [INRA], in Nueva Segovia, amounts to 433,000 cordobas.

This information was supplied to BARRICADA by Comrade Luis Moreno, head of INRA's coffee sector for the Nueva Segovia region.

According to the reports that have been provided, in Jalapa the heavy showers caused the water to destroy the cultivation of moist coffee in the No 2 Complex of the El Escambray State Production Unit. Further damage was done to two blocks of coffee plantations. The losses in this UPE [State Production Unit] amount to over 142,000 cordobas.

In the San Antonio UPE of the same complex, the water overflowing from the rivers flooded four blocks of harvest coffee valued at 84,000 cordobas.

In Santa Elena and La Calandria, an assessment made by the INRA regional entity disclosed losses amounting to 121,500 cordobas.

The rainfall damaged six blocks of developing coffee in Santa Elena valued at 90,000 cordobas, as well as a block and a half of coffee in La Calandria, at a cost of 31,500 cordobas.

In Gualacatum, the losses totaled 22,500 cordobas.

In the Dipilto sector of the No 1 State Complex of the La Unidad UPE, the flooding of the Dipilto River and the landslides from nearby hills completely destroyed three blocks of harvest coffee valued at 63,000 cordoboas.

Damage in Madriz

In the Madriz zone of the People's Property Area, damage occurred to 21 blocks of corn in the San Luis complex. The losses were initially estimated at 1,680 quintales of grain. The same number of blocks in the same complex were damaged by the rainfall, involving 24 blocks of beans, seven blocks in the San Jose complex and 18 in the Misawalto complex.

The garden produce was also damaged by the rain: two beds of 30 tomato plants, and another two of cabbage for transplanting were destroyed by the water.

Damage was reported on two blocks of soybeans, and the same number of blocks of sesame seed.

In Jinotega

In the department of Jinotega, 12,000 coffee seedbeds were lost in the No 3 Complex, and 7,000 in the No 4 Complex.

In the No 12 Complex of that same department, out of 120 blocks prepared for planting beans, only 20 could be planted.

In Esteli

In Esteli, out of a total of 73 blocks which had been prepared for planting late beans, only 30 percent were planted.

ASSOCIATION OF JOURNALISTS CREATED

Lima EL COMERCIO in Spanish 2 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] When he signed the law, Belaunde renewed the most absolute freedom of the press.

The Peruvian Journalists Association was officially created yesterday when President Fernando Belaunde Terry signed the law that had been unanimously passed by Congress.

The ceremony took place in the Golden Room of the national capitol in the presence of the presidents of the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies, Oscar Trelles and Francisco Belaunde Terry respectively, the ministers of state, members of Congress and hundreds of journalists.

Freedom of the Press

In a short speech which was broadcast to the nation by the National Radio Network, the chief of state renewed the most absolute freedom of the press after recalling that this principle was full attained during his first administration.

"Naturally, in entering our second administration we will not alter a policy which we now ratify and promise the people of Peru."

Amidst the applause of those present, Belaunde Terry recalled that a few years ago he had indulged in technical journalism, "more as a fan than a professional."

The period to which the president referred was up until 1963 when he was elected president for the first time, when he headed the monthly review, EL ARQUITECTO PERUANO.

Association

In conformity with Law 23221 which has created it, the Journalists Association is an autonomous organization representing the newspaper profession throughout the entire country without prejudice to the other journalist trade or labor union organizations.

The law notes that association is an indispensable requisite for the exercise of the newspaper profession, although this law does not limit the provision in Paragraph 4, Article 2 of the Constitution; and it requires the presentation of a professional degree for membership in the association, although it makes an exception so that those who prove that they practice journalism on a permanent and/or stable basis will also have the right to join the association.

Among the funds the association will have, the law specifies 1 percent of the value of the ads published by the mass communications media.

Ceremony

Minister of Labor in Charge of Education Alfonso Grados and the head of the SINADI [National Information System], Miguel Alva Orlandini, participated in the ceremony of the signing of the law.

Belaunde Terry signed the document at 1208 hours amidst the applause of hundreds of journalists. Shortly before that, some of them, members of the National Association, shouted: "Association, union," which moved the official speaker to request that respect for the premises be maintained.

When it was over, the chief of state received an enthusiastic ovation, then left for his residence.

BILL TO RESTORE NEWSPAPERS' OWNERSHIP PASSED BY CONGRESS

[Text] Released proceedings go to Senate.

Last night, by a majority vote, the Chamber of Deputies passed a replacement bill drafted by the Constitutional Committee which repeals DL 20681 of 27 July 1974, which covered the seizure of national dailies from their rightful owners in order to turn them over to nonexistent public sectors.

The bill in question received the backing of 85 representatives of the government-supporting AP [Popular Action]-PPC [Popular Christian Party] bloc and 45 no votes from the Aprista Parliamentary Bloc and the Marxist left. There was a standing vote during a session that ended in an agitated manner.

The majority also approved release of the minutes of the proceedings on the replacement bill, drafted by the Constitutional and Rules Committee, chaired by Roberto Ramirez del Villar (PPC), so that they might reach the chamber's colegislative body as soon as possible in order for the latter to deliberate on the bill.

The approved document also grants the chief executive the authority to legislate for a term of 120 effective days, "as of [the day] the present law goes into effect," on the repeal of other laws and provisions relating to the dispossession of dailies as well as of those that regulate radio and television activities.

The bill, which consists of six articles, provides that "the power thus conferred includes restitution to their owners of their shares and of the tangible and intangible assets of those newspaper companies, printing houses and distribution agencies that have been dispossessed, including the assets of third parties."

Article 3 adds that "those shares representing the capital stock of radiobroadcasting and television companies affected by dispossession proceedings will in the same way be restored to their owners."

Relevant Measures

The bill also emphasizes that the chief executive will dictate any measures that may be relevant in resolving legal, economic, financial, tax, administrative and labor problems created as a result of the above-mentioned proceedings.

By virtue of the delegation of legislative powers, the chief executive will negotiate the terms of restitution with each newspaper company, printing house or distribution agency as well as restitution of the stock of these companies and those of radio and television companies affected by dispossession to their owners.

Agitated Session

After six sessions of debate on the bill, since discussion on it began last 23 September, the lower house was worn out. Thirty-one deputies from all political factions participated in the debate.

However, the session ended in an agitated manner and the replacement bill had to be voted on in the midst of angry demands from leftist bloc congressmen and the galleries. A motion requesting that debate on the matter be considered "exhausted" had been passed before that.

At the same time, Manuel Dammert Ego Aguirre (UNIR [expansion unknown]) angrily demanded the floor, a request which was denied him by the Board of Directors. This measure was also applied to Javier Valle Riestra (PAP [Aprista Party of Peru]), who had requested the floor to explain some things to PPC Deputy Roberto Ramirez del Villar.

ITALIAN TERRORIST PRESENCE IN COUNTRY DENIED

Caracas EL UNIVERSAL in Spanish 8 Oct 80 Sec 1 p 12

[Text] The minister of interior, Dr Enrique Aristiquieta Gramcko, has stated that Italian terrorist Marco Donat Cattin is not in Venezuela.

When he was consulted on the accusation made in the Italian periodical PANORAMA to the effect that the Venezuelan police are protecting an Italian terrorist tied to the Christian Democratic Party, he stated the following:

"The terrorist has no ties with the Christian Democratic Party. He is the son of a Christian Democrat, but he is a man tied to a far left group. Therefore, he has no connection with the Christian Democratic Party."

"He is described as being of the far right.

"At any rate, he has no connection with the Christian Democratic Party," the minister repeated. "And INTERPOL has released an opinion different from that periodical. It seems to me that INTERPOL deserves more credence than that periodical. Besides, the Venezuelan police have no information that this gentleman is in Venezuela."

In speaking as an attorney, Dr Aristiguieta Gramcko asserted that the negative fact cannot be proved. "I cannot prove that this gentlemen is in Venezuela. Whoever says that he is in this country has to prove it. I can guarantee that he has not come to Venezuela."

The minister was also asked concerning the latest comments by the newspaper GRANMA, official organ of the Communist Party of Cuba, to the effect that the Venezuelan Government will be responsible for acts that may occur as a result of the acquittal of the persons involved as presumed perpetrators of the attack on the Cuban aircraft in which 73 persons died.

"It demonstrates the real content of a totalitarian regime. In the understanding that GRANMA is the official spokesman of the Cuban Government, it offers to take justice in its own hands, with no formula of trial. Therefore, that reflects clearly what a totalitarian regime is and it makes us Venezuelans feel happy that we also are clearly aware of the advantages that a democratic regime is supposed to have."

The minister added that the Venezuelan State guarantees the tranquility of the country's citizens.

In addition, Dr Aristiquieta Gramcko said, in answer to a question on recent attacks in Caracas, that "those acts occur very rarely now in the metropolitan area."

He pointed out that police operations that have made a maximum reduction in that kind of event have been carried out in other cities in the country.

"When we came into office, those acts were at a really scandalous and disturbing level. Fortunately, we have succeeded in reducing them."

BREAK IN RELATIONS WITH CUBA URGED

Caracas EL UNIVERSAL in Spanish 9 Oct 80 Sec 1 p 4

[Article by Hermogenes Lopez: "Venezuela and Fidel Castro"]

[Text] It is incredible that a free country with a great tradition like Venezuela is tolerating all kinds of acts of aggression from the arbitrary Cuban leader that reveal him as a lawless man who respects no one.

I am acquainted with the integrity of the president and commander in chief of the Armed Forces, Dr Luis Herrera Campins, and also of the attorney general and of the country's military officers, because I have been a long-time member of the Senate Defense Committee of which I am the counselor. We are sure that if a national military court found clear grounds for acquitting the persons involved in the explosion of a Cuban aircraft and for setting them free, they must have their just, legal reasons.

This country is also being threatened to be governed by a socialist party, if COPEI [Social Christian Party] and Democratic Action continue with their quarrels and do not set themselves to working together for Venezuela. There are persons on the far left who say that Castro-communism is right in this matter.

We believe that Venezuela should have broken relations with Castro long ago, although we feel very sorry for the honorable, merry peopole of Cuba who have always merited all our consideration and esteem, but who, unfortunately, are subjugated at present by an iron dictatorship like all the communist people in the world.

The COPEI government, Democratic Action and all the people should become alert and do everything possible so that the republic may continue on its course of progress in freedom and so that progressive workingmen will not be obstructed in carrying out their activities, which are, undoubtedly, the ones that can produce the consumer goods so needed by the people to stop the large-scale importation that has been ruining Venezuela for some time now.

We have never been pessimists. I believe and firmly hope that as soon as we forget political maneuvering and devote ourselves more to the creative work of well-being and progress for everyone, we shall be a happier people, far from rightist or leftist dictatorships.

P.S. We do not agree with what happened in the house of Dr Luis Teofilo Nunez Arismendi. The PTJ [Judicial Technical Police] should act more firmly, but not in this kind of case.

ESTEBAN REY CRITICIZES HERRERA'S MANAGEMENT EFFORTS

Caracas EL UNIVERSAL in Spanish 27 Sep 80 Sec 1 p 12

[Commentary by Luis Esteban Rey]

[Text] Observations on the Preacher

In the speech delivered by President Herrera in the ceremony opening the Catacumbo cement plant -- started during the previous administration with loan contributions by the state -- in Villa del Rosario, Zulia, he alluded to commentaries that this commentator made in the newspapers EL UNIVERSAL and PANORAMA, Maracaibo, in the first week of September. Among other things, the president of republic raised, in his speech, a need for a return "to the principles of ethical rules that will make it possible to take greater national, just advantage of resources without diverting them into hedonistic, egoistic and petty pleasure of our own desire."

And then he added that at times, when he emphasizes these things, "friends in the opposition who write in newspapers point out that I am speaking like a preacher, but the fact is that the president of the republic has to be a preacher, not only a promoter of material work, not only a stimulator of social ideas, but also especially someone who will continue to point out a course that will open up horizons so that the peaceful, balanced, harmonious orientation of a whole people toward development will occur in accordance with the best rules of human behavior."

Perhaps the president did not have time to read our whole column on the preacher, or else he limited himself to a summary of it provided to him by his press office. In that column, we tried to get to the bottom of the unknown quantity contained for many Venezuelans -- including not a few of his associates -- in the personality of Luis Herrera as chief of state. And we noted that some are of the opinion that he does not have the stature in his exercise of the presidency, and others that he is an astute plainsman who knows very well what he wants and what he is doing or undoing and will finish his term in office with a good mark.

Then we added that, in our opinion -- and always with the risk of being wrong -- the unknown factor might be cleared up, if we thought that President Herrera had decided to take on the role of preacher consciously. Following the line of this assumption, we said that "in today's gay, sinful Venezuela of easy virtue, in which wealth becomes irresponsible and poverty engenders hatred and vengeance and is the seedbed of anarchy and delinquency; in this Venezuela of large-scale whiskey imports and of large shortages in foodstuffs that have to be imported just like whiskey; in this Venezuela where irresponsibility percolates into every sector, including the official sector, President Herrera believed that what Venezuela needed in the office of chief of state was a preacher who would try to right deeply rooted wrongs."

In order to strengthen our assumption, we then took an inventory of the statements, speeches and admonitions of the president on the poor, crybaby businessmen, the idle and idleness, students who do not study and teachers who do not teach, corruption and the corrupt, culture as an instrument for man's realization, sports, the "insidious press," disturbing and distorting television and even his trips abroad.

The Preacher and the Administrator

At no time did we criticize or object to that behavior by President Herrera, which we judged to be the result of a noble commitment, but we did dare to point out that "the preacher is neglecting the administrator somewhat." Everything seems to indicate, we went on, that Dr Herrera Campins is convinced that his obligations as a preacher, as the moral conscience of society, are more important and far-reaching than simple administrative management. He has entrusted this task to a team in which he has placed his full confidence. At the head of this team, his team, he has placed Rafael Andres Montes de Oca, minister of interior, and in practice prime minister, in the manner of those countries that have a parliamentary government.

We went on to say that a very widespread opinion is that the chief of state does not pay much attention to management of the economic policy. He is certainly familiar with its broad lines and its objectives, but he believes that its analysis and its pursuit to evaluate its results are not the preacher's tasks. The only thing is that at times when the government intends to give a turn to the economy with all its repercussions that this implies, the country expects the president of the Republic, by constitutional mandate administrator of the public treasury from which the country's whole economic and fiscal policy is derived, should be johnny-on-the-spot, as the saying goes, with the helm constantly in his hands.

President Herrera is fine in his role of preacher. No one can object to him. But he must also necessarily carry out his obligations as an administrator. Horizons have to be opened up in the moral environment (if yesterday we condemned the almost too close connections between some civil servants and party members with the world of business, it seems logical to suggest today to President Herrera not to lose sight of what might happen in that connection in his own shop). But it is also necessary to supervise public administration and the economy closely, especially in a country in which the state has so much influence on this, as is true of Venezuela.

A Document in Circulation

We shall quote, in support of this opinion, from a report by Alfredo Pena in his Saturday column in EL NACIONAL (20 September 1980). The report states the following textually: "A document criticizing the government's political and administrative management is circulating among the members of the Cabinet. Among other things, the creation is proposed of a presidential office for administrative reform or something similar to the Public Administration Commission that existed until December 1976. The inconsistent and, at times, contradictory behavior of some heads of the various executive offices is also criticized. Concern is expressed, because there is no element that coordinates the poorly understood autonomy of some ministers. Administrative inefficiency is the main topic in the above-mentioned document said to have been prepared by people who worked on President Herrera's election platform and by government officials."

The document in question really exists. Therefore, Alfredo Pena's report is entirely in accordance with the truth.

When we said above that we were quoting from it in support of our criterion on the neglect of the administrator by the preacher, it is because mention is made there of the inconsistent and, at times, contradictory behavior of the ministers and the lack of an element coordinating the executive offices. Well then, this coordinating element of the ministers' work cannot be other than than the chief of state. If he does not act in this way, what is criticized in that document happens. Moreover, the contradictions between the executive department heads -- whose existence is nothing new -- are the result of that withdrawal by the president of the Republic from the duties that he should perform directly as coordinator of his top-level assistants in public administration. Regardless of how much authority and devotion to service Minister Montes de Oca may have, regardless of how he may be "first among peers" -- that is how he was described once by Minister Ugueto with reference to the role of the minister of Interior within the government as a consequence of the delegations of duties made by President Herrera -- the president of the Republic can hardly be replaced almost systematically as head the nation's administration.

The Preacher's Language

We point out once more -- as if it were necessary -- that we are not reproaching Luis Herrera Campins for speaking and acting at the head of the state as a preacher. We are stressing the point that in today's Venezuela this is a noble task in which it would be desirable that his social Christian fellow party members should accompany him. But the preacher must be an administrator at the same time. There is no incompatibility at all between these two high functions. Finally, the preacher should be reminded that, especially in democratic societies, the language must be more convincing than aggressive, more stimulating to reflection than to bitter reaction and to disconcerting distrust.

NICARAGUAN ENVOY ON CUBA IN UNSC, OTHER TOPICS

PA152027 Paris AFP in Spanish 0223 GMT 15 Oct 80

[Commentary by Gilberto Lopes]

[Text] San Jose, 14 Oct (AFP)--Nicaraguan Ambassador Javier Chamorro has revealed here in statements to AFP that the Nicaraguan decision "to support Cuba's candidacy for a position of the UN Security Council reflects a commitment acquired before Costa Rica became a candidate."

The diplomat, who recalled Nicaragua's support for Costa Rica in seven other international elections, thus refuted charges made against his country today by former Costa Rican Foreign Minister Gonzalo Facio.

"Facio wishes to use the fact that we are now unable to give our vote to Costa Rica to give the impression that we have forgotten the solidarity extended to us during the struggle against the Somoza regime, which is untrue," the ambassador added.

Costa Rica is campaigning to obtain support for a seat on the Security Council, a seat for which it must compete with Cuba, and this has led those who oppose the Sandinist regime here to criticize Nicaragua's commitment to Cuba in this regard.

Facio, who served as foreign minister during the past two administrations (1970-1978) of the National Liberation Party [PLN], a Social Democratic Party, has been repeatedly described as a man who maintains close relations with State Department circles and as a severe critic of the Sandinist government that was installed in Managua in July 1979.

Ambassador Chamorro, for his part, noted the "excellent relations" which his country currently maintains with Costa Rica.

"We have also talked with leaders of the PLN, which is currently the main opposition party, Chamorro added, and they have reiterated that they consider the development of our political process to be "very positive, not only for Nicaragua, but for all of Central America. Therefore, we believe that Facio's position only reflects his personal opinion and is the product of misinformation."

The ambassador also mentioned an incident that occurred on Monday in the town known as Barra Del Colorado, on Costa Rica's Atlantic coast, a few kilometers from the Nicaraguan border, where Nicaraguan Deputy Defense Minister Commander Eden Pastora and other officials were detained for 4 hours before being permitted to leave.

Pastora arrived in the town, where he resided for several years, accompanied by approximately eight persons. They were traveling in two light planes. The group included Hugo Spadafora, Panamanian fighter and former deputy minister of health in Panama.

The news was highlighted by the local press today since, according to Costa Rican authorities, Pastora and his companions did not have the necessary permits to be in the country.

"No protest has been presented to us," said Chamorro, who added that attempts are being made to determine what really occurred.

Finally, the diplomat referred to statements made by Pedro Joaquin Chamorro, son of the slain newsman of the same name, of LA PRENSA of Managua. The statements were released today in San Diego, California, where the annual assembly of the Inter-American Press Association (IAPA) is being held.

The newsman had commented on recent incidents in the town of Bluefields, on the Nicaraguan Atlantic coast, where demonstrations were staged for 2 days in protest of the presence of Cuban advisers in some of the region's activities.

"Pedro Joaquin Chamorro's statements," the ambassador said, "show that he is not in line with the revolution, since he indicates that the problems in Bluefields were due solely to repudiation of the Cubans who are there, which is false and incomplete."

"Pedro Joaquin Chamorro hides the counterrevolutionaries in these events as well as the fact that Bluefields was the region most neglected by Somozism and that, despite the efforts of the revolution, its problems cannot be resolved overnight," the ambassador said.

BRIEFS

MEXICO INCREASES NICARAGUA AID--The Mexican ambassador in Managua, Julio Zamora, announced that his country is willing to increase its aid to Nicaragua, to which it will supply 7,500 barrels of oil daily. Zamora revealed that Mexico has granted Nicaragua a $5 million credit for the purchase of 11 fishing vessels and another for $10 million for the purchase of medical equipment and medicines. He also announced that Mexico will buy rice, corn and cement from Nicagarua, which will contribute to increasing its exports. SOUTHERN PACT IMPLICATIONS, OBJECTIVES ANALYZED

Argentina, Its Surroundings

Buenos Aires ULTIMA CLAVE in Spanish No 495, 9 Sep 80 pp 6-8

[Text] The renewed discussions on a possible Southern Cone pact have served at least to provoke some reflections on the real geopolitical situation in which Argentina finds itself. Beyond the short-term implications, it is a certainty that a South America which is in practice divided into three blocs merits detailed study.

The polemic statements by General Garcia Meza have placed in evidence the possible existence of three geopolitical forces organized on the basis of criteria which, without being too clear, seem to demand the attention of our authorities. If we accept the reality of the Andean Pact--Peru, Ecuador, Venezuela and Colombia--and if we work on the hypothesis of a "Southern Cone pact" including Argentina, Chile, Bolivia, Paraguay and Uruguay, Brazil would remain isolated, and it is not known for certain whether it would be beside or above the other groups.

It is known that Brazil has a double geopolitical link due to its privileged position with regard to the river basins of the subcontinent. To the north, it shares the Amazon Pact with Bolivia, Peru, Ecuador, Colombia and Venezuela. To the south, it shares the Plate River basin with Bolivia, Paraguay, Uruguay and our country. It should be noted that Chile is the only South American nation which remains excluded, because of its peculiar geographic picture, from both groups.

The groups resulting from the joint exploitation of river basins can be regarded as "natural," beyond the political connotations they may readily come to have. The Andean Pact, on the contrary, despite the fact that it links countries located along the axis of the mountain range, has nothing in common with a natural geopolitical complex, but rather its structure--most of all in its shining moments--has basically to do with political aspects. Economic in a first stage--negotiation with foreign capital--and political, properly speaking, now--the propping up of institutional democracy, even beyond the boundaries of South America.

A possible Southern Cone pact would obviously be a group of the second type. Its constituent principles could well be:

a. Resistance to the pressures to accelerate the democratization processes originating basically with the State Department, the European social democracies or the Church.

b. Joint agreement on political-ideological criteria with regard to the doctrine of national security.

c. Potentially, compensating for the shift of Brazil toward institutional forms which will probably include in its power structure political organizations ready to align themselves with the ideological opposition to the military governments in the Southern Cone.

Factors in Decision

When on 1 September the Paraguayan defense minister, Maj Gen Marcial Samaniego, spoke of a "tacit pact" among the Southern Cone governments, the words of Garcia Meza ceased to sound like pure improvisation and many attentive ears were alerted both at the Itamaraty Palace and in Washington.

If indeed the Paraguayan minister was sufficiently ambiguous in his statements to make many believe that he was only referring to the lines of cooperation which normally and in practice are to be found among neighboring countries, no one was unaware that the inclusion of Chile in the potential agreement could only be a product of multilateral negotiations, insofar as since it is not a part of the Plate River basin and because it has difficult territorial conflicts pending with Bolivia and Argentina, only a higher political interest could link it with the other countries involved.

In fact, the beginning of this cycle of somewhat vague statements about a future pact is to be found in the fortuitous decision of the Bolivian Government to leave the Andean Pact and enter fully into the new group. In other words, to replace one political bloc with another, minimizing among other things the question of coastline on the Pacific.

In practice, it would seem that the entire ideological and geopolitical arsenal being used in connection with this theme has Brazil and the United States as its points of reference. With regard to Brazil, it is very probable that its obvious political development--which has now led to terrorist action on one extreme and the other--has provoked a certain loss of confidence concerning its support of governments which do not for the time being have any intention or real potential for embarking upon democratization processes. On the other hand, it is possible that the enormity of Brazil and its constant economic expansion have aroused resistance in countries such as Bolivia, Paraguay or Uruguay, which have to a great extent been penetrated by Brazilian influence.

Where the United States is concerned, despite the very obvious affinity of the military governments in Latin America with the international postulates of candidate Ronald Reagan, the idea that in the final analysis Carter will win in the November elections is spreading. It is even thought that new impetus will be given to the human rights policy and that the pressures from the North, both economic and political, will be intensified.

If we remove from the South American complex those countries which still remain in the Cartagena Agreement--seemingly greatly influenced by European social democracy and Christian democracy--and in view of the powerful presence of Brazil, falling back on our own positions in order to resist pressures which seem inevitable is an option worthy of analysis.

National Prospects

Our country entered the fray with the statements made on 6 September by Gen Reynaldo Bignone, secretary general of the army. Before traveling to Rome to join the delegation discussing the Beagle conflict, Bignone said that "at this time there is a particular rapprochement among Southern Cone countries, but this does not mean the preexistence or existence of a pact or anything similar."

However, before the problem took on the connotations which it undoubtedly has today, Argentina, through two high authorities, seemed to be tending toward the formalization of a pact of the sort Garcia Meza and Samaniego had projected. Foreign Minister Pastor, on his trip to Brazil in May, had mentioned the possibility of consolidating an ideological bloc to oppose the rise of Marxist choices in South America, taking as reference points both Cuba and Nicaragua. On that occasion, the Itamaraty Palace and above all the Sao Paulo press firmly rejected any possibility that Brazil would join in such an experiment.

President Videla, in his recent swing through Brazil, expressed similar ideas much less emphatically, and they too received very little support in Brazilian official circles. This is the reason for the speculation about Argentine participation in the formation of an ideological bloc with the characteristics we have been describing.

On the other hand it is necessary to link these manifestations with the periodically revived report that a South Atlantic defense pact might be established which would include Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina and possibly the Republic of South Africa.

Brazilian reticence given this hypothesis is also readily perceived. It would seem that the Itamaraty Palace regards itself well enough integrated in the international context not to need regional blocs with ideological characteristics. It is probable that, with regard to the real situation on the subcontinent, Brazil will revive its traditional bilateral policy which may be that which best guarantees its economic expansion in the regional area.

The Reaction in Washington

As was to be expected, these indicative assessments coming from high official levels have caused the State Department concern. Apparently, the visit paid to Brazil, Uruguay, Paraguay and Peru by the assistant undersecretary for inter-American affairs at the State Department is mainly designed to establish the veracity and probability that the pact in question will become a concrete reality.

To judge from the reports in the WASHINGTON POST and NEW YORK TIMES, the main concern has to do with the hypothetical Brazilian neutrality in the event of a dispute for geopolitical hegemony on the subcontinent. It is clear that Washington wants Brazil to join with those countries which like Venezuela and Mexico are setting forth to the rest of the members of the Latin American community the theoretical advantages of democracy.

If the Itamaraty Palace is not prepared to play the role of a populizer of the virtues of democracy in the heart of South America, this will be due mainly to the strong warnings which have been voiced to General Figueiredo by high officials who take a very cautious view of the Brazilian political future. A substantial sector of the army officers, notably the commander of the contingent stationed in Sao Paulo, believes it is possible to continue for a number of years more with the present power structure, and they fear an electoral victory by the leftist sectors. The postponement of municipal elections which were to have been held in 1981 to 1983 is a clear indication of this situation.

The sizable Brazilian foreign debt and its known vulnerability where energy is concerned make our neighbor dependent on its links with the United States and the European Economic Community, apart from being a future supplier of oil located on the American continent. There are only three countries which can play this role: Venezuela, Mexico and Argentina, in view of the fabulous reserves which apparently will be exploited shortly.

Apparently, either Carter has decided to take more vigorous action on the continent or else the Kissinger thesis of relying on the good offices of a "key country" has finally prevailed. Washington foresees a threat to its American policy in any future Southern Cone pact. It is possible that the State Department accepts the European-Western role in the political and economic processes of Latin America. But it is very unlikely that it would accept either a more active presence by the Soviet Union or that of a bloc functioning within the inter-American community as a power factor endowed with autonomy. Particularly since, according to the thinking of the liberal sector at the State Department, to which both Vance and Muskie belong, the military governments do not in themselves provide a sufficient guarantee against future social upsets of the type which are currently being seen in Central America.

In any case, the undeniable influence the United States has on the continent may well be put to work with regard to any plan for new geopolitical alliances. As the possibility of Carter's reelection strengthens, it is very probable that the State Department will launch some short-term campaigns which will certainly have to do with the explosive situation in El Salvador and Guatemala, and also with Bolivia, a government which has notoriously overestimated its ability to challenge Washington.

Definition of Southern Cone

[Text] Argentina has traditionally pursued a policy of an independent and singular nature. It maintains relations with all members of the international community, with the intention of showing its universalist philosophy in this way and showing that the stress on independence and singularity is certainly not a desire for isolation. Nor should they be any hindrance to the diversification and intensification of its links with Latin American countries, without engaging in discrimination with regard to their political and economic systems. It must be added that respect for the legal equality of nations and the principle of nonintervention in domestic affairs are conditions governing all of our actions in the diplomatic sphere.

Because it is deemed indispensable to provide the necessary clarification, the representatives of Argentina throughout the world have issued a communique in which they put things in their proper places. For example they have proposed a definition of a phrase used in publications, statements and official documents but not always interpreted in terms of its real scope. This refers to the Southern Cone. It is a mere reference of a geographic nature which, in synthetic fashion, covers the southern countries in the region and does not signify the existence of any treaty or agreement as a tool of ideological solidarity, defensive precautions or actions in the area described which might be directed at other members of the Latin American community.

Argentina proposes to make maximal use of the links referred to to confirm economic cooperation, regional integration and the increase of trade trends. It should not be supposed that the means used or the goal proposed fail to take into account the advances achieved or to be achieved in the spheres of politics, culture, trade, scientific and technological exchange.

With regard to the Latin American area, our country is experiencing a definitely profitable economic stage. Imports from Latin American nations have increased from a total of $870 million in 1976 to $1,527 million in that same currency in 1979, i.e. an increase of 76 percent. Apart from this trade trend, other actions of vast scope define our national foreign policy. There are for example the agreements on grain supplies with Mexico, a possible free trade zone with Uruguay, numerous agreements with Brazil, infrastructure projects with Paraguay and Bolivia, greater economic contact with Chile within the framework of overall solutions to confirm a future coexistence. The Quito Act included an invitation to the Council of Foreign Ministers of the Andean group to meet in Buenos Aires, and so to finalize the agreements referred to in that act, and food and technical aid have been granted to South American, Central American and Caribbean countries, and the Caribbean Development Bank has been asked to join in. Argentina wants the SELA [Latin American Economic System] to function within the framework of regional cooperation and the ALADI to serve for partial integration activities, without mutual exclusion and with the priorities the countries themselves will establish by planning paths which will lead to convergence in a common market.

The above considerations, which are not exhaustive, should make it clear that when we Argentines speak of the Southern Cone, no concept of exclusion, aggression or any discriminatory orientation is in our minds. We do not conceive of blocs or axes but a joint defense throughout the region to safeguard and expand the paths of access and trade in this southern subregion of America.

PRESS COMMENTARY ON MIDDLE EAST CONFLICT

War's Implication Viewed

[Commentary: "Belligerence in the Persian Gulf"]

[Text] Iran must now deal with an attack which could be defined as preventive, punitive or a matter of conquest or recovery by a neighboring country which is also a part of Islam, although it has an orientation of a secular and Marxist sort. This will certainly not be the only contradiction in the situations to be found in the area of the Persian Gulf, which the Arab nations have rebaptized with its national name. It is no accident that the street demonstrations in Baghdad were accompanied by shouts of "Death to the Persians," and the Iraqi invasion is strangely similar in terms of the reasons invoked to the German invasion of Poland under the Third Reich, in September of another year, 1939.

If Iraq's attitude was preceded by lesser incidents, it can be viewed as coldly calculated. What has happened in recent days has left skirmishing behind to move on to the characteristics of open war, if not declared, adapting this concept to the special Moslem idiosyncrasies.

The despotic action of the false saint Khomeini, the absolute master of Iran, although he is now rejecting his powers in order to avoid grave responsibilities, the excesses of the fanatical crowds, encouraged by the lieutenants of the ayatollah and those concealing their communist affiliation, are factors in favor of the decision by President Saddam Hussein of Iraq to become the policeman of the Gulf in an attempt to control oil production and shipments of it, limited by the orders of Iran.

In truth, the chaotic situation in Iran, with its capacity for war limited after the forced departure of Shah Reza Pahlevi into exile, where he died, as well as the importance oil has taken on as a weapon for world domination, have created a temptation for someone to assume authority in this sector so intimately linked with the economies of the industrialized nations. They, because of their dependence on this essential supply and trapped by the policy of extortion pursued against them by the OPEC, do not seem as ready as they should be to assume the risks and responsibilities of defending their energy sources.

Iraq, the expansionist intentions of which are beyond doubt, has decided not to waste the opportunity. The notorious chaos in Iran offers it an excellent chance to carry forward plans for the recovery of territories controlled by Teheran which Baghdad says are legitimately Iraqi, as official statements have asserted categorically.

The response of Iran was to bomb the Iraqi capital, hitting civilian targets and causing many fatalities and innumerable injuries.

To evaluate the clash between the two countries in its full dimensions, it is essential to mention certain consequences of the greatest importance, although they are marginal.

Iraq's weapons are of Soviet and French origin. The position line of Hussein's government in international policy places it within the USSR orbit or, in the best of cases, very near it. The Soviet Union is vitally and directly involved in the prohibition, since it wants a zone to ensure its security in the region. Despite some indications from Moscow to preserve its neutrality in the dispute, and although it has not accused the United States of promoting it, it obviously sees future advantages in the Iraqi outburst. This allows it to insist on the neutralization of the Gulf and thus to represent itself as a peaceful nation and to conceal its true hegemonic intentions.

The United States and the Atlantic Alliance, which have lost the front-line ally which Iran was in the era of Shah Pahlevi--and they equipped the Iranian armed forces--cannot turn to it or hope to exert influence to the extent they did some years back. However, if as a result of these events a solution is found to the cruel problem of the hostages, something will have been gained. Moreover, if a calamity occurs in Iran, the two superpowers and Iraq will have the new prospect of an agreement to ensure their respective security and the possibility of another temporary detente, which is not to be dismissed. The Security Council, for its part, has formulated an appeal to the two nations participating in this war of some kind to cease their bellicose actions. Little or nothing is likely to be the outcome of the efforts of Mr Waldheim, the Security Council or the UN Assembly, to judge from the precedents in similar cases. They have shown the ineffectiveness of the UN, and the possibility that the conflict will spread is no distant or potential threat; it is a reality which looms darkly.

Importance of Peace Stressed

[Editorial]

[Text] The cruel events of recent days in the Near East bring to the forefront once again the importance of maintaining an international framework of reference favoring the elimination of the remaining conflicts, the prevention of new ones and, in general, the maintenance of peace among nations.

We have already said in referring to the "mini-war" between Iraq and Iran that it has developed in a geographic area where to the lack of dialog between the superpowers is added the predictable political weakness of the Persian nations, thrown into turmoil by a revolution which has emphasized continuing agitation, has caused production indices to fall and purges have been carried out in the armed forces which could not fail to have an effect on combat morale.

This was the picture within which the Baghdad government justified in denouncing a boundary treaty signed in the past against its interests on the basis of its previous lack of defense capacity.

A little more than a week after the struggle began, and discounting the reports issued on both sides by way of propaganda without confirmation in fact, it is obvious that the conflict is proving too cruel for both sides. Iraq has succeeded in penetrating Iranian territory somewhat, but it has not won control of the major cities it is said to have captured. As to the Ayatollah Khomeini, once again he has succeeded in rallying his people around nationalist slogans. The invasion of Iranian territory has served to cement a situation previously characterized by a trend away from unity.

The conflict subsequently included air attacks causing considerable damage to the oil, industrial, nuclear and other installations. These attacks, inaccurate at the beginning, subsequently developed greater accuracy and took their toll in blood and devastation.

At this point, the government of Iraq decided to order a unilateral 3-day truce, during which its forces would only react if attacked. If indeed this announcement served to point up the Iranian refusal to halt the fighting (among other things because a part of its territory had been occupied, it is to be hoped it will provide a sufficient basis to allow the organized bodies of the international community to impose, in the end, the higher goal of stopping the war, returning to the previous situation and negotiating the differences.

It is possible that the agreement reached by the foreign ministers of the superpowers during their recent meeting in New York on nonintervention in the conflict, and above all the fact that in fact neither of the parties has thus far contributed additional elements encouraging pursuit of the combat, will also have their effect on events.

Both Iraq and Iran are underdeveloped countries which need to build diversified economies based on the income provided by their single present export, oil. This goal is in full contradiction with the conflict being waged between them which, in addition to its high cost in human lives, means the destruction of assets of inestimable importance.

Thus the political goals which motivated the conflict should yield to the need to reestablish a peaceful situation in which defenses can be negotiated. This would also make it possible to lower the temperature in one of the regions of the earth of greatest importance and strategic content.

Developments in War

[Commentary: "The Conflict in the Persian Gulf"]

[Text] In the fervent struggle between Iran and Iraq, events follow one upon another with such speed that any assessment of the problem and its consequences for the rest of the world is hazardous. The picture is complicated by the continuing reports of territory of cities taken, triumphal feats, war materiel and prisoners seized. In addition, Iran is accusing the United States of giving Iraq information about the radar systems in that country so that it can bomb Teheran. China is blaming the Soviet Union. The Kremlin has declared that the conflict is being manipulated by the "imperialists" and charges that the United States is stepping up its military preparations in the zone for attack on Iran and other nations.

To aggravate this confused picture still further, it was announced in Bonn that a group of Iranian army officers who were in exile in Paris have rallied some 70,000 exiles in camps on the Iraqi frontier with a view to effecting a coup d'etat in Iran. Tens of thousands of deserters are said to be in training at these camps for the reported action.

Meanwhile the United States is holding urgent talks with its allies to decide on measures designed to guarantee free navigation through the Strait of Ormuz, through which some 100 large tanker vessels pass daily, carrying 60 percent of the oil the Western peoples need. To this end a major fleet will be concentrated in the Persian Gulf, and France has confirmed that agreement was reached on protecting the "vital interests" of crude oil transport.

The origin of the conflict is said to be the Algerian agreement reached in 1975 between Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlevi and the then-vice-president of Iraq, Saddam Hussein, who is now president, providing for free navigation of the Shatt al Arab estuary. This is a kind of canal some 100 kilometers long located in the deltas of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, which are within Iraqi jurisdiction and which empty into the Gulf. Until a few days ago, the Abadan refinery, the largest in the world, and the port of Khorramshahr, which Iran uses only for unloading its general imports, functioned on the right bank. The destruction of the refinery represents a serious loss, but is not of the magnitude of a total disaster, because the crude oil exported from the province of Khuzistan does not, as was the case some years ago, come through this port nor from this refinery, since it is loaded onto the great oil tankers on an artificial island created for the purpose at Kharg, on the Persian Gulf, to which the oil is taken by giant oil pipelines built with modern technology crossing land and maritime regions.

In fact, the Algerian agreement benefited only Iran, because Shah Reza Pahlevi had undoubted control in this sector. On the left bank of the Shatt al Arab estuary, near the port of Basra, are the Iraqi oil installations, and when that country denounced the Algerian agreement, it said it was not seeking to expand its territory, but to recover some "500 square kilometers of Iraqi land which was usurped by Iran, and sovereignty over the Shatt al Arab estuary."

Iran had an army of 200,000 well-trained men and modern war equipment of U.S. origin, but the United States suspended shipments of materiel when the hostages were kidnaped. Also, the Iranian army was dismembered by the violent purges ordered by the Ayatollah Khomeini, and by subsequent desertions.

Iraq has an air force with Soviet and French equipment. Italy has supplied it with technical advice and nuclear equipment, and Brazil supplies it with weapons. These last three countries buy Iraqi oil.

Given this dark picture, it is possible that the conflict will be resolved such as to avoid generalized catastrophe by the joint action of other nations, with the reaching of an agreement between the great Western powers and the Kremlin. This possibility allows room for international political speculations as to important consequences, if it is borne in mind that the oil interests in the region are vital to the Western world. The current episodes are certainly regrettable, and it is to be hoped that the good sense of the statesmen of the great powers will prevent the development of greater evil.

OIL PRODUCTION, CONSUMPTION LEVELS REVIEWED

Decrease in Imports

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 24 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] Oil production totaled 18,901,300 cubic meters during the first 8 months of this year, as compared to 18,026,900 in the comparable period last year. This represented an increase of 874,400 cubic meters, i.e. 4.9 percent.

In August, production totaled 2,385,100 cubic meters as compared to 2,324,900 for the same month in 1979, showing an average of 2,200 cubic meters, or 2.6 percent.

Imports

With regard to imports, the total in August came to 25,000 tons as compared to 72,200 for the same month last year, showing a decline of 65.4 percent. In the first 8 months of the year imports totaled 1,509,000 cubic meters, as compared to 1,236,100 for the same period last year, showing an increase of 22.1 percent.

Expenditures for purchases in the January to August period this year totaled $313,024,000 as compared to $197,116,800 in 1979, making the increase for this year 58.8 percent.

The report of the energy secretariat further indicated that for total imports of fuel (oil, oil products, natural gas, liquefied gas and coal), $682,180,700 were spent up to last August as compared to $715,478,700 for the first 8 months of last year, thus showing a decrease this year in expenditures of about 4.7 percent. The fact that gas oil, which cost $188,407,900 last year, was not imported, had an effect on this decrease.

Exports

The document went on to report that in the first 8 months of this year exports of fuel (byproducts and residual coal) accounted for income totaling $142,559,300 as compared to $25,100,100 the preceding year, representing an increase of 468 percent. Sales of fuel which totaled $102,863,200 this year, as compared to $16,334,900 last year, had an effect on these exports.

Gas and Coal

The report then discussed the injection of natural gas in the gas pipeline intakes, stating that a volume of 953.7 million cubic meters was reached in August, as compared to 860 million in August of 1979, i.e. a 10.9-percent increase, while the total for the first 8 months of the year was 6,618,300,000 as compared to 6,057,900,000 for the same period in 1979, showing an increase of 9.3 percent.

The production of marketable coal in August was 25,000 tons as compared to 72,200 in August of the preceding year, i.e. a decline of 65.4 percent, and the total for the period from January to August was 286,800 as compared to 490,700 for the comparable period in 1979, showing a decline of 41.6 percent.

Oil Stocks Situation

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 26 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] The president of the Government Oil Deposit (YPF), engineer Carlos Benaglia, and the secretary for fuels, engineer Osvaldo Calcagno, agreed in separate statements that the present crisis in the Middle East will not affect the crude oil supply for Argentina this year.

Engineer Benaglia said that two Argentine vessels carrying oil succeeded in leaving the zone of conflict without difficulty, and he said that the oil stocks in the country have been kept very high, such that "for now we have no problem of any sort."

The president of the YPF recalled that Argentina signed contracts with Iraq and Saudi Arabia in 1979 for the import of 1,700,000 cubic meters of crude oil exported through the Strait of Ormuz, now difficult to navigate because of the conflict, and he said that more than 50 vessels "are outside the Persian Gulf but waiting to enter to load oil," a situation which has substantially increased maritime insurance premiums.

The two Argentine vessels carrying oil will reach Argentina at the end of next week and in mid-October, and this, he said, will practically bring the total imports of oil from Iraq and Saudi Arabia for this year to 90 percent. The other shipment will come in November.

Argentina signed contracts with Iraq for the import of 600,000 cubic meters of oil per year and negotiations for its renewal for another 12 months have been undertaken. An agreement was reached with Saudi Arabia in 1979 for the purchase of a total of 1,100,000 cubic meters of crude oil over 3 years.

Engineer Benaglia stressed that "Argentina is entirely covered by the two shipments which will arrive soon and with very high stocks, to the point," he said, "that early in the year we exported gas oil for the first time."

He also said that practically 92 percent of what is consumed is produced in Argentina, which is a level very close to self-sufficiency, and that the war between Iran and Iraq "does not affect us, and we would only have problems if the conflict were prolonged excessively."

Engineer Calcagno

For his part, engineer Calcagno added that 200,000 cubic meters of crude oil coming from Iraq are en route and another 300,000 are being loaded in Saudi Arabia. He explained that this volume of 500,000 cubic meters is the equivalent of 1 percent of the annual oil demand in Argentina.

He also announced that the mixed Argentine-Brazilian commission which will study the feasibility of the proposed supply of gas to that country at a rate of 5 to 10 million cubic meters per day, up to a total of 3 billion cubic meters per year, has been appointed.

No Oil for Brazil

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 28 Sep 80 p 14

[Text] (NA)--The energy secretary, Daniel Brunella, has given assurance that Argentina can trade oil products with Brazil in view of the situation created for the country by the war between Iran and Iraq, but he stressed that "we cannot give them" crude oil, because "we too are purchasing from Iraq."

He said that the armed conflict in the Middle East "does not for the moment affect in any way" Argentina's supply, and he stated that "we are receiving oil not only from Iraq but from Saudi Arabia, and small quantities such as these can always be obtained."

Brunella made these statements in Ezeiza yesterday on his return from Rio de Janeiro, where he participated in the Second Western Energy Seminar.

At this symposium, to which he was accompanied by the undersecretary for electric energy, Bernardo Bronstein, he participated in the work group which took up the subject "gas and control."

This official said in that regard that "we learned of the potential for obtaining gas, not in the conventional form, that is to say in association with oil, but pure chemical gas produced by the geological conditions inherent in the earth itself."

Brunella recalled that before "saying that we are going to sell gas to Brazil" within the framework of the treaty signed by the presidents of the two countries, "they should have completed their studies to see if this was desirable and where they were going to get the supply."

He added that technicians from the energy secretariat, State Gas and the Brazilian Ministry of Mines and Energy began the feasibility studies on the sale of gas to Brazil last week.

Finally, when asked if the war between Iraq and Iran would favor the entry into Argentina of oil capital, he responded that our country offers great opportunities both for service enterprises and those willing to run risks.

He said that "Argentine companies are functioning here, and in Brazil they have very good technology and utilize it where they can," although he said that he did not know why the quotations on the stock market for these enterprises recently went up.

U.S. RECOGNITION AWAITED AFTER PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

[Article by Juan de la Rosa]

[Text] Many people exhibit an ungrounded fear because U.S. recognition of the new Bolivian Government has not been forthcoming, a fact that is being influenced by the American left in President Jimmy Carter's inner circle.

It is odd that the Carter government has two different ways of operating, because, while it condemns and combats the military regime in Bolivia, it supports the new Turkish Government, which is also a military regime and which, like ours, calls itself a nationalist one.

However, setting aside this contradiction, let us go on to cite some examples of the State Department's international policy to draw a few conclusions.

Gen Francisco Franco's Spanish Government was not recognized by the United States for over 25 years. And not only that, it was also subjected to an economic blockade, notwithstanding which the Franco government did not fall, despite the fact that the two unjust measures had been adopted against almost the poorest country in Europe. As a marginal note, we must point out that, after 25 years, the United States had to beg Spain, in humiliating fashion, to allow it to set up Yankee military bases on its soil in order to contain the communism and Soviet Russian imperialism that was swallowing up almost all of Europe.

Another case worth noting is that of Fidel Castro's Cuba, which was the object of indignant nonrecognition on the part of the United States. This stubborn attitude lasted about 21 years and nothing happened to the condemned regime, despite the fact that it was red, in the service of Communist Russia and constituted a grave military danger at the very gates of the colossus of the north. Fidel Castro is still insolent in his dealings with the United States, still attempts to infiltrate Latin America and other African and Asian countries and has not fallen from power because the State Department has not recognized him.

We offer yet another notable example. That of Communist China, which was also not recognized by the United States for over 20 years, a period during which it was not permitted to join the United Nations... Nothing serious happened to the Red Chinese regime which today, thanks to the Carter government's disloyalty to Nationalist China, established on Taiwan, is on the most intimate terms with and enjoys the affectionate friendship of the Americans.

And finally, we present another example, closer to General Garcia Meza's government. This was the case of its historical predecessor, Maj Gualberto Villarroel's military government, which was not recognized for 6 months; yet nothing happened to it, nor did the Bolivian Government fall, nor did we die of hunger. This abusive American international policy maneuver merely served to get our military raw materials from us at rock-bottom prices and to frighten cogoverning members of the different movements at the time who, using it as a pretext, wanted to sabotage the government, appointing as a go-between to achieve this a "confidential agent" in the person of Enrique Sanchez de Lozada, who was a Third International communist living in the United States. The whole maneuver failed and, against its will, the United States had to recognize the Bolivian Government.

With these four historical precedents, we come to the indisputable conclusion that American democracy has always been powerless and ineffective in its crafty maneuvers to overthrow governments not subservient to it. So, all these fears are groundless and we must relieve the anxiety of those timid souls who offer American nonrecognition as a reason for changing the historic course the National Reconstruction Government has adopted.

In conclusion, in order to restore calm to everyone, we must say that Bolivia ought to calmly await the results of the American presidential elections in which Jimmy Carter's disastrous and confusing international policy will suffer well-deserved censure through sensible and patriotic American public opinion with the certainty that candidate Reagan will win out over Carter because of the enormous weight of the errors committed by the latter and his subsequent loss of prestige.

REGIME CREDITED WITH RESTORATION OF PUBLIC CONFIDENCE

La Paz EL DIARIO in Spanish 21 Sep 80 p 2

[Article by Javier Portillo Perez: "A Fruitful Change in the Country"]

[Text] Of the six great revolutions there have been in Bolivia in this century: 1920, 1930, 1952, 1964, 1971 and 1980, we cannot deny that the most bloodless of the lot and the least disruptive has been the last one, which within a few days of the change in government brought about a rapid readjustment of living conditions in this country.

Before 17 July 1980, we had total anarchy, disorder, confusion, work stoppages, strikes, threats, ignorance of the laws, personal insults, a downward zooming economy and social chaos. In short, fear was spreading throughout all sectors of the country, jobs were becoming scarcer and the disruptive propaganda of the reds was on the rise. The national scene was one of anxiety and despair, a natural situation in view of the fact that there were four centers of power: Mrs Gueiler's government, Parliament, the political parties and the COB [Bolivian Labor Federation], which allowed itself the liberty of ignoring government decrees.

So complex and profound was the administrative confusion of these 3 years of disorder that it was calculated that at least another 3 years would be required to return to institutional and civil normalcy.

But, in only 2 months time, the Armed Forces' National Reconstruction Government, presided over by Gen Luis Garcia Meza and composed of competent soldiers and experienced civilians, provided the state with new leadership, severely attacking the roots of our public evils and imposing plausible standards of morality and order, thus restoring to the nation that climate of austerity, efficiency and confidence that everyone was demanding.

There can be no doubt that the navigation of a ship is normal when the pilot knows how to guide it. This time, the nation has found a leader, a man who has fundamental control over the problems he is faced with, who through his own example teaches us patriotism, righteousness and a vigorous will to work. We owe this rapid collective recovery, this rebirth of confidence among the people and, above all, the readjustment of the administrative machinery to General Garcia Meza. He grasps situations quickly and is ready to take action. His moral righteousness enables him to unmask the idiots and to help the needy. He approaches the people and the farmers with sincerity, which does not prevent him from devoting long hours to his official duties and to the solution of the difficult problems he has inherited from the disorder of the past.

Confidence has returned to households. The economy is being reactivated. Disorder and anarchy have disappeared. More jobs are becoming available and, for those who think we are exaggerating, we need merely remind you of just some of the most positive steps the military government has taken:

Foreign policy is appropriate.

A reordering of the university and educational reform are being studied, stripping them of their Marxist taint.

The state enterprises are being reorganized to turn them into profitable businesses.

The customs service is being cleaned up and rid of graft.

There is freedom of the press inasmuch as well-known leftist sympathizers are working for the local press.

Human rights are respected and political refugees are gradually leaving the country.

The sounding of curfew prevents subversive activities and guarantees peace in the home.

Broad vistas are being opened to foreign investment and national reinvestment.

Farm and livestock development is vigerousy encouraged as well as the advancement of the farmer.

Labor arbitrators are effecting closer ties between the workers and the administration.

National production of wheat is being subsidized.

Foreign debt payments are being renegotiated.

The housing and health policies are being developed through specific public welfare projects.

New incentives for the mining industry are in effect.

The Military-Peasant Pact is being renewed with the unanimous suppert of the rural majorities of Bolivia.

The steel and metalworking industries are being promoted.
Smuggling is being vigorously prosecuted.

The policy of large-scale repression of the drug traffic is being stepped up despite the unjust and inexplicable suspension of American aid.

In general, the development of industry and trade is fully guaranteed and workers are well protected by the laws in effect and the Ministry of Labor. Now no one thinks of disturbances; everyone thinks only of working and producing more so that he can improve his standard of living. The Civil Service is purging itself of corrupt employees and a big cleanup is moving from the top level of government down to the lower levels.

In barely 2 months time, the republic is recovering its almost lost feeling as a nation, faith in its national destiny and trust in order and civil guarantees. In short, the country is regaining the road to normalcy while plans to reorganize the nation in a harmonious and egalitarian way in which all Bolivians have equal rights and responsibilities are being studied and worked out.

The National Reconstruction Government, our Armed Forces and their leader, President General Garcia Meza, deserve the support of the nation for having saved us from the extremist menace and for accomplishing the difficult task of reconstructing the country. In just a few weeks, Garcia Meza has gained the support of the people.

MINISTER DISCUSSES LABOR LAW REFORMS

[Article: "During Over 2 Years of Anarchy, 240 Stoppages and Strikes Recorded"]

[Text] In two and a half years of "anarchy and misrule," the country was forced to suffer 240 work stoppages and strikes that meant 13,465 idle hours representing an economic loss of 1,588,755,550 pesos.

The information to this effect, backed by statistical tables, was presented yesterday by Minister of Labor and Labor Development Gen Augusto Calderon at a press conference held for that specific purpose. The report was drawn up by the Department of Sector Planning, headed by Attorney Lourdes Aramayo.

In the statistical report, it is noted that the figures only reflect those losses in wages that the central government and private enterprise have suffered, taking into account minimum wage averages provided by the Wage Administration.

Furthermore, it is emphasized that the reasons or justifications argued by the miners, backed by the COB [Bolivian Labor Federation], for the almost total paralysis of the country's primary source of hard currency were demagogic, since in June 1978 the mining sector was already in a period of decline.

On this occasion, Minister Calderon repeated the necessity of definitively depoliticizing the Bolivian labor union movement inasmuch as it has done nothing but harm the workers themselves as well as employers and the whole country. He said that to that end the National Reconstruction Government would totally revise the General Labor Law, laying emphasis on the section dealing with unions, which will henceforth perform their appropriate role on the fringe of political activity.

He, however, asserted that the government is not an enemy of the labor union movement. He said that it must exist as it does all over the world, but that it does not have to get involved in political activity, which citizens should engage in at other levels of national life.

Regarding the announced reform of the General Labor Law, General Calderon reported that an advisory commission, which is now being constituted, would be responsible for the job. He asserted that this commission will also include labor and employer participation provided that the appropriate report is presented sometime this December.

Minimum Living Wage

At the press conference, the minister of labor and labor development reported that, at the instructions of his office and the government, the appropriate departments are working on a study for the introduction of a minimum living wage. "It is the aim of the government to provide the worker with a wage that is appropriate in terms of his needs," he said, immediately noting that the statistical part of the study is ready and that it must be complemented by the interpretation the sociologists, jurisconsults versed in social and labor law and others will place on it. However, he did not set a date for making [the results of the study] public, limiting himself to stating that it would be as soon as possible.

This military leader serving as a government minister reported that sometime next week about 800 labor arbitrators will assume office, chosen on the basis of lists of three candidates presented by those workers constituting the rank and file of the former unions. He said that in this way a veid would be filled, thus tending to normalize worker activity in terms of the attention given to their pending demands, which are emerging from the worker-employer relation.

In response to another question from the reporters, Minister Calderon noted that unionization is inappropriate for public officials inasmuch as their activities are governed by the Administrative Career Law, given the nature of their work in the service of the community. And finally, he said that the new labor laws provide for the legal unionization of other sectors that have been unjustly shunted to the sidelines by political union members. Among these, he mentioned the trade unions and farmers. Referring to the latter, he noted that, as a later development, their organization into cooperatives so that they can achieve the full potential of their own activities as agrarian producers is planned.

STUDY ON NUTRITION PROMPTS BROAD NATIONAL PROGRAM

[Excerpt] The National Reconstruction Government is planning a broad program of policies on nutrition for the purpose of providing the needy classes with sufficient food.

Nutrition studies completed in the past have permitted us to establish that malnutrition in the infant population under 6 years of age due to a lack of energy-producing proteins is very widespread, more prevalent than the milder form, and that the more serious form has been getting to be more of a problem due to the increase in migration from rural areas into the cities and to the low purchasing power of the peso and relatively little chance of finding work.

Analysis of the studies and investigations completed in the 1970's produces nearly identical figures on proteid-caloric malnutrition in the country's three geographic areas, so that the plateau region exhibits a malnutrition situation distributed as follows: 30.4 percent suffer from first-degree malnutrition, 16.3 percent from second-degree and 5.3 percent from third-degree, as compared with those of the valley region where the figures show that about 34 percent of the children exhibit first-degree malnutrition, 6 percent second-degree and approximately 2 percent third-degree. The almost identical situation exhibited in the plains region is represented by the following percentages: first-degree, 23 percent; second-degree, 7 percent; and third-degree, 1 percent.

From this we conclude that in each of the regions studied there is evidence of a serious nutrition problem, with the plateau region being most affected.

However, this situation is not noteworthy solely and exclusively in terms of the availability or not of food; rather, it is the result of a number of factors which directly or indirectly have an effect on the nutritional state of the individual, such as sanitation in the environment, geographical accessibility, cultural accessibility, habits and others. These factors, as they affect an organism in a state of malnutrition, turn into triggering agents and causes of this high infant mortality.

Food-consumption studies show that the foods chiefly consumed in the plateau region are wheat, potatoes and chuno. On the other hand, consumption of legumes is nil, but in some cases it is greater than that of lean meat, and consumption of milk is almost nil.

In the valley region, nutrition is based on potatoes, chuno, wheat and especially corn. Meat consumption is also low, but an increase in the consumption of milk and its by-products has been noted.

In the plains region, the most frequently consumed foods are wheat and rice, but an increase in the consumption of milk has been noted. More sugar is consumed in the plateau and plains regions, less in the valley region. It was confirmed that, despite availability, fruit consumption is low.

As far as an adequate intake of calories is concerned, it was ascertained that only 69 percent [of the recommended norms] are consumed in the plateau region and from 88 to 94 percent in the plains.

Protein-sufficiency levels in the country are considered to be satisfactory, the lowest being found in the plateau region with a coverage of 73 percent. Sufficiency levels for calcium, riboflavin and vitamin A are directly related to the manner in which foods typical of the region are consumed. In comparison with other nutrients, consumption of iron is high since it is much influenced by the custom of using iron cooking utensils.

The average daily per capita consumption of nutrients shows that protein, iron, vitamin A and thiamine levels are in accordance with those recommended. The deficiency in calories amounts to 30 percent as is the case with ascorbic acid and riboflavin.

Studies completed in this country show that the average prevalence of endemic goiter is 16.4 percent among children under 15 years of age and 10.5 percent among adults. This situation is attributed to the hardness of the water, which causes some interference in the absorption of idodine due to the calcium and magnesium.

We can, however, say that most of the endemic goiter is due to the low level of ingestion of iodine in foods.

Thus shown to be the case, the country's nutritional problem is a repercussion of the situation any community in the process of development finds itself in, where economic growth has caused the food gap to widen, increasing poverty and malnutrition.

Faced with this situation, through the Ministry of Social Welfare and Public Health, the government is attacking the problem through the establishment of food and nutrition policies in order to provide the needy classes with the necessary foods in sufficient quantity and quality to prevent the appearance of moderate and serious degrees of malnutrition.

Thus, programs are being developed which will attempt to achieve the objectives that have been outlined, such as:

Food aid (exclusively distribution of food) to vulnerable groups. This program is coordinated with private and state agencies and supplementary food programs are being developed with the participation of the Mothers Clubs which, comprising approximately 600 groups, are distributed throughout the country in both rural and urban areas. Through this program, mothers and every child under 6 years of age receive a monthly ration consisting of milk, oats, oil and CSM [expansion unknown]. As a member of this sort of club, every mother has to pay dues of 15 pesos a month for the purpose of capitalizing its [programs]:

Precooked Legumes (Program SP-I-I).

Cotton Flour for Human Consumption (Program SP-1-2).

Promotion of Fish Consumption (Programs SP-1-4 and 1-5).

Wheat Substitution (Program SP-II-3).

Quinoa Industrialization (Program DP-II-3a).

ROLE OF NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE ADVISORY COMMISSION DESCRIBED

La Paz EL DIARIO in Spanish 10 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] The National Legislative Advisory Commission (CONAL) will not become just one more bureaucratic agency and will not create new positions, nor will it constitute a new burden on the national budget; and it will be the government that allocates the funds needed to perform the functions recommended by the National Reconstruction Government.

These ideals were divulged yesterday by CONAL president, Gen Juan Lechin Suarez.

On the occasion of the swearing-in ceremony and the speech delivered by the Bolivian president, General Lechin Suarez expressed his gratitude for the confidence invested in his person in terms of recommending him for such an important and delicate mission.

He said that the new national institution that is being created will fundamentally and basically be an agency designed to offer advice and suggestions and will be directly responsible to the executive branch through the president and the ruling junta.

He explained that CONAL members will apply a methodology involving the planning and realization of joint projects in an attempt to bring together all efforts toward the goals of our people's well-being and of the advancement of our most needy social classes, particularly the peasant class, a task the National Reconstruction Government is intensively engaged in.

"CONAL," he emphasized, "has neither executive nor administrative responsibilities and so it should not be confused with, for example, the National Economic and Planning Council, which is responsible for the formulation, administration and supervision of economic and social development plans and the coordination of interministerial activities as head of the government's economic and social departments."

Furthermore, General Lechin Suarez maintained that CONAL will not impose its activities on the other Civil Service agencies and organizations and even less so will it interfere with their normal development.

"CONAL's aim is to act as an assistant, a catalyst, to cooperate with all the agencies that compose the already considerable public sector gamut. It has not nor could it have either control or administrative supervision functions," he pointed out.

And lastly, CONAL president General Lechin Suarez said:

"Given the very broad area of counsel and advice assigned us by the decree that created CONAL and in terms of the advance and progress of our society, we feel that, as in any other society today, there are certain forces that shape it. Among them and first of all are our own people with all the ancient bondage of their historical and cultural heritage and their needs in terms of well-being, peace and social justice. Then their rich, spacious and noble country. Among these factors is also the one produced by the interaction within the international community we belong to and, therefore, harmonious coexistence in it, with both our neighboring countries and those with which we have, through historical and traditional ties and even those of blood, maintained close associations, as well as with those remote countries that have constantly exhibited a policy of cooperation with and respect for our country. This is and always will be for us desirable in terms of equality and dignity.

"Mr President, you have just assigned us the mission of creating and putting into operation a new summit institution, new in every respect, including that of the test of time. This is a mission to which, I repeat, we will intensively and passionately devote ourselves. We will do our best to accomplish it without rash haste or improvisations. We will move forward precisely in accordance with the priority of the country's needs and with our potential. We will avoid a lot of big talk and the arousal of false hopes.

"Since CONAL is not an agency designed to interact with the public services, rather to relate to the supreme authorities, its efforts will be silent and anonymous, as are those of any General Staff council.

"In conclusion, Mr President, I would like to say to you that we begin our work with fear and humility.

"With fear because we are taking on the job of preserving the greatness of the nation and with humility because we feel small indeed in the face of our assignments.

"Our inspiration will be the spirits of our ancestors, the nationalist sentiment with which we are all imbued and the eagerness to succeed, to renew and to progress that the National Reconstruction Government you head lends vigor to."

CNE MEMBER VIEWS IMPACT OF GULF CONFLICT, ALTERNATE FUELS

Rio de Janeiro MANCHETE in Portuguese 18 Oct 80 pp 148, 150

[Interview with Eduardo Celestino Rodrigues, coordinator of a National Energy Commission task force, by MANCHETE, in Sao Paulo, date not given]

> [Text] The address on the calling card of Sao Paulo engineer Eduardo Celestino Rodrigues is revealing: Palacio do Planalto, Brasilia. As coordinator of the Special Group of the National Energy Commission, which is chaired by Aureliano Chaves, vice president of the republic, Rodrigues is one of the men responsible for the country's fate in this sensitive and strategic area. It is customarily said that engineer Rodrigues, who left the presidency of a large construction firm to help Brazil search for a promising energy future, is the real brain of the commission. A physics and mathematics professor, who taught Minister Delfim Netto at the Colegio Anglo-Latino, and the builder of countless hydroelectric plants here, he is considered one of Brazil's greatest energy experts. Many of the government decisions in the sector, mainly after the outbreak of the Iran-Iraq conflict, are the result of studies conducted by the group which Rodrigues coordinates. After a week of meetings in Brasilia with commission members, who include seven ministers of state, he had a frank and illuminating conversation with MANCHETE at his beautiful farm in the interior of Sao Paulo. In this exclusive interview, conducted by a eucalyptus grove with a million plants, he outlined a bright future for Brazil.

MANCHETE: The National Energy Commission has much to say about the future, but we would like first to talk about the present. Will the Iran-Iraq war severely affect Brazil?

Eduardo Celestino Rodrigues: The crisis caught Brazil in a very good situation in terms of reserves. In August we imported over 1 million barrels per day, of which we used only 800,000 barrels. Considering our current stocks (which for strategic reasons I cannot reveal), guaranteed imports of 510,000 barrels of oil per day, domestic production of 170,000 barrels per day, which will go to 210,000 barrels when the Garoupa wells resume operations in January, and our current consumption, which is 1.08 million barrels, I believe we can rest easy for close to 300 days, if various measures are taken to economize on fuel as much as possible. Coordinated by the commission and carried out by the ministries, these economy measures can give us a milder outlook until the situation is resolved.

[Question] Could you tell us some of these measures?

[Answer] In the first place, there will be measures to encourage mass transit. This obviously directly affects the use of gasoline. One of the decisions in this regard was to cancel the Sunday opening of stations in the tourist cities and resorts.

[Question] Isn't this a drop in the bucket?

[Answer] No. The people in the surrounding areas were filling up at those stations. My farm is near a resort, and I was filling my tank every Sunday. Generally speaking, measures will be taken to reduce the consumption of petroleum derivatives as much as possible.

[Question] Even unpopular measures?

[Answer] Even unpopular ones, but I don't think they will actually be really strong. There will be measures to control urban traffic in the big cities, to encourage train travel and so on. We have come quite far in this respect. Rail traffic has increased 30 percent in the last 12 months.

[Question] Don't you think we took too long to agree on the advantage of using the railroads for cargo transport?

[Answer] In the past, highway transport was our only answer. Brazil was a very poor country; it was not in a position to build railroads. Even today, only the traffic in the southeast-southern region would justify use of the railroad, which requires much greater investment than highways. In the rest of the country, highways are still a better option.

What we have to do in the former region is to increase the number of railway cars, giving more business to rail transport to take a slice away from the highways. We have already reduced highway transport by over 30 percent, and we plan to reduce it another 30 percent. This way we can reduce consumption of diesel oil, which, unlike gasoline consumption, is rising.

[Answer] The gasoline-powered automobile, certainly. Brazil is going to back the alcohol-powered automobile, and not just the automobile. One of the goals is to move gradually to alcohol for the light and medium cargo fleet. By the end of the year, two large manufacturers are going to launch alcohol-driven light trucks, and another firm is putting alcohol farm tractors on the market. The intention is that only the heavy fleet will continue to use diesel oil.

[Question] Diesel oil is now responsible for the consumption of 300,000 barrels of petroleum per day. What are the commission's plans for an alternative source, and for reducing diesel consumption to a minimum?

[Answer] The first step was to add naphtha to diesel, making it more combustible, as it is shown in the TV commercial. We can also add up to 7 percent alcohol--which we will not do for now--and we can even add 30 percent vegetable oils. In this first stage, sunflower oil will probably head the list. The Ministry of Agriculture is arranging for increased production of these oils. Another promising solution already under study is palm oil. The oil palm yields 5,000 kg of oil per hectare, as opposed to yields of 360 kg of soybean oil and 600 kg of sunflower oil. The only problem with palm oil is the size of the investment required, which we cannot handle now. In Brazil, however, the oil palm is a historic inevitability. From Manaus to the west, on both banks of the Amazon River, the land is suitable for growing the oil palm, which requires rain year-round.

[Question] The bulk of the petroleum we buy goes for fuel oil (almost 330,000 barrels per day). What can be done here?

[Answer] There are several options. The cheapest is wood--firewood and charcoal. The plan is to make the best use of some unproductive land that could be improved by reforestation. And there is coal. We see a case here (shows a photograph sent by an industrialist). He has managed to substitute gasified coal for almost all the fuel oil used in a bronze foundry. Gas from wood cannot be transported long distances and hence must be used locally, but it gives a good return. The burning temperature reaches 1,500 degrees. Synthetic gas can be very useful in these ventures, and the commission could provide financing. Charcoal could be substituted for up to 70 percent of the oxyacetylene torches in the country. In terms of costs, mineral coal is in second place, and is the number three priority in the general plan of the commission, after petroleum economy measures and alcohol. Large-scale exploitation of coal is perfectly practical. The mines are there, mostly idle, and a large network is being designed to transport the product. Part of the coal will be moved by rail, and the bulk from Rio Grande do Sul will go by coastal shipping, after the region's ports are improved. Initially, it is agreed that this coal will be used in the steel and cement industries. When fuel oil is no longer subsidized, coal will be competitive in the southeastern region of the country. By 1985, mineral coal should represent a savings of 170,000 barrels per day.

[Answer] If the plan is fully implemented, and with an increase in domestic production, we could keep to a limit of 500,000 barrels per da of imported oil, even allowing for the growth in demand. If Brazil took no precautionary measures at all, by 1985 our consumption would reach 1.8 million barrels per day.

[Answer] Without a doubt. The basic priorities established by the commission are part of a very well organized strategy. The first priority is economy. The second is production and use of alcohol. Next come coal, charcoal, vegetable oils and, in special cases, electricity. Regionally, there are other options. I must emphasize that the plan is within the province of private initiative. The government comes in with financing. It finances alcohol plants, coal mines, industries that want to replace their boilers. Regionally, the use of biogas, produced from garbage and detritus of all kinds, is already showing good results in Santa Catarina. Every farm can set up a miniplant to produce biogas for its own use. There is no reason why a refrigerator or a stove could not be run on gas from animal dung, for instance. The technology is no longer any mystery. Another regional answer is the use of "pellets" of compressed eucalyptus bagasse, for burning and heating. Regionally, the battery-powered car also has a use, and should be encouraged. When I was a child, all the Light [Company] maintenance was done with battery-powered cars. They have a limited range of action, but they do perfectly well for local traffic. Finally, synthetic fuel can be used in trucks. The only problem with synthetic gas is the loss of power. And let's not forget solar energy. It is not the answer for Sao Paulo, a polluted city, but it could answer the needs of a farm or a country house. We are already accomplishing a miracle with the partial application of all these measures: we have reduced consumption from 950,000 barrels to 880,000 barrels of imported oil per day. To these 70,000 barrels we should add the 80,000 barrels which represent the theoretical increase in demand. We are therefore doing without 150,000 barrels of imported oil per day, which is an exceptional figure. At over $30 per barrel...

[Question] Many areas meant for green crops and legumes and for grazing are apparently being turned into sugar cane plantations. Doesn't this tend to reduce the food supply and add to inflation?

[Answer] The food supply actually increased last year. What will inevitably happen is that new areas will open up, and the frontiers will be pushed back. Beef cattle farming, for example, will probably move north into Mato Grosso or Goias, or Para.

[Question] Alcohol production will increase year by year, reaching an estimated 10.7 billion liters in 1986, enough to save only about 170,000 barrels of petroleum per day, but what about the huge gasoline-powered fleet in this country with over 8 million vehicles?

[Answer] People who have gas-powered cars will have to drive less.

[Question] Then there will be a privileged class of people with alcohol-powered cars...

[Answer] ...which will hasten production of alcohol and alcohol-powered cars. Brazil's most serious problem today is cooking gas, because the solutions are more promising in other areas. The natural substitutes would be coal and alcohol stoves, but the latter are not for now. A group has been appointed specifically to examine the problem of bottled gas.

[Question] How did Brazil become the first country in the world to introduce an alternative energy source--alcohol--for mass use?

[Answer] Brazil has a long tradition of sugar plantations. Other countries with the same climate are also thinking of going to alcohol. The addition of alcohol to gasoline is perfectly feasible.

[Question] The newspapers are reporting another gasoline price increase--52 cruzeiros per liter within this month.

[Answer] It is not true. There should be no changes before the end of the year, according to our information.

[Question] Considering all that has been done in the sector, considering the figures and the estimates, is Brazil a viable country with respect to energy?

[Answer] Certainly. Let's look at the figures. It costs $5.00 to extract a barrel of offshore oil today. To produce the equivalent of a barrel of oil from wood costs $1.00; charcoal, $2.00; alcohol, $4.50; coal, from $2.00 to $3.00. Each of these alternative sectors could provide a huge number of jobs. The face of Brazil is going to change. Rio Grande do Sul and Santa Catarina, for example, will benefit greatly from their coal, and so on. There will also be mass migration; it is inevitable. To oppose migration is simply bullheaded. You cannot leave a person to starve in the northeast when manpower is needed in the south. Today there is a manpower shortage in Mato Grosso; we will need manpower here for reforestation projects. It will be needed in the Amazon region. The Brazilian energy plan will not only resolve the nation's energy problem but it will be a great impetus for the economy. The plan will cost $7.5 billion by 1985, but it will result in a savings of $32 billion in petroleum. I said this many years ago: the energy crisis will only be good for Brazil. The trick is to turn a disadvantage into advantage, like a karate chop. I know there will be problems. Some agencies will have to be shaken up and some departments will have to meddle more, but it will work.

[Question] Don't you think it is pretty dangerous to stir up the middle class by imposing severe restrictions on petroleum consumption?

[Answer] Everyone will enjoy the benefits of the sacrifices imposed now. It won't do any good to sit comfortably in a leaking ship.

ABI-ACKEL SCORES OPPOSITION STAND ON DEMOCRATIZATION

Sao Paulo VISAO in Portuguese 15 Sep 80 pp 26-27

[Interview with Justice Minister Ibrahim Abi-Ackel; date and place not given]

[Text] "I am convinced that democracy is effective to defend itself from the aggression of terrorism," Justice Minister Ibrahim Abi-Ackel has told his government colleagues who suggest the establishment of an antiterrorist law as a response to the increasing attacks. "At the present time, we need culprits not new laws," asserts Abi-Ackel.

However, the minister does not ignore the fact that such a "law" is in the minds of President Joao Figueiredo's advisers. In any case, he prefers not to delve into the subject but to take care of the task the success of which is substantially connected with his ministry: "the consolidation of the opening process." According to him, paradoxically, the terrorist bombs have succeeded in awakening the awareness of the nation, transforming the opening--which was "originally a project of the executive branch"--into a yearning of society.

In an interview with reporters Fabio Mendes and Ruy Fabiano of VISAO, Abi-Ackel accuses the opposition of having remained aloof from the whole course of the opening process--from the revocation of the institutional acts to the amnesty vote.

[Question] Congressmen from the Social Democratic Party (PDS) speak of the need to establish a minimum program that will rally members of the opposition and of the government, within the framework of the congress, around institutional matters of common interest. What matters are those and is there anything concrete in that regard?

[Answer] My first difficulty is to precisely identify the term "institutional matters." I believe that lately there is no word that has been as trivialized as "institutional." So a minimum program of institutional matters will depend first of all on the definition of those matters. Otherwise, the field of discussion of Brazilian politics will remain undefined. In Brazil we suffer from an admirable semantic imprecision. Verbal concepts are mixed up to the point where distinct values end up being confused. And then discussion becomes impossible because of a lack of elementary conditions of logic. If there is an institutional matter in Brazil today, it is that of erecting a democratic regime. Of course, when one speaks of a democratic regime one also runs the risk of semantic imprecision.

There is no word in the history of mankind with more snares than the word democracy. But if we have a democratic commitment, it is necessary to fulfill it according to the country's peculiarities. And they advise to act gradually in order to insure the minimal effectiveness of our task.

We now have an amendment in congress that in large part restores parliamentary prerogatives and another that reestablishes direct elections for governors and all of the senate. Both pertain very closely to a system of freedom and lead to the replacement of a system of government still marked by the vestiges of arbitrariness by another that allows one to breath the air of freedom with responsibility. Of all those structures, the most important one seems to me to be the one that reestablishes the direct election of governors because it will bring about practical, more immediate consequences. It will always be precarious to try to organize a party if the elections that may lead it into power are not near or one cannot be sure of them. From the moment the rule of direct vote is inserted into the constitution, the whole political metabolism of the country will change. We will, thereby, be putting into motion something practical, compatible with effectiveness. Then the dynamics of the political process will pick up speed appropriate to erection of the other institutions that will crown the democratic edifice.

[Question] And isn't there any concern about defining the political-philosophical content of the system?

[Answer] Politically, democracy as representative as possible; philosophically, man as the object of all the gains of civilization and of the activity of government. As for ideology, we do not need it to resolve our problems. We need clear-thinking and moral courage. Ideology is childishness, a limitation; more than shortsightedness, it is blindness. The world is multiple, varied, surprising; it changes coloration from one moment to another; it contains challenges every minute. Therefore, its problems cannot be resolved by prescriptions prescribed by individuals who have not had any contact with mankind for a century, because they have been dead almost that long. That is what we call ideologies. I hope to God we will not have any.

[Answer] Paradoxically, following the bomb attacks, because of the revulsion they aroused, the nation for the first time has risen in favor of the opening. Until then, it constituted a project of the government, of the executive branch. Although the opposition demands everything very quickly, it has never contributed with a single vote in order for the opening to proceed, even slowly. The opposition refused to vote on amnesty, party reform--which gave a chance and a voice to countless political currents bound in the straitjacket of bipartisanship, the reform of the judiciary (when Senator Trancredo Neves, with the vision of a statement, alerted his colleagues to the risks of that attitude), etc. But despite that, the opening proceeded, although perceived in Brazilian society in a diffused way. In the face of the attacks, it met with the unanimous expression of the people, without distinction of party. From being a project of the government, it became a project of society, a national aspiration.

[Question] The reform of the constitution is announced as one of the principal stages of the "opening." Will this be done through the present congress or the one that will be elected in 1982?

[Answer] There is as yet no government decision in that regard. Therefore, I am voicing a personal opinion. I believe it is advisable that the reform be made after 1982. Although I have the greatest respect for the present members of the congress, I am obliged to recognize that it is the product of an artificial bipartisanship that restricted and impoverished political debate. The present congress was formed at a time when political activity was in quarantine, without the collaboration of emerging leaders, not to mention that, since amnesty had not yet been promulgated, there were personalities still outside the country who, on their return, demonstrated great electoral vigor. For all those reasons, the congress to be elected in 1982 seems to me to be much more contemporaneous with the Brazilian situation because it will be the product of an election under the aegis of a multiparty system. Since the constitutional reform is something that must be made to last, why do it now if it is going to be upset by a much more authentic and current national representation in 1982?

[Answer] Because the constituent assembly is an act of power. There are no limits to its competence. The moment it is installed, all power is transferred to it. A new social pact is drawn up according to the will of its majority. And that does not exist in political practice. A constituent assembly emerges by convocation of a power that controls it, in order to legitimize itself. Or else it emerges as an imperative at a moment when one regime is voided and it is replaced by another. But power that considers itself legitimate and has a parliamentary majority through which it can operate all the constitutional modifications it deems necessary (except of the republic and the federation) will only convene a constituent assembly if it wants to dispose of that power.

[Answer] I believe it is very unlikely that the government will not obtain a majority in 1982. But that is a risk. And do not be deceived. If the majority in 1982 falls into the hands of another political group--which will then have gained power--it will no longer want a constituent assembly. It wants it now because it is a minority and does not hold power. When it does, it will no longer want it. The opposition wants to gain power by an act of grace on the part of the president of the republic, who would transfer all his power to the constituent assembly. I do not believe those propositions are compatible with reality.

[Question] With regard to terrorism, why do the government security organs--which demonstrated enormous efficiency in fighting the radicals of the left--now encounter so many obstacles in identifying the radicals of the so-called right?

[Answer] In the first place, I cannot say if those attacks are from the right or the left. As minister of justice, I can only make statements of that kind based at least on clues. And I do not have them. At the same time, I am not in a position to say if the authorities were very effective when those acts were practiced by the left. It will be recalled that at that time, it was not a matter of sabotage or terrorism. The country was plunged into an open war. Nobody hid his identity and the acts were practiced in the light of day by armed persons, clearly identified. Hostages were taken and messages were transmitted. Today we are facing something very sophisticated, such as plastic explosives sent by mail. In any case, I can say, although at this point words may not be worth anything, that everything possible is being done to identify the culprits.

[Question] Was the present wave of terror foreseen as part of the turmoil that the "opening" would encounter, as predicted by President Figueiredo himself?

[Answer] I do not know. I am not in a position to interpret the thinking of the president of the republic when he made that statement. What I can say is that no opening process has been carried out without turmoil. The resumption of the democratic process, wherever it occurs, always goes through a period of turmoil.

[Question] Do you believe that that process of terrorism will spread?

[Answer] That is impossible to foresee. What I can say is that those responsible for the opening process were very wise in wanting it to be slow, gradual and sure. If slow, as it is accused of being, it still arouses reaction of that nature, imagine what would have happened to our country, with an acknowledged difficult economy, if the portals of the opening had been opened wide all at once.

PMDB HEAD BACKS FIGUEIREDO ANTITERRORIST CAMPAIGN

Rio De Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 18 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] Brasilia--The president of the Brazilian Democratic Movement Party (PMDB), Deputy Ulysses Guimaraes, yesterday expressed the support of his party for President Joao Figueiredo in fighting terrorism, in a speech in which he also severely criticized the political-economic-social model and advocated the convocation of a constituent assembly and direct voting for all elective offices. The statement was made at the conclusion of the meeting of founders of the PMDB in the Nereu Ramos auditorium of the Chamber of Deputies.

"Either President Joao Batista Figueiredo defeats terrorism or he will be defeated by it. He has our support in that challenge and in that action because we will either put an end to terrorism or terrorism will put an end to all of us. If punishment is not forthcoming or is delayed, the impunity will set off more bombs against the authority of the president of the republic," Ulysses said.

The president of the PMDB condemned "savage capitalism," declaring also that "the Brazilian social pyramid is set on its apex" and warned about the high inflation rates and the foreign debt level. He advocated free union organization and called for revocation of the present national security law which, in his view, impedes the demands of the workers. In the political area, he reiterated the PMDB's intention not to accept district voting and to fight the subslate [sublegenda] and the Falcao law.

Note

During the almost 3-hour meeting, the leader in the Chamber of Deputies, Deputy Freitas Nobre, read a note prepared by party leaders, condemning "the government's lack of objectivity in discovering the perpetrators of the terrorist attacks that have occurred in this country."

The document states that "the government has lost control of the situation in the economic area," referring to inflation, credit difficulties for small and medium business and the "concentration of wealth in the hands of a few," as well as the "denationalization and extreme dependence of the economy."

Read by Freitas Nobre on behalf of the parliamentary bloc, the note aroused the reaction of some parliamentarians, such as Deputy Jose Costa (Alagoas): "There was no discussion and the thing was thrown at us in the plenary session for our approval. It seems like a government thing."

The other speakers at the meeting were Deputy Iranildo Pereira (Ceara); Senator Orestes Quercia (Sao Paulo); former Minister Almino Afonso; Alencar Furtado, former leader of the defunct Brazilian Democratic Movement (MDB); and former Governor Miguel Arraes, who declared that the "government insists on trying to resolve the problems of the nation through private office talks and by pacifying spirits when what should be done is to talk to the people."

Joining

At the meeting, Senator Leite Chaves (Para), formalized his entry into the PMDB, being greeted by the party leader in the senate, Paulo Brossard. Elected in 1974 for the then MDB, Leite Chaves, after the party reform, joined the political group of former Governor Leonel Brizola and after the loss of the Brazilian Labor Party (PTB) party label, resorted to the Supreme Electoral Tribunal but without success. He also tried to get an agreement between the Brizola group and the group of Ivete Vargas but also without success and has now joined the PMDB.

Following is the note of the PMDB

The PMDB reaffirms the commitment of its program: it is a mass party that is not restricted to its parliamentary activity. It will be constantly active and not only during election periods. It will be present in society, everywhere where men live and work.

In order to respond to that task, we have convened our comrades for the work of party organization which involves a broad discussion of our program plans and statutes, a membership effort and the holding of municipal conventions on 12 October, state conventions on 23 November and the national convention on 7 December.

This organized and operating party is the instrument of the people to operate the democratic transition and achieve power.

The MDB yesterday and the PMDB today have repeatedly denounced the dramatic crisis that traumatizes society, the economy, the institutions, in short, the country.

The government has lost control of the situation in the economic area. The promises to contain inflation have been belied by the facts: the annual rates have more than doubled, resulting in an intolerable rise in the cost of living. Credit difficulties fall on small and medium business, making them unviable and concentrating wealth in the hands of a few. The economic model, responsible for the denationalization of the economy, has failed and is even aggravated by the world crisis, owing to the extreme foreign dependence to which we have been led. The doors of the country have been opened wide to multinational groups on the presumption that they would come and resolve our problems and not drain the major part of the effort of the community. The proof lies in the irresponsible indebtedness of the country: 72 percent of 1979 exports went to pay for capital income, interest, profits, dividends, technology and services. In order to maintain foreign credit, the process of turning over Brazil to the foreign groups is being intensified, from our land to our forests and our mountains filled with minerals.

Along that course, Brazil does not develop but rather becomes more and more impoverished, dissipating its resources.

The regime committed to those interests does not want and does not have the power to introduce changes capable of lessening our difficulties. Its plan having failed, it seeks to gain time in the political area with diversionary maneuvers.

The opposition stand of the PMDB is not due to intransigence against persons or groups nor to a revanchist spirit. It is based on the vision of Brazil which is contrary to that of the current government leaders.

The PMDB believes in the resources of Brazil and the strength of the work of the Brazilians. It proclaims the certainty that we have everything to be a great nation, free and respected, and that we have a right to have a capable government, elected by the people, that will promote development on behalf of all.

The nation is tired of the authoritarianism that unsurped its popular sovereignty and imposed on it a regime of exception, administrative incompetence, social injustice, juridical casuistry, unbridled corruption and arrogant voluntarism.

Even now, insensitive to what is happening in the country, two parallel propositions emerge from within the regime that aim at power for the sake of power: one, from the present governing authorities who seek to hold it indefinitely and to institutionalize authoritarianism under the name of "opening plan"; the other, from its extreme right, wants a return to absolute dictatorship, economic recession and social oppression. Both are in agreement in their aversion for the people, the vote and freedoms. Both are unacceptable.

Pursuing domination, those two propositions confront one another in a veritable "internal war" that transforms us all into victims.

On the one hand, terrorism, thus far unpunished, disturbs the nation, to divert it from the course of restoration of its representative institutions. At the same time that we repudiate its acts, we offer our solidarity with all the organizations and individuals who are the victims of violence.

On the other hand, the aggression against the will of the people, with the cruelty of the extension of the terms of mayors and councilmen; with diversionary trials against militant deputies; with the emasculation of the legislative branch, denying it decisive authority and making apology for laziness and omission through the approval of bills by reason of the expiration of time periods, of which the foreigners statute is an example; with the maintenance of abusive staff perquisites, which make mockery of a needy people; with the beating, arrest and indictment of workers and union leaders; with the threat of new coupist initiatives in the electoral process.

Lost in its own internal crisis and engaged in maneuvers to remain in power, the government has abrogated its authority and its responsibilities. The nation expects it to begin to assume them, courageously combating the terrorists who attack innocent victims, by promoting a serious investigation and the identification and exemplary punishment of the culprits. The nation demands the immediate dismantling of the apparatus of repression established to guarantee the authoritarian state and incompatible with the democratic system.

The PMDB is fighting for a system in which there will prevail unswerving respect for democratic freedoms, for the rights of man and the citizen, and the existential needs of all Brazilians. Together, all the forces of the people, we will win.

This is an undertaking that belongs to everyone and that will serve everyone. To achieve that tomorrow, it is necessary to put an end to the hostility against the worthy action of the Church on behalf of the poor and the oppressed; to the national security law as it is conceived; to current union legislation which bars the right to strike, and the autonomy and freedom of unions and associations; to the systematic persecution of the students, especially their right to organize into the National Students Union (UNE); and to the Falcao law. It is necessary also to establish direct elections for all governing offices, including for president of the republic; the guarantee of public and individual freedoms; the prohibition here and now of the practice of successive manipulations of the electoral system, which defraud the will of the people, transforming minorities into majorities.

The present national situation does not allow for inaction or perplexity. Peace will not be gained in private office deals, nor will national union be achieved by collusion between leaders of the opposition and the government. For us, peace and power come from the people and from their authentic expression.

The PMDB trusts in the great and real national dialog that will take place as a popular and democratic achievement in an atmosphere of complete freedom and broad discussion through the free and sovereign National Constituent Assembly.

Ulysses Speech

Following are the main points of the speech:

Opposition is inevitable because mistakes are inevitable in any government. The opposition must not presume itself to be prophetic nor should the government promote itself as wise and infallible. The government governs and the opposition opposes; that is a truism that is always cited but not always practiced. To oppose responsibly is not subversion. Subversion is to threaten, persecute, ban, seduce the opposition or seek to manage it.

The fight against the arbitrary regime is tough, unequal and dangerous. Words are the weapon of the opposition and force is the reaction of tyranny. The PMDB is a party with a memory. It has not forgotten its past; it is not ashamed of its name.

Goncalves Dias' song is its own:

"Our errant Indian roams,
And wherever he goes,
He bears the bones of his people."

Wherever it goes, the PMDB bears the sacrifice of its victims and its persecuted, represented by three leaders in congress whose mandates were terminated: Mario Covas, Martins Rodrigues and Alencar Furtado.

The PMDB bears the bones of its martyrs, such as those of Deputy Rubens Paiva and the journalist Wladmir Herzog. It bears them not for revenge but because the dead watch and guide the living.

A nation without democracy is a nation without policy. Arbitrariness is not policy, by definition. Because it is power without people, frequently exercised against the people and in favor of the privileged. Brazil will really only have policy following a National Constituent Assembly.

The PMDB wants the National Constituent Assembly to elect and to transform. To elect in addition to those who already are elected, the president of the republic, the governors, all the senators and all the mayors. Only society can confer mandates. Only the vote confers representation. Without representation, there is no legitimacy and without legitimacy there is no credibility. That is the cause of Brazil's crisis.

The PMDB won the 1974 and 1978 elections by majority vote but it lost the government of the nation and of many states through usurpation.

In order for the government and its submissive majority to be respected, they must first respect themselves. They complain about what they hear but they forget what they do. As a reaction of legitimate defense, the violence of words, if it does exist, wounds and destroys much less than the violence of the falsity of so-called indirect elections; of the party sublabel [sublegenda] and the Falcao law, which stages the election farce without information; of the mutilization of the federation and the popular sovereignty of the senate by the invasion of a horde of "bionic" senators; of the demolition of the building and the nonrecognition of the UNE, lavishing money for staff perquisites and massive projects and withholding funds for enrollments, professors and university expansion; of national security being the insecurity of workers who fight for better salaries, with union autonomy defiled by intervention and its best leaders arrested or tried; of the crushing of business, especially small and medium business, by foreign capital and by interest rates of up to 20 percent per month; of the astronomical inflation of 107 percent which the people pay by earning less, spending more to eat less, and threatened with unemployment; of the solvency and promptness of Brazil as a debtor depending on the clemency of international creditors because of the huge and foolhardy foreign debt; of the attacks, which thus far have gone unpunished, against the Church, the Brazilian Bar Association, the free circulation of the press and the headquarters of political parties and congressmen.

What destabilizes the Brazilian social pyramid is the fact that it is set on its apex, in which the minority concentrates the great majority of the resources. How can a building that madly persists in balancing itself on its point and not on its base fail to topple?

God created labor, it was man who invented capital. It is written in the bible that man was placed on earth ut operaretur, that is, "to work it." God, thereby, wanted to free man from slavery or death by starvation, the cold, wild beasts, bad weather, sickness or ignorance. God did not want to free him from the slavery of nature to condemn him to the slavery of other men. Therefore, first labor, then capital. Without labor as the cause, there is no capital as effect; therefore, the state that does not recognize the priority treatment of labor is not fulfilling its primary duty, which is to do justice, according to Ihering's wise teaching.

The constituent assembly is a process of struggle to resolve the viscera and guts of savage capitalism, which kills more than wars and epidemics; it is genocide or a crime against humanity.

It is opportune here and now to denounce the elitist and census-like process premeditatedly designed to create parties in Brazil. The arbitrary regime sought to aristocratize them like closed clubs, guarded by a formal, costly, diffuse and boorish bureaucracy. A party is not a registry of notes and certificates for registration and the acknowledgment of identification certificates, dates, six signatures, sureties, numbers, concurrences, name of father and mother, in short, the tiresome and costly repetition of the election certificate. A party is a house-raising by the people to build the house of the people. It is the will and not the paperwork that binds the citizen to the party.

The PMDB abhors terrorism. Terrorism is against the state, whether it is of the left or the right. It destroys the security of society, therefore, of man. Either President Joao Batista Figueiredo defeats terrorism or he will be defeated by it. He has our support in that challenge and in that action because we will either put an end to terrorism or terrorism will put an end to all of us. If punishment is not forthcoming or is delayed, the impunity will set off more bombs against the authority of the president of the republic.

The PMDB proclaims that it is working for the speedy approval of the constitutional amendment that restores to the states the right which the federation bestows on them, of electing their governors by direct vote; a personal vote, therefore, without spurious intermediation, and for all elected offices; a secret and universal vote, without the odious discrimination against the illiterate--that is the popular and social pact of the PMDB.

The district vote is more vulnerable to economic power because the pond can become contaminated but not the ocean. The proportional system is the flexible and sensitive mold for a country undergoing daily transformation, with more people in the city than in the country, more babies being born than the number of old people living, industry rivaling agriculture in the creation of resources for consumption and export, in which the illiterate is no longer ignorant, through the miracle of radio, television and the movies.

The time has come for definition, therefore, the time of risk. There are times when the greatest risk is not to assume the risk of definition.

The terrible risk of Brazil is to have a people without policy and a policy without people or against the people. The popular, representative and historical identification of society with the state is the sociological imperative of the PMDB. That identification lies in the world of the National Constituent Assembly.

As for myself, as president of the party label of hope, but of hope with urgency for the despairing and the deprived, I pray to God that I may have the courage to act, even at the risk of erring in the belief of serving it, instead of the cowardice of being remiss out of fear of offending it.

RICE, OTHER CROP PRODUCTION NOT EXPECTED TO COVER LOSSES

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 5 Oct 80 p 54

[Article by Jorge Rosa]

[Text] Except for corn and beans, the area's agricultural products offer the government very little assurance because of the risk of climatic variations. Rice is the most worrisome inasmuch as domestic production is expected to reach a maximum of 9.8 million tons next year compared with 9,637,700 tons this year, an increase of 2 percent, which is less than the population's sluggish growth rate. Corn is also a cause for concern, since, even if domestic production reaches 24.5 million tons, the balance between supply and demand will leave little room for possible price stability. As for stocks, the status of corn is even more critical than that of rice; initial rice stocks are estimated at 1,267,700 tons, while those of corn will be only 5,500 tons, and this only as a result of imports which will reach 1 million tons by the end of the year. The consumption of corn, which amounted to 17.7 million tons in 1979, increased to 20.5 million tons this year and is expected to reach 24 million tons next year, if aviculture continues at its current growth rate.

In the opinion of government experts, agriculture has reached its production limit if current restrictions on credits for investment are maintained. According to their explanation, that trend is easily verified by increases foreseen in the planted area of the 1980-1981 harvest, since we are now seeing competition among the various crops. Most of the increase in the area planted in corn comes from a corresponding decrease in area planted in soybeans or, stated in another way, corn has spread over the area which would have been used to expand the soybean crop. That procedure varies among the various south-central states which produce crops and also from crop to crop. For example, in Mato Grosso do Sul the area planted in soybeans is expected to increase more than that planted in corn, but there will be a reduction in rice planting.

In the opinion of the experts, to obtain meaningful growth in agricultural production in the future, investments will be necessary both to expand the agricultural frontier and improve the technological efficiency of the producers of the traditional areas. This means more funds for treating the soil with lime, fertilizing, purchasing machinery for deforestation, clearing brush, harrowing, plowing, planting and land improvement in general. For example, official surveys indicate that the number of farm workers per hectare has decreased compared with the previous harvest.

MORE THAN 4 MILLION TONS OF WHEAT TO BE IMPORTED IN 1981

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 5 Oct 80 p 54

[Article by Jorge Rosa: "Agricultural Production Will Not Cover Losses"]

[Text] Brasilia--The loss of 700,000 tons of the current wheat crop (to be consumed next year) brought about by frost and the probable stabilization of consumption at the present level of 6.8 million tons will force the country to import 4.4 million tons of wheat in 1981, representing an expenditure of at least $1 billion, according to a forecast made by Humberto Garofalo, director of CTRIN [National Wheat Marketing Enterprise]--the Bank of Brazil's Wheat Department. "This year we shall have to import 4.39 million tons at a total cost of $960 million," he said.

Meanwhile, a possible expansion of the conflict in the Middle East could substantially alter that forecast, even assuming the worst possible outcome (in case of an exaggerated increase in quotations and freight costs) where the government would not import wheat in 1981 but would be forced to use substitutes. However, that hypothesis is considered by the experts to be more a matter of discussion than reality.

The gradual withdrawal of subsidies (since August 1980, when this procedure was initiated, wheat has already gone up 110 percent and is scheduled for another price change on 20 October) does not point to a reduction in consumption; at best, it denotes its stabilization. Nevertheless, the granting of subsidies has essentially been the determining factor in the rising curve of the country's wheat consumption.

In the past 10 years, the demand for wheat has risen 120 percent, the per capita consumption increasing from 33.18 kg in 1970 to about 50 kg this year--an annual growth rate of 4.6 percent compared with a 2.7 percent population growth in that same period. At the end of this year, wheat will still be sold at a price equivalent to slightly more than 22 percent of its actual cost; under these circumstances, the wheat account will close with a deficit of 60 to 65 billion cruzeiros. Next year, imported wheat, which presently costs 13,288.80 cruzeiros per ton, is expected to increase to 20,000 cruzeiros; domestic wheat will reach a maximum of 13,325.00 cruzeiros.

New Forecast

Without the September frosts (in the past 45 years frosts occurred only in 1979 and 1980), Brazilian production might have reached 3.6 million tons; based on the loss shown by the survey, CTRIN estimates the crop to be about 2.9 to 3 million tons, after deducting the necessary quantity for seeding, would leave a net of about 2.4 million tons. Based on current foreign prices ($190 per ton) and freight costs ($42 per ton), the import of 4.4 million additional tons would cost a little more than $1 billion.

If forecasts of agricultural production made by the Production Financing Commission (CFP) for the 1980-1981 crop prove to be correct, the government will have a strong ally in the fight against inflation inasmuch as no serious problems are expected regarding domestic supply. However, there is great concern about possible weather instability and its effect on the rice, corn and bean crops, which would force the government to turn to the international market for new imports. This is due to the fact that estimated production levels, including soybeans, will not be high enough to offset possible losses and also because initial stocks will be precariously low.

That picture also reveals that neither increases nor income are expected from the export of soybeans and their derivatives inasmuch as production is expected to increase a maximum of 4 percent and may even decrease by 0.5 percent. In the opinion of government experts, the prospect of a 10 percent increase in the grain supply next year, which would mean a harvest of 56 million tons, shows that the agricultural sector has reached its limit of expansion just with defrayal credit. To achieve better results in the 1981-1982 harvest, the government will be forced to release funds for investments to promote agricultural expansion, particularly in the pioneer areas of Minas Gerais, southern Goias and Mato Grosso do Sul. According to the experts, gains in productivity will be possible only over the long term.

Based on intentions to plant, as observed in the principal producing areas of the south-central region, the CFP estimate will be revised monthly, and only from December on will the figures be more reliable inasmuch as the crops will actually be planted by that time. The only degree of uncertainty will be that contained in estimates regarding winter crops, such as wheat, oats, rye, barley and sunflower, planted from May 1980 on. In forecasting a supply of 56 million tons of grain in 1981 compared with 50.8 million this year, the CFP included the production of the winter crops using this year's harvest for calculation purposes only. However, those crops are not expected to alter the forecast very much, since they are crops which cannot be expressed in terms of production. Except for wheat, with a harvest of 3 million tons this year, the other products calculated (oats, rye, barley and sunflower) yielded only 269,700 tons of grain.

Despite the government's great effort to increase agricultural production by granting credits for agricultural payments beyond the normal time limit and maintaining minimum prices readjusted above the inflation rate, the growth in the grain supply can hardly be considered normal. Minister of Agriculture Amaury Stabile was expecting it to be at least 13 percent while hoping it would be 20 percent. In terms of area planted it is estimated that the 1980-1981 crop will show an increase of 4.5 percent comprising the sox principal agricultural products (cotton, peanuts, rice, beans, soybeans and corn).

Again in terms of area, it is expected that corn will show an increase of 10 to 16 percent raising the area planted to 10,501,000 or 11,032,300 hectares. With regard to soybeans, the area could decrease 3 percent or even increase 1 percent, the total cultivated area varying between 8,470,400 and 8,882,900 hectares; beans (a watery crop) are expected to have a cultivated area of 1,971,600 to 2,079,700 hectares, an increase of 5 to 10 percent. With regard to rice, the planted area may decrease 3 percent or increase 3 percent, giving a total of 4,701,400 to 4,980,600 hectares. According to initial estimates, the cultivated area of cotton may increase from 1 to 7 percent, occupying a total of 879,100 to 924,200 hectares. The planted area of peanuts will show a drastic decrease, the reduction varying between 31 and 22 percent, and the total area ranging between 159,200 and 181,000 hectares.

Production Developments of Certain Products in the South-Central Region

Product	Amount of Harvest (Tons)	Percentage Variation
Cotton	447,100 to 472,400	- 0.2 to + 5.0
Peanuts	274,600 to 312,500	-29.0 to -19.0
Rice	7,714,300 to 8,114,900	- 1.0 to + 4.0
Corn	22,295,200 to 23,414,900	+16.0 to +20.0
Soybeans	14,824,700 to 15,529,200	- 0.5 to + 4.0
Beans	1,309,400 to 1,379,000	+31.0 to +38.0 (a watery crop)

BRAZILIAN INTERVIEWS PINOCHET ON FOREIGN, DOMESTIC ISSUES

Rio de Janeiro MANCHETE in Portuguese 11 Oct 80 pp 148-149

[Interview with Augusto Pinochet, president of Chile, by Francisco Augusto do Nascimento, in Santiago, date not given]

[Text] On winning a convincing victory in the September plebiscite, President Augusto Pinochet granted MANCHETE an exclusive interview at the Palacio Diego Portales in Santiago. Reporting that his country is awaiting with great interest President Joao Figueiredo's visit to Chile, Pinochet spoke of the importance of relations between the two countries. The success of his government's economic policy, which has brought inflation down from 1,000 to 25 percent, was also stressed during the interview. The following is the full text of the Chilean president's interview with MANCHETE.

[Question] How do you view President Joao Figueiredo's visit to Chile?

[Answer] I attribute special significance to President Figueiredo's visit to Chile. The Chileans' traditional affection for the brother people of Brazil is well known. Moreover, this friendship is a factor that has had very positive repercussions among countries throughout Latin America. It is common knowledge that our continent has witnessed several events indicating a new political reality. Insofar as the states in the region evidence a determination to strengthen the spirit of Latin American unity, we will be carrying out the task imposed by our liberators. In this context, we see the coming Chilean visit of Brazil's highest elected officer as a way of consolidating traditional ties, which offers promising prospects for mutual collaboration between our peoples.

[Answer] Our relations could be described as excellent. One indication of this is the extraordinary visit his excellency, Joao Figueiredo, president of Brazil, will pay to our country. This visit will constitute a milestone in our centuries-old friendship, and will reaffirm the close ties of all kinds that unite us.

[Answer] Our trade increased by about 48 percent in the course of 1979, reaching $745 million. This means that Brazil currently stands third among the world's major trading partners with Chile, after the United States and the FRG. During 1979 our exports reached $383.7 million, an increase of 48 percent over 1978. Chilean imports from Brazil reached $361.8 million, an increase of 47 percent. Corresponding statistics for January-July 1980 indicate that bilateral trade reached a figure of $521.1 million, an increase of 33 percent over the same period last year. All this demonstrates the dynamism of our trade, and points to an even more promising future.

[Question] How could trade between our two countries be intensified?

[Answer] Currently, the major Chilean products for export to Brazil are, in order of importance, copper and its byproducts, titanium, vanadium and molybdenum ores, newsprint, cellulose, barley and saltpeter. From Brazil, we import automobiles, steel tubing, tractors, soybean oil, motors, chassis, bicycles, sugar, etc. The possibility of expanding bilateral trade depends to an important extent on the degree to which both economies open up, and on their growth rate overall. Still, it is not hard to conclude that trade will continue to grow freely in the future, in view of the broad dimensions of Brazil's foreign trade, the fact that our economies are complementary, and our geographic proximity, which facilitates the natural integration of the two economies. For our part, we are in a position to expand our exports with minerals, lumber, fish, agroindustrial products and seasonal farm produce. On its part, Brazil could sell Chile capital goods, rolling stock, automobiles and agricultural products.

[Question] To what extent could President Figueiredo's visit contribute to closer Chilean-Brazilian relations?

[Answer] In addition to constituting a historic event of unequaled and singular transcendence for the consolidation of Chilean-Brazilian friendship, the presence of his excellency, President Joao Figueiredo, in Chile presents a very welcome and important opportunity to intensify our personal relationship, which will certainly be advantageous for the two countries. We will be able to review our entire, and very rich, relationship and exchange views on the major international and regional issues, searching for ways of accentuating areas of agreement in the actions of the two nations, and of giving new impetus to collaboration between Chile and Brazil.

[Answer] We have a legitimate right, as a sovereign nation, to resolve our internal affairs without submitting to any foreign pressure or action. This principle has always been a part of our history, and we must never renounce it. We understand the pressure, and we recognize the problem that adverse international political opinion represents. Nonetheless, we are deeply convinced that our action is legitimate. Moreover, this adverse opinion is not consistent with an objective evaluation of our internal situation, but only with the internal political stands to which those who denigrate us are committed. On the other hand, the international financial circles that base their opinions on objective facts, and proceed in serious fashion, have recognized our success, and their disinterested support is an indication of the real aims that motivate our detractors.

[Question] Briefly, could you describe Chile's current economic and financial situation?

[Answer] Today Chile has completely sound economy, with a balanced budget and decreasing inflation, which has declined from 1,000 percent in 1973 to about 25 percent, the figure estimated for this year. We also have a dynamic foreign section and a growing investment rate, factors that have permitted a growth in the GNP of about 40 percent from 1976 to 1980. With respect to our international financial situation, I must report that our foreign exchange reserves are now the highest in the history of Chile, totaling about $2.6 billion on 30 June 1980. All this has made Chile a country trusted by the international financial community to the point that the flow of foreign credit (which was $262 million in June) totaled $959 million in the first 6 months of this year, with much more favorable interest and term conditions.

[Answer] The government is now engaged in carrying out a plan which we have designated the Seven Modernizations, the goal of which is to reform the most important areas in the nation's life: agriculture, labor, welfare, health, government administration, justice and education. Regarding agriculture, we are carrying out a process of cleaning up false or nonexistent property titles, and this government is handing over the respective property titles to the peasants in the sector affected by agrarian reform, thus carrying out an aspiration long held by all the workers. In the labor area we have implemented a combination of standards establishing collective bargaining as the major tool for improving the workers' income. This has eliminated state intervention in labor disputes, the equitable settlement of which is left to the employers and the workers. Regarding the right to strike, which fully exists, the necessary machinery was created to prevent it from being abused, or from being used in a way detrimental to the consumer masses who are not involved in such disputes. Complete democracy in the choice of elected union leaders is also guaranteed by the free and secret vote of the union membership. Freedom to join or resign from a union organization is also recognized. We are about to implement a new welfare law, recognizing the workers' right to freely administer their own savings, offering them feasible investment options and thus promoting an effective social security system.

I would also like to mention two projects of singular importance that we are carrying out. One is construction of a southern highway that will take in several large zones of the country, which were once virtually beyond communication with the rest of our national territory. We are also about to begin the Colbun-Machicura project, a hydroelectric complex of primary importance--the largest in the country--to use our energy potential in an economic and modern way.

[Question] When will Chile's institutional life return completely to normal?

[Answer] By virtue of the recent ratification of the Political Constitution of the State, starting in March 1981 our country will go into a stage of transition to an effective democracy. This phase will last for 8 years, at the end of which time the Chilean people should elect the president of the republic and hold parliamentary elections. At that point the new institutional democracy provided in the constitution will be fully in effect and hence the goals established by the military government will have been met, but it should be reiterated that the constitution will be fully in effect on 11 March 1981, with the exception of the provisions for elections and partisan political activity, which will come later.

[Question] What is the status of the Beagle Channel litigation?

[Answer] One point should be clarified first. The dispute between Chile and Argentina, which was submitted to his holiness, John Paul II, for mediation, has to do with the jurisdictional boundaries in the southern zone, and not with the Beagle Channel. The delineation of that channel was effected by arbitration of her majesty, the queen of England, on 2 May 1977, and is fully valid. The mediation is at a particularly important stage. On conclusion of the informative phase, in which the parties delivered to the mediator all the precendents on which their respective positions are based, we passed to active negotiations, which involved a search for existing points of agreement between the parties. Now there is intensive work to reach an agreement based on the guidelines forwarded to the parties by the representative of his holiness.

[Answer] By common agreement, Chile and Argentina sought the mediation of the Holy Father, in implementing one of the forms of peaceful solution of disputes in international law. Moreover, on 8 January 1979, in Montevideo, the two countries signed a commitment not to resort to the threat or use of force in their relations. Let me add that the presence of his holiness is not only a guarantee of peace, but constitutes a moral court of the highest authority one could hope for. This is why the Chilean Government has emphatically reiterated its confidence in his holiness, Pope John Paul II.

CARTER AID TO NICARAGUA PRAISED, SEEN AS POLITICAL REALISM

San Jose LA NACION in Spanish 20 Sep 80 p 14A

[Editorial: "The American Loan to Nicaragua"]

[Text] In agreeing after much hesitation to lend Nicaragua $75 million, U.S. President Jimmy Carter has shown political realism. At the same time, this act reflects confidence in the individuals now striving to help the Nicaraguan regime advance toward democratic pluralism and impede the spread of subversion on the continent.

Although necessary in the case of a government system which has not been totally defined, caution should not be stressed to the extent that it becomes counterproductive. Not granting the Nicaraguan Reconstruction Junta the loan might have had the effect of unnecessarily polarizing attitudes and inducing the Managuan government to succumb to the temptation of throwing itself completely into the arms of the Soviets, which some of its members are striving to do at present.

The junta is repeating ad nauseam that it wants to have good relations with every country in the world and will gladly accept aid from any of them as long as there are no strings attached. Such an attitude is worthy and patriotic, provided it deals with the world's various ideological blocs on an equal basis and does not use a different measuring stick for each one.

The Nicaraguan regime is presently being carefully watched by history, since it remains to be seen whether the criterion of independence will be uniformly maintained. Any tipping of the scale might cause Nicaragua to fall into one form of imperialism to avoid another. That would detract from the nationalist doctrine which Scandinism claims as its own.

In addition, just as the United States did not impose conditions in granting Nicaragua the loan--because those conditions would have been flatly refused it would also be disloyal for Nicaragua to use the American money, or money from any other Western source, to finance the edification of Marxist structures or strengthen the military power of the small Central American nation.

What Nicaragua needs is economic reconstruction and, in many instances, ordinary construction, since in many places the country was completely abandoned by the previous regime. One need only observe how people lived in towns like Masaya or its native suburb of Monimbo.

Not only the United States but also other countries of the so-called free world which agree to help Nicaragua financially want to see that nation reemerge as a nation, not as a new base within the political arena of blocs.

CONCERN EXPRESSED OVER SALVADORAN FDR MEETING IN COUNTRY

San Jose LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 21 Sep 80 p 6

[Editorial: "We Either Are or We Are Not"]

[Text] Our government is maintaining diplomatic relations with El Salvador's military-civilian junta, and the president of the republic and his minister of foreign affairs are taking advantage of this opportunity to reaffirm their support for the democratizing effort that junta is making for these kindred people. Despite what has been said, tomorrow, Monday, 22 September, at 1400 hours, in official quarters, namely the Legislative Assembly's Salon de Benemeritos, there will be "a meeting of youth and student organizations with El Salvador's Democratic Revolutionary Front [FDR]," one of the extremist groups which, with armed force, is trying to overthrow the governing body with which our government is maintaining diplomatic relations. Such an enormous incongruity could only occur in Costa Rica and in these times.

According to a press release we received, "This meeting will be attended by a delegation from El Salvador's FDR, delegations from the youth organizations of many countries throughout the world and Costa Rican youth and student organizations." We are all aware of the intensity of the color of those organizations, but we would make the same observation if their color was different. Costa Rica cannot sit idly by while a meeting of groups in conflict with governments with which we are maintaining diplomatic relations is being held in our midst and even in one of our government buildings.

Those who are proceeding in this manner, who are making state premises available for meetings of groups which have taken up arms against their own government, are the same individuals who later complain when our country is accused of being the focal point of Caribbean conspiracies.

It is high time for us to abandon the international risk-taking which is hurling us precipitously into the Caribbean maelstrom.

The people have a right to know the names of those who have made the Legislative Assembly auditoriums available to extremist groups meeting to create difficulties between Costa Rica and a country with which it is maintaining diplomatic, commercial and all other types of relations.

Let us assume for a moment that the situation were reversed, that public buildings in San Salvador were being made available for meetings of extremist groups which, at this precise moment, were taking up arms against their own government. Let us consider the reaction we would have and the feelings those acts would evoke in us. We have no reason to believe that the same would not happen with the Salvadorans, dozens of whom are being assasinated every day by the armed forces of this or that faction.

We are either neutral, or we are not. We are either democratic, or we are not. We either respect our international commitments, or we do not. We are either faithful to our agreement to maintain diplomatic relations with El Salvador's military-civilian junta, or we are not. To say one thing while weapons are being sent from here to the extremists and public buildings are being made available for their conspiracies can only result in our loss of standing in the eyes of the entire world and in our plunging headlong into the struggles of major world forces which are now considering our impoverished and weak Central America as their battleground.

Our reaction is not due to the fact that those who will meet tomorrow in one of our government buildings are communists. Our reaction would be the same if such a meeting involved rightist groups which are also carrying out assassinations in El Salvador. Our reaction is exclusively in defense of our country, our peace and our prestige.

CUBAN EXILE ASKS CARAZO, REAGAN TO HELP REFUGEES

PA061315 San Jose Radio Reloj in Spanish 0100 GMT 6 Nov 80

[Text] Cuban [exile] Leader Alfredo R. Fernandez Gomez who is touring several Latin American countries has asked President Rodrigo Carazo for aid to obtain the release of 900 political prisoners. Here is what he said:

[Begin recording] [words indistinct] We know 200 of the 900 are in very poor health. We also want the Costa Rican Government to help the Cubans who are in transit in the United States; that is, former political prisoners [words indistinct] and those who are coming from the Peruvian Embassy so they can arrange their papers to leave for the United States. So while they remain here, [words indistinct] may their living conditions be adequate and as bearable as possible. I also held a meeting today at the U.S. embassy with Mr (Scholl), director of the U.S. political section for Costa Rica. In an introductory letter, we also ask Mr Reagan to seek the release of the political prisoners in Cuba and to help us so that every Cuban who is in exile and in transit may enter the U.S. territory as soon as possible with the greatest number of opportunities and also so that program No 2 for Cuban refugees whereby the former political prisoners and their relatives can enter on a priority basis be accepted. We also want to indicate our unanimous support for the current [as heard] U.S. Pr ident Ronald Reagan because his victory is not just a U.S. victory but a victory of universal democracy and with it the grave of communism has begun to be dug once and for all. I want to thank Radio Reloj, the freedom station in Costa Rica, for this opportunity.

'NOTICIAS DEL CONTINENTE' RADIO STATION BOMBED

PA081519 Managua Radio Sandino in Spanish 0300 GMT 8 Nov 80

[Text] Radio Noticias del Continente, the station that reports on revolutionary activities in Latin America, was bombed today in Costa Rica.

The shortwave station Radio Noticias del Continente, whose installations are located in a town called Grecia, 40 km from San Jose, Costa Rica, was bombed today at 1330 by a light plane. Fortunately, only damages were caused to the plant and house of the watchman of the station, which is particularly known for propagandizing Latin America's revolutionary movements. For this reason, it is daily harassed by the reactionaries and particularly by the most radical rightwing.

All of us can recall how Radio Noticias del Continente reported on activities at all struggle fronts of the Sandinist National Liberation Front during the final offensive against the Somozist dictatorship. This resulted in a bid by the Costa Rican rightwing in congress to silence it by moving to revoke its license. Congress approved the embargo on the frequency but the decision was overturned by the Supreme Court on appeal because the station owner proved that she had acquired title to the installations through purchase. So, the reactionaries had to wait for a better opportunity to silence the voice of Central and South American revolutionaries.

(?A few weeks) ago the Costa Rican reactionaries went back at it, this time taking advantage of an allegation by the gorilla government of Che Videla of Argentina that the station had read proclamations affecting the dignity of that government. However, the charge was not upheld.

New attempts were made to close Radio Noticias del Continente when the Salvadoran government lodged a protest against alleged appeals to insurrection made by the station. At that time the station owner made available all material aired by the station since its founding to the president of Costa Rica so it could be analyzed to determine if and when the station has made any calls to insurrection or jeopardized the peace of the Argentine government.

All indications are that, following the failure of the quote legal maneuvers unquote, the Costa Rican reactionaries, with support from the gorilla and antipopular movements in America, have decided to stop the station's broadcasts through violence.

Despite everything, including the bombs thrown at 1330 today, the station is moving on with its work of denouncing oppressive regimes and reporting the advances of the revolutionaries and patriots of El Salvador, Guatemala, Argentina, Chile and other countries seeking liberation through arms.

PCC MEETINGS IN CENTRAL, WESTERN ARMIES REPORTED

Sixto Batista at Central Army

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 25 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Enrique Mesa]

[Text] Matanzas--The seventh party conference in the Central Army was held in the Heroes de Giron Theater of that army's General Staff.

The delegates, who represented the communist activist sector of the units, extensively debated the report on the work done, before its final approval. The report which covers nearly 3 years of continual work, was read by Lt Col Ibrahim Alfonso Victorero.

During the meeting, by secret and direct ballot the delegates to the Second Cuban Communist Party [PCC] Congress also voted for candidates to positions as members of the Central Committee and for members of the Party's Commission attached to the Political Section of the Central Army.

The working sessions of the conference were chaired by Julian Rizo, party first secretary in Matanzas; Div Gen Sixto Batista, chief of the Central Political Directorate of the FAR [Revolutionary Armed Forces]; and Div Gen Raul Menendez Tomassevich, commander of the Central Army, all of whom are members of the party Central Committee.

Also sharing the chair were Raul Rodriguez Lopez, first secretary of the party in Villa Clara, as well as other party leaders, senior officers of the Central Army and representatives of the mass organizations.

Before starting their working sessions, the delegates placed their floral offering before the obelisk in memory of the students of the old Militia Officers School who were killed on Playa Giron.

In the conclusion, Div Gen Sixto Batista called attention to the critical and self-critical spirit which had characterized the entire process preceding and during the conference.

He made an appeal to intensively continue expanding the work of political training of sargents and soldiers as well as of civilian workers and the Marxist-Leninist instruction of officers.

He recalled that next year the 20th anniversary of the proclamation of the socialist character of our revolution and the historic victory on Playa Giron occurs at the same time as the 20th anniversary of the establishment of the Central Army.

On behalf of the minister of the FAR, Army Gen Raul Castro, he transmitted a warm greeting to the conference delegates and most particularly to the delegates elect of the Party's Second Congress.

Colume Ibarra at Western Army

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 30 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by Ruben Placeres]

[Text] "The method and style of work of the political and party organizations must be characterized by quick and energetic reaction to problems which arise; and they must seek the correct solution for these problems, in accordance with the guidelines provided by party statutes," said Div Gen Abelardo Colome Ibarra as he closed the fourth party conference of the Western Army.

Brig Gen Ulises Rosales del Toro, a member of the Central Committee and commander of the Western Army, read the summary of the Central Report which the Political Section had submitted for the consideration of the delegates.

The document analyzes the work done by the political and party organizations and by all communists in the accomplishment of various tasks, particularly the continual raising of combat and mobilization readiness.

During discussion of the Central Report, emphasis was placed on the quantity and quality of the activities of the delegates who enriched the document with their proposals and suggestions. The document was finally approved unanimously.

The conference elected delegates to the Second PCC Congress and members of the party commission attached to the Political Section and approved the work objectives for the next stage. These activities were also enriched by the suggestions of the delegates.

This top conference of the Western Army approved a special resolution in recognition of members of that command who carry out international missions and expressed heartfelt gratitude to Soviet military specialists who are working in that command and who have contributed so much to its achievements.

Lt Gen Sergey Krivoplyasov, chief of the Soviet military specialists who are working in our country, gave thanks for the expression of gratitude and paid tribute to and congratulated the communists of the Western Army for the successful outcome of the conference.

Conclusions

At the closing of the conference, Div Gen Abelardo Colome Ibarra emphasized the profound critical and self-critical spirit with which analysis was made of all sectors of the work done in fulfillment of the agreements and resolutions of the First PCC Congress, the plenums of the Central Committee and the guidelines of the Politburo and Secretariat.

"The party focus with which the various analyses were made, the constructive manner in which the different problems were taken up and the working objectives proposed for action demonstrate the maturity attained by the activist sector of the Western Army," the speaker said.

Later he referred to questions which impact in one way or another upon the basic problems of work and emphasized that the effectiveness of political-ideological activities is measured by the results achieved in the party's labors, which influence and give impetus to all the tasks of military life.

After speaking about the importance of the work with young officers, the importance of improving military discipline and other subjects of interest, Div Gen Colome Ibarra transmitted to all military personnel of the Western Army the warm greetings of the minister of the FAR and the exhortation to carry out all the tasks deriving from the conference and those which emanate from the Second PCC Congress.

Colome Ibarra at Navy

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 1 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] Div Gen Abelardo Colome Ibarra, member of the PCC Central Committee and first deputy of the ministry of the FAR, summed up the seventh party conference in the Revolutionary Navy.

The conference, which was held in Military Unit 2746, analyzed the work to carry out the tasks of operational, combat and political training and other topics.

Vice Adm Aldo Santamaria, member of the Central Committee, deputy to the minister and commander of the MGR [Cuban Revolutionary Navy] forces, read the summary of the central report which the Political Section had presented for the consideration of the delegates participating in the conference. After it was debated, the document was approved unanimously.

The conference also analyzed the work done by the party commission attached to the Political Section and elected members and alternates to the abovementioned organization and delegates to the Second PCC Congress.

The work objectives for the next period were also approved by the delegates after debate.

Speech by Abelardo Colome

As he read the conclusions, Div Gen Abelardo Colome emphasized that the conference was the culmination of the meeting process which was begun several months ago at the rank and file level, and which on this occasion took on special meaning because it was part of the training process of the Second PCC Congress.

The speaker pointed up the manner in which the central report presented to the conference critically considered all aspects of the party's sphere of action and the in-depth way in which the delegates discussed and analyzed the matters dealt with.

He said that in the last 2 years the MGR has produced a sustained effort which is evidenced by the positive results of the controls established by the high command.

He also mentioned the importance of perfecting methods and styles of work; the necessary help which higher organizations should give to lower echelons, without preempting them; and emphasized "that all of our work is continually subjected to the most profound critical and self-critical analysis."

After mentioning the most important tasks to be undertaken by the MGR in the near future and the role the party is called upon to play in motivating such tasks, he said that military, technical, political-ideological and psychological training of personnel must always be in accordance with present realities, that is, at the level of the demands imposed upon us by the aggressive and blackmail-oriented policy and threats of American imperialism.

At the end of his speech, after emphasizing the importance of ideological work, Div Gen Colome Ibarra transmitted congratulations to the delegates on behalf of FAR Minister Army Gen Raul Castro for the success of the conference and exhorted them to carry out their work objectives with the conviction that the MGR will be able to fulfill the requirements of the agreements and resolutions emanating from the Second PCC Congress.

Youth Labor Army Conference

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 1 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] Camaguey (AIN)--With congratulations on behalf of the FAR Ministry and the party leadership of this province, Lazaro Vazquez, party first secretary in Camaguey, closed the third party conference in the Youth Labor Army [EJT].

The conference was chaired by Div Gen Abelardo Colome, first deputy of the minister; Div Gen Sixto Batista, chief of the Central Political Directorate; Div Gen Rigoberto Garcia, commander of the EJT; and Lt Col Anibal Velaz, MININT [Ministry of Interior] delegate in Camaguey, all of whom are members of the party Central Committee.

Lazaro Vazquez emphasized the positive work done by the EJT in the last few years in the struggle for economic consolidation, which "makes its honorable members worthy of the admiration and respect of our entire country."

Conference participants enthusiastically paid tribute to the successful Soviet-Cuban joint [space] flight and the 20th anniversary of the CDR [Committees for the Defense of the Revolution].

Lt Col Roberto Santos, deputy chief of the EJT for Political Work, read the summary of the central report which in a critical manner recounts party activities in the military institution and fulfillment of the agreements of the First PCC Congress.

The informational summary contained comments about achievements in the production sector, particularly activities in the sugar harvest, construction and railroad sectors and about socialist emulation itself.

An unusual moment of emotion during this third party conference in the EJT occurred at the beginning when representatives of students, workers, combatants and Pioneers gave an expression of their solidarity with participants in the party conference, which was characterized by its color, organization and patriotism.

During the afternoon session, delegates of that command were elected to the Second PCC Congress; and the work objectives for the next stage were approved.

PLAN TO SEND CUBAN 'ANTISOCIALS' TO PUERTO RICO ATTACKED

FL111151 Havana Voice of Cuba in English to North America and the Caribbean 0500 GMT 11 Nov 80

["Spotlight on Latin America" Commentary]

[Text] Puerto Rico has been subject to U.S. colonial domination for over 80 years. One of the many forms of subjection for this Caribbean Island has been highly-polluting factories installed there by the U.S. It's no doubt [as heard] that the industry of imperialist transnationals transforms the Puerto Rican economy. That's not all. In addition to industry's waste, the U.S. is planning to export another kind of waste. We're referring to the scum who, encouraged by U.S. propaganda, left Cuba recently seeking the myth of a U.S. paradise. [words indistinct] These antisocials have staged riots and brawls among other such actions. In short, they are a thorn in the side of the U.S.

U.S. President Carter has found a solution to his problems. He is getting rid of them by moving them to Ft Allen, Puerto Rico. As soon as that decision became public knowledge in Puerto Rico, people took to the streets in protest. The media --newspapers, radio and television--is full of harsh words for Washington's unilateral decision. Every political party except the ruling new progressive party has denounced the move. A People United Committee has been created to oppose the move. This committee groups together over 40 political, social and religious organizations which represent some 100,000 Puerto Ricans.

Carlos (Monrigues), Puerto Rican independence party leader, pointed out recently that the country has historically seen a U.S. dumping ground. Now the antisocials are being dumped in Puerto Rico. University Professor Carmen (Gooche) says it's outrageous that while Puerto Rico exports professionals in the so-called brain drain, it's being forced to take in people who are not wanted in the U.S. or in Peru or anywhere else.

Puerto Rican S[illegible]ist Party President Carlos Galliza says that the U.S. decision is an insult [illegible]e Puerto Rican people because it turns the country into a dump. Even the Autonomous People's Democratic Party President, Miguel Hernandez Agosto, has publicly repudiated the measure. He's demanded that Colonial Governor Carlos Romero Barcelo state whether he represents the country's interests or Washington's.

Moving the antisocials to Ft Allen should have begun October 15 but outcry against it has resulted in postponement on two occasions. The case has even reached the U.S. Supreme Court where it was overturned.

There's no doubt that this may well affect peace and security on the island, the national environment surrounding Ft Allen, and that it will cost economic, social and cultural problems. The U.S.' unilateral decision not only restates the island's colonial status, but it also violates the UN Decolonization Committee Resolution which was supported by the international community.

HISPANIOLA, NONALINEMENT, WORLD ECONOMICS DISCUSSED

American Presence in Hispaniola

Havana PRISMA LATINOAMERICANO in Spanish Sep 80 p 2

[Article by Carlos Mora Herman]

[Text] In May of this year, Haitian exiles in the Dominican Republic announced a list of 66 "tontons macoutes" who operate on Dominican territory as agents of Duvalier.

This list contains some select specimens from that group of agents of the Duvalier dynasty's oppression.

For example, there is a certain Camil on the list, who some time ago went to the island of Curacao to organize a plot to assassinate Robert Moise and Paul Denis, the latter expelled about 4 months ago from the Dominican Republic.

We can also mention the witches Salvador Laurent and Jean Robert, the latter referred to as "a bloodsucker of children" on the list published in Santo Domingo.

These "tontons macoutes" sent into the country by the current Duvalier with the approval of the Dominican Government are there to suppress and spy on opponents of "papa Doc's" son, and they are under the orders of the Haitian ambassador, Dr Fritz Cineas, and the military attache, Col Jean-Pierre Fajas. The United States occupied Haiti from 1915 to 1934 and turned it into an American semicolony.

In addition, the Dominican Republic has an international policy which is drawn up in Washington and obviously favors not Dominican interests, but those of the United States.

Not long ago, the Duvalier regime and Washington signed an agreement authorizing the Americans to invade Haiti if they feel the country is threatened by any revolutionary movement.

The president of the Dominican Republic, Antonio Guzman, and the armed forces of that country support that agreement and would, in such an event, join that force in invading Haitian territory.

With 30,000 troops, the Dominican armed forces are six times greater than the Haitian. They could play this role in the service of the Yankees and with the firm support of the latter in all areas.

It is no accident that high-ranking American officials have recently visited the Dominican Republic.

A military pact has resulted from two meetings held at the border by Antonio Guzman and Duvalier in 1979.

That pact came out of the U.S. Defense Department as part of the policy conceived for the area by President James Carter and his advisers after the fall of dictators Eric Gairy in Grenada and Anastasio Somoza in Nicaragua. In January this year, Maj Gen Robert L. Schweitzer visited the Dominican Republic as Carter's special envoy.

Schweitzer made his country's objectives crystal clear: to take advantage of the strategic position of the Dominican Republic, located between Mona Passage and Windward Passage, through which all ships bound for the Panama Canal must pass, and to use the Dominican army to invade Haiti if that country is threatened by a revolution, for which invasion the United States would supply all necessary aid.

This was not the only visit of its kind. A few weeks after Schweitzer, Adm Harry D. Train, chief of the Yankee naval fleet in the Atlantic and the Caribbean, appeared in the Dominican Republic, and later on Gen Wallace Nuttin, chief of the U.S. Southern Strategic Command, based in Panama, was there. Both reiterated and confirmed the orders given by Schweitzer.

Among the immediate consequences of those visits is a resurgence of persecutions, threats and deportations of foreigners residing in the Dominican Republic, especially anti-Duvalier Haitians.

Maj Gen Mario Imbert McGregor, President Guzman's armed forces minister, told the Dominican newspaper EL NACIONAL in April that 12 new military camps were to be built along the border with Haiti, and a barracks and housing for soldiers stationed in Mecasi, in the jurisdiction of Pedro Santana, which is also a border municipality.

That same month, April, military training was carried out in the border zone, with armored and air forces.

The American presence on the old island of Hispaniola, the second of the Antilles, shared by the Dominican Republic (48,442 sq km) and Haiti (27,750 sq km), creates increasingly humiliating and sad conditions of dependence and submission to the hegemonic and aggressive policy of the United States government.

The imperial jaws are closing around Haiti and the Dominican Republic, two peoples who ought to live in peace on one great island and whom the United States has always tried to manipulate according to its own whims and interests, so that it has had to cause fictitious confrontations and support bloody dictatorships like that of Trujillo in the Dominican Republic and the Duvalier family in Haiti, as well as direct attacks such as that by its Marines in the Dominican Republic in 1965.

[Text] Anniversaries are usually occasions for reviewing work accomplished and also for necessary analysis looking toward the future.

For the Nonalined Countries Movement, which this September completes its first year since its Sixth Summit was held in Havana, this annual review shows, above all, a substantial favorable balance, which confirms its presence as an important factor in the international arena.

This moment in the history of the Nonalined Countries Movement is more important still if one takes into consideration that this is the 19th year since its founding in Belgrade in 1961, and everything appears to indicate that the third decade of its existence will begin in a political climate which is particularly difficult for its aspirations for peace and the restructuring of the international relations which give it life.

Twelve months after the Havana meeting, the greatest and most representative of all the summit meetings of the nonalined countries, the importance of that first meeting in Latin America is reaffirmed if one analyzes the role played by the movement during a year rich in political happenings of indisputable importance.

With the entry of several countries--among them Nicaragua and Grenada, on the American continent--the nonalined countries reached a total of 95 full members in Havana, including states and internationally recognized national liberation movements, which emphasized its consolidated prestige as an influential factor at the time, as well as its broadness and heterogeneity.

In the year that Cuba has exercised the presidency conferred on it at the Sixth Summit, it has been proved that the large group of member countries of the Nonalined Movement has achieved in that period one of the most ambitious objectives outlined at the Havana meeting: that of greater participation in the solution of current political problems.

There have been centered principally in three areas: South Africa, Southwest Asia and the Middle East, and in the daily task of changing prevailing economic structures, which are responsible for the underdevelopment which confronts most of the people represented in the movement.

The determination and dedication of the current president of the nonalined countries in playing a dynamic role on the international political scene has been pointed out by heads of member states. The Tanzanian chief of state, Julius Nyerere, for example, called President Fidel Castro's efforts a very important factor in the achievement of Zimbabwe's independence in April of this year.

The timely denunciation in the name of the nonalined countries of the manipulations of the Lancaster House agreements, which after long negotiations paved the way for the end of white minority rule in what was then Rhodesia, was a significant contribution, at the beginning of the year, of the presidency of the movement to the just victory of the Zimbabwe Patriotic Front, celebrated by all progressive men and women.

As to South Africa, the chief area of conflict on the African continent, a recent message from the president of the nonalined countries, motivated by a new South African incursion into Angolan territory, called for material, moral and political solidarity with the independent state threatened by the racist power.

The efforts to find a peaceful and political solution to the situation in Southwest Asia also had a priority place throughout this year in the activity of the presidency of the Nonalined Movement.

The negotiations undertaken by Cuba included diplomatic contacts with more than 15 nations in that area and resulted in the recognition by several heads of state or government of the constructive character of the same in the context of this crisis. Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky called the Cuban position "clear, objective and very balanced," an opinion which was also expressed by other international personalities.

Several governments of the nonalined member countries, although holding differing points of view on the situation in Afghanistan, were agreed that the best way to solve the crisis was through negotiation, and they supported Cuba's mission.

The governments of Syria, Libya, Iraq, Algeria, Bangladesh and the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization], for example, expressed their approval of those negotiations.

In the same area, the crisis caused by the American adventure on Iranian territory was echoed within the Nonalined Movement which, through its president, reiterated to the Tehran government the willingness of the movement to study concrete measures to avoid the repetition of such attacks.

The recently concluded extraordinary session of the UN General Assembly, which at the request of several nonalined countries and in conformity with the resolutions of the Sixth Summit, examined the Palestinian situation and marked one of the most important international defeats of Zionism in the last decade, must also be considered an important victory for the movement's positions.

This short summary of such varied activity would be incomplete if we were not to mention the important speech made by Fidel Castro on behalf of the movement at the 34th period of UN General Assembly sessions, in which he summarized with exemplary objectivity and precision the sad economic and social situation of hundreds of human beings and outlined some norms for its possible improvement.

These and other tasks, such as the action in favor of disarmament or for the creation of a new international information system are among the positive results of a fruitful year of work which responds with deeds to the hopes sown by the Sixth Summit and confirms, a year after its closing, its deep unifying influence on the broadest political movement in the present world.

NIEO Concerns

[Article by Jose Bodes Gomez]

[Text] In battling so hard for the establishment of a new international economic order, sometimes we forget that it will also be necessary to make profound structural changes in many of the underdeveloped countries.

All the nations of the so-called Third World which have undertaken the path to development have had to choose an economic and social system which is adequate to permit them to reach that goal.

One of the first decisions which must be made by the young states is to determine the principal source of the capital which will serve to satisfy the investment needs of economic development.

Another question to be answered is how to proceed to effect a just redistribution of the wealth, so that the majority of the people have access to living conditions which are in keeping with the progress it is hoped to achieve.

Faced with such varied problems, the underdeveloped countries prove that the old schemes based on "private initiative" are ineffective and even contradictory with respect to the proposed goals.

Some of these problems were analyzed at the Latin American Dialog on the New International Economic Order held in Havana in June under the auspices of the United Nations and the Center for World Economic Research, which has its headquarters in Cuba.

"In the opinion of most of the participants," the meeting's final communique states, "the genuine independence and the true progress of the Third World countries are not possible within the framework of capitalism."

Two decades before, Cuba itself opted for the socialist path as a suitable social and economic system under which to achieve development.

Naturally, this decision required and still requires enormous effort by its people; to carry it forward demanded constant vigilance against the open sabotage and attacks of power groups who had been removed from both the state and economic leadership of the country.

The economic blockade imposed against Cuba 20 years ago by the government of the United States is an obvious example of the dangers and obstacles that must be overcome when a country assumes its independence, with all its consequences.

However, it is impossible to conceive a new international economic order in which the structure of both domestic and foreign domination, which are precisely responsible for backwardness and social injustice, survive.

Cuban President Fidel Castro pointed that out clearly last year in the UN General Assembly when he said: "Exploitation of the poor countries by the rich countries must cease. I know that in many poor countries there are also the exploiters and the exploited. I ask the rich nations to contribute (to development). I ask the poor countries to distribute."

It was in that high international forum that the Cuban leader, speaking as president of the Nonalined Countries Movement, spoke of the need to create an additional flow of resources of not less than $300 billion during the present decade to reinforce the aid already earmarked by the world community for development.

The solution of the problem of financing has become a key question, at a time when the foreign debt of the underdeveloped countries is the most serious obstacle many of them face in undertaking the long-awaited economic development.

Cuba also had to confront this pressing problem and, naturally, to solve it, it could not count on "aid" from the International Monetary Fund or the World Bank, credit organs in which decisions were made with the predominant vote of the U.S. government.

Nor can other underdeveloped countries, as Jamaica proved recently, base their independent development on sources of capital controlled by Washington and for that same reason prejudicial to their interests.

Economic cooperation among the developing countries, then, becomes an alternative source, and at present it must be increased so that it can carry out its function of promoting progress.

Cuba's experience as a member state of CEMA also demonstrates the possibilities that exist of expanding cooperation between the socialist community and the developing countries.

By and large, the capitalist way has demonstrated that it is only useful for perpetuating the international division of industrial countries from those submerged in underdevelopment.

DECLINE IN PROWESS OF ATHLETIC TEAMS NOTED WITH CONCERN

Havana JUVENTUD REBELDE in Spanish 21 Sep 80 p 5

[Article by Cristobal Laza]

[Text] The 23d Olympic cycle which will culminate in the 1984 Games has just begun; however, there is a crisis in Cuban athletics; and more dedicated effort will have to be exerted from this moment on if results superior to those of Moscow are to be obtained.

Despite the fact that several medals were won at the Moscow meet, topped by Caridad Colon's gold medal in the javelin, the accomplishments of our athletes were inferior to those expected. And in the next 4 years they could be worse if more work is not done to prepare our leading competitors and their backups.

Bad luck was not the reason for our country's poor showing in Moscow; rather it was the culmination of a process of deterioration which has been taking place in recent important meets, such as the Pan-American Games and the Montreal World Cup.

This means we must analyze the causes which have produced instability among the athletes of national teams and devise training plans which will permit the elimination of such problems for highly productive competitors.

However, it cannot be said that this is the only reason for the decline in Cuban athletic prowess. In this respect, the inadequate development of the stages by which an athlete is supposed to reach his highest level has been fundamental.

The EIDE [School for Sports Beginners] and the ESPA [Advanced School of Athletic Improvement] have not done their jobs as expected. As a result, the Cuban representation has not had the athletes it should have had.

As eloquent proof of the poor work done in these centers, it can be noted that from the nine EIDEs in the country, only 26 students of that sports entity were worthy of selection for the ESPA out of a group of over 300. If we add to this the fact that selections for the ESPA in prior years were also made without the requisite care, it is evident that there has been no development in the international sports sector, as not even the specialized centers have supplied top athletes for the number one teams.

The situation is more critical in the mass sports sector. Competitions have not been held nor are contests conducted among the young people, particularly in the student sector, which is the basic breeding ground; physical education programs are not carried out, and the calendar of competitions is conspicuous by its absence.

There have even been cases in which trials to select children for the EIDE's have been scheduled, but those who should be responsible for the selection process did not attend. Then selection was made by the handpicking method or at least without the possibility of assuring that the best track-and-field competitors attend these schools for sports beginners.

To all the above we must add the lack of incentives for trainers and competitors or for their technical development.

Undeniably, with a general situation such as this we cannot hope to make a good showing since not even the primary objective targeted by the state is being met, namely systematic sports practice and, as a consequence thereof, the development of champions.

Only a few athletes have remained in the forefront of world competition, such as Caridad Colon, Silvio Leonard, Alejandro Casanas, Luis Mariano Delis and Alberto Juantorena, and on a lesser scale, David Giralt and Carmen Romero. Except for Giralt and Caridad, the remaining athletes have already competed in two or more Olympic cycles; therefore, we must count upon others at their same level of competence for Los Angeles.

To achieve this goal, we must revitalize our athletic sector. We must have competitions from the rank and file level on up everywhere; we must make the best selections of athletes and trainers; finally, we must work with the dedication of the first years of the sports movement which has practically disappeared from the provinces.

If we fail to do these things, we will arrive in Los Angeles less prepared than we were in Moscow. where, among other things, we were unable to enter a single woman in the track competitions (a sector in which we have even received Olympic medals) and the anchorman for the 400-meter relay was eliminated for failing to pass the baton.

These are some aspects of the present athletic sector which were analyzed in May 1980 by the national plenary assembly and more recently at a meeting chaired by the INDER [National Institute for Sports, Physical Education and Recreation].

This is one of the most meaningful sports areas for all athletes; and at the competitive level it is the one which supplies the greatest number of medals. Thus we must struggle for the mass participation it should have and for high quality in the various specialties among our principal sports figures. By sector, the shotput specialty, which has no tradition here, is at the forefront, while in the track sector the deterioration is already a cause for concern. We will analyze these questions in upcoming articles.

FRIENDSHIP SOCIETIES SIGN PROTOCOL--The Presidents of the Organizations of Friendship between Cuba and the Soviet Union, Zoilo Marinello and Vladimir Shatalov, today in Moscow signed a new work protocol for the 1981-85 5-year period. The new protocol calls for, as a fundamental issue, the discussion in the Soviet Union and Cuba of the agreements and results of the Second Congress of the Communist Party of Cuba and 26th CPSU Congress which will be held in February 1981. After the signing of the protocol, Lt Gen Vladimir Shatalov, president of the Soviet-Cuban Friendship Society, emphasized that all the agreements reached for the 5-year period just ended were fulfilled successfully. For his part, Zoilo Marinello, president of the Cuban-Soviet Friendship Society, reported that this organization has nine branches in Cuba and more than 300 member groups throughout the island. The two speakers agreed that the first joint Soviet-Cuban space flight was an important landmark in the relations between the two socialist countries. CONTRACTING DEADLINE EXTENSION--The deadline for the signing of contracts for export and import products during the first preparatory stage of the plan has been extended until 30 September, according to information obtained from the Central Planning Board. At the same time, the deadline for signing contracts for import products presented during the second stage has been extended to 30 October. The extension of the deadlines for these kinds of contracts was approved by the board in response to a duly justified request by the Ministry of Foreign Trade. The extension of the contracting deadlines in turn has resulted in a change in the dates for the contracting of shipment and transport services. As a result, the board decided to extend the deadline for the signing of both kinds of contracts until 15 November. [Text] [Havana GRANMA in Spanish 26 Sep 80 p 6] 8143

PEACE FORMULA TO END VIOLENCE PROPOSED

PA241301 San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 22 Oct 80 p 2

"A peace formula. To make up a new governing junta as follows: A representative of the extreme right, a representative of the extreme left, a representative of the independence sector and a representative of the armed forces. To elect each of these representatives, the following procedure will be used: the left and right extreme groups will appoint their respective representatives. In the case of there being several proposed candidates, one candidate will be selected through the elimination vote system.

"The independent representative will be chosen from a consensus of the episcopate, the Chamber of Commerce, service clubs and professional sectors, who will name their candidates and then proceed to the elimination vote system.

"The representative of the armed forces shall be chosen from among officialdom.

"Once made up, the governing junta, which will constitute the executive branch, will proceed to appoint the members of the cabinet and other corresponding appointments, taking into consideration the candidates proposed by the four members of the junta, in the final selection of the person or persons for the respective posts.

"In the case of a tie, it will be decided by the junta president who, for the purpose of elections will have two votes. The presidency of the junta will be assumed by the representative of the independent sector.

"We hope that this formula of peace for El Salvador and all Salvadorans alike, will make possible the return of tranquillity and the institutional order, as well as the end of violence from all sides for the benefit of the Salvadoran community." (Signed) Dr Ernesto Romero Hernandez.

ARCHBISHOP RIVERA Y DAMAS INTERVIEWED

PA070259 Panama City Televisora Nacional in Spanish 2315 GMT 6 Nov 80

[Interview with Msgr Arturo Rivera y Damas, bishop in charge of the Arcnbishopric of El Salvador by Mario Velasquez on 6 Nov 80 in Panama City--recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] Monsigneur, the Latin American community and particularly Panama, are deeply worried about what is happening in El Salvador. Since your testimony is so valuable, could you tell us what the situation there really is?

[Answer] The situation in El Salvador is very complex. It is a complicated situation in which an undeclared war is going on and which has worsened in the past few weeks. The leftwing is carrying out a plan which has two parts: one consisting of actual clashes and the other being the people's prolonged war which is of a broader scope. On the other hand, the armed forces are also very active trying by all means to control the situation. Then, there is the vast majority of people, who are indifferent, but nevertheless, are waiting to see what will happen. They are tired of this situation and hope that it can be solved by political means instead of fighting.

[Answer] I believe that in the era we are living in, you cannot prevent interrelations. Therefore, we have foreign influence in those sectors, who are trying to change things through violence and also on the forces which are trying to neutralize the actions of their adversaries.

[Question] Monsigneur, do you think Ronald Reagan's election as president of the United States will strengthen the position of the traditional oligarchic groups of El Salvador and of those armed forces sectors who would rather use power than dialogue?

[Answer] With Reagan's elections there will be changes in U.S. foreign policy. Based on what he has said, we can expect that the Salvadoran rightwing will receive support and conservation will be the prevailing trend in solving our problems.

VIOLENCE, REPRESSION OPPOSED--An end to violence, repression and terrorism to open the way for a climate of dialogue for the benefit of the majority has been requested by the ecclesiastical diocese of El Salvador in the latest pastoral letter, entitled: No to violence, yes to peace. The introductory portion of the letter states: In this hour of pain and tragedy when, from the impunity of the underground, the spectre of irrational and blind violence threatens; in this hour of confusion and of a lack of moral conscience, of a crisis of values and of fanatical exaltation of rancor, hatred and vengeance; when we look with horror on dishonesty, cowardice, treason, disloyalty and crime raised to the level of values, we are filled with anguish and we are tempted to ask ourselves if there is still any hope in this vortex of madness that threatens to swallow us in a sea of the blood of our brothers. This was the introductory portion of the letter of the ecclesiastical diocese of El Salvador, which emphatically rejects violence. SIGNING OF PEACE TREATY WITH HONDURAS HAILED

PA301621 Tegucigalpa Domestic Service in Spanish 1130 GMT 30 Oct 80

[Excerpts] Thirty October 1980 will be remembered as a memorable day, an important date in the annals of Central America, a victory for international law and especially, as a date of great historical significance in the lives of both Honduras and El Salvador.

Today, at approximately 1800 hours, the foreign minister of these two countries will sign a general peace treaty that will put an end to the virtual state of war existing since July 1969. This will open a new chapter of understanding, conciliation and agreement, as befits nations of common tradition, whose destiny can only be one of close fraternity.

Under the auspices of the OAS, the governments of Honduras and El Salvador have been seeking a peaceful solution to their disputes. Since 1969, year after year, this goal has seen many difficulties. The negotiating spirit, however, never diminished.

In the past 30 months it has been possible to work more seriously and to overcome obstacles. Today, there is satisfaction that both, notable Peruvian jurist Dr Jose Luis Bustamante y Rivero and the talented negotiators of the two belligerant countries have fulfilled an important duty.

The time has come to sign the peace treaty and the plenipotentiary ambassadors are backed by the political will of their respective governments and the support of their peoples. In this respect, there is no room for doubt. Not one person ignores the importance and the need of achieving peace between two nations, which, for geographical reasons are neighbors and by the dictates of history are sister nations and should not maintain an indefinite situation of discord which in no way benefits them.

In Honduras, there are very few adverse opinions and these stem more from unfamiliarity with the treaty than from ignorance about its advantageousness. Doubts are mostly based on the idea that Honduras is being prejudiced in connection with the issue of territorial limits.

There is sufficient reason to believe Foreign Minister Elvir Sierra when he says that both states are signing the treaty in an effort to achieve harmonious solutions that do not represent advantages for either country. On the basis of total equality, the treaty will enable them to move toward the reestablishment of a just, firm and solid peace.

SITUATION IN EL SALVADOR SEEN SIMILAR TO NICARAGUA'S ON EVE OF REVOLUTION

PA312236 Managua Domestic Service in Spanish 0500 GMT 31 Oct 80

[Station Commentary]

[Text] Just like last year in Nicaragua, when Somoza, the Somozists, rats and the small-time thieves in autonomous entities, enterprises, stores and so forth did what all cowards do when the ship begins to sink; they abondoned it, snatching up everything that can be stolen. [sentence as heard]

We do not know what the story is on this occasion, what is happening in El Salvador. The symptoms of the disease that is killing the corrupt regime of that sister nation are visible.

I think that we should clear this up once and for all.

Of course, what used to be a rumor, or a cold statistic hidden among many unimportant figures was fully confirmed in El Salvador through the statements of high-ranking officials.

But what is this all about?

All right. The national treasury was drained of its foreign exchange. How barbarous! Just like last year in Nicaragua.

Hurried trips looking for some millions of dollars, which no financial institution wants to risk, not even U.S. entities, and explicit official recognitions of the crisis have begun to show up on the pages of international newspaper publications.

Since the beginning of the year, the leaders of the Revolutionary Democratic Front [FDR] had charged money was being grabbed hand over fist with the tolerance of the authorities of the government junta.

Since last April, all the reserves of the central bank of Salvador, like those of the mortgage bank and other commercial banks, were reflecting the great crisis. However, the military-Christian democratic junta insisted on denying it. But by March, it was believed that only a little--about $6 million--remained in the reserves.

Now, an unprecedented crisis is becoming evident in Central America. There is a continuous flow of foreign exchange to other countries--Miami, [word indistinct], Guatemala--similar to the one which occurred in Nicaragua during the last few months of the Somoza regime. There is also a sharp drop in production.

If Nicaragua was left by Somoza and his thief henchmen--and you will pardon us for saying that Somoza was a thief--with less than $30 in its treasury, how much are the military and Christian democrats going to leave in El Salvador when they abandon ship, which is already inexorably sinking?

But until the traitors leave with all the valuables they wish to take, the people continue to die of sorrow every day, hundreds per month and thousands every year. It is a bloodbath, a genocidal orgy which is continued day by day until the new government, which has just been installed in the liberated areas, will make the people shout: Long live free and sovereign El Salvador.

Of course, imperialism continues to (?feed) on blood, just like it did in Vietnam and like in all other nations seeking their liberty, and it continues to send arms and military advisors while it prepares more arms and marines in its military bases at Viequez in Puerto Rico and the Panama Canal, which it still refuses to hand over as stipulated in the Carter-Torrijos treaty.

And they force the signing of a peace treaty between El Salvador and Honduras, so that these countries will join their armies with the army of Guatemala and all will oppose the revolutionaries who, despite so many odds, see victory near.

'LA PRENSA' EDITORIAL AGAINST MILITARIZATION ATTACKED

Imperialism Made People Soldiers

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 27 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by Xavier Reyes Alba: "The Real Essence of a Hypocritical Pacifism"]

[Text] A gentleman who identifies himself as Felix Pedro Espinoza published yesterday, 26 September, in the daily LA PRENSA an editorial which points out "his concern" because Nicaragua is becoming a police state due to what he calls "so much militarization," and wonders if perhaps we are at war with some nation because of "large mobilizations and deployment of troops in special trucks," etc.

It is interesting that his commentary begins with a half-truth--a false one--and ends with an ocean of confusion, whose obvious purpose is to mislead the people. This is not the first time LA PRENSA has promoted an editorial policy based on a "pacifist" and "antimilitarist" line.

We believe facts are so overwhelming that they alone answer Mr Espinoza.

The date 19 July 1979 represents not only the synthesis of all the Nicaraguan people's efforts, with the Sandinist Front at the vanguard, to overthrow the dictatorship. It is also the historic summary of a nation which always understood that the unity of all its men, and the armed way, constituted the only way to attain the longed for freedom, and the opportunity to build and guide a society according to the interests of the great majorities.

It was neither the people nor the vanguard who tried to mediate, hold a plebiscite, to hold a dialogue with Somoza. From Sandino to Carlos Fonseca, the flame of the armed struggle has gone at different times from the hope to the alternative, from the beginning to the end of a dictatorship.

The people never accepted a compromise with Somoza and the imperialists. The rejection of what happened in El Espino Negro is witness to Sandino's important historic legacy.

In 1978, the sons of Sandino, organized in the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front], adopted that doctrine and called for the repudiation of the plebiscite, the settlement and the mediation. While Bowdler met in September with those who now call the Sandinist Front "militarists " to find a "peaceful" way out and institute a Somozism without Somoza in Nicaragua, the people revolted in several important cities throughout the country.

The people's answer to these acts of treason was expressed then, in all its magnitude, for the world to see and learn from, in the barricades of Esteli, Masaya, Leon and Chinandega.

The people wielded their right to overthrow with weapons in their hands, and not only that. Now they are wielding that right to defend the achievements of one year of revolution.

We agree with Mr Espinoza, it was not the people who sought the armed way: it was forced on them by Somoza, by the imperialists and by the native proimperialists.

The answer is not in words but in deeds, Mr Espinoza. It is in the Somozist camps in Arenas Blancas, Las Brisas, El Rodeo; it is in Mata de Platano where four policemen, sons of peasants, were murdered; it is in Cinco Pinos, where Georgino Andrade was tortured and killed; it is in the counterrevolutionary camps which Sandoval Alarcon is forming together with that Urcuyo in Guatemala, it is in the North American warmonger circles headed by Reagan; it is in the North American ships that sail in Caribbean waters, threatening us with rockets with nuclear warheads.

Sandino has already said it: "We are not soldiers, we belong to the people, we are armed citizens," ready to form the Popular Militias, which we copy from no-one, but which we forged in the struggle to defend this process.

Scarcely 1 year ago we were at war. Children and elders had to learn to make war in their search for freedom, for democracy, for the new society which it has the duty to defend and to repel those who want to destroy our people's peace.

Peace cannot be destroyed only with arms, but also with attitudes which attempt to confuse, and sow distrust in the people, as Mr Espinoza and other so-called "pacifists" are doing.

Army To Protect, Not Imprison

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 29 Sep 80 p 2

[Article by Erick Aguirre A.: "Do They Fear an Armed People?"]

[Text] These lines are addressed to unmask the malicious article "The Militarization of Our History," by Felix P. Espinoza, published in LA PRENSA.

Mr Espinoza begins his writing with the following thought of Rodrigo Carazo: "Countries with an army become jailers of their own people."

Our revolution has proved the contrary, making such thoughts obsolete, at least as it refers to Nicaragua, since the same cannot be said for Chile, Bolivia, Argentina, etc. To try to mold that thought to the situation in Nicaragua would be malicious.

There is an army in our country, not to jail people, but to defend its interests and sovereignty to the death.

I must inform Mr Espinoza of his error when he mentions "uniformity of opinions" in the armed struggle as the only means to achieve liberation.

Doesn't Felix Pedro remember how the groups he is joining tried to denigrate our process, to down-play the people's struggle against Somoza? Doesn't he remember when these groups tried to prevent the armed triumph of the people, invoking mediation, even sitting down to hold a dialogue with Somoza himself, desperately trying to prevent the people's victory, led by FSLN (Sandinist National Liberation Front)?

When a people takes up arms to free itself from the oppressors, it cannot do it "temporarily," and when a people triumphs and forms its own army, it is not enough that in that "only the necessary soldiers" are in that army, "but that all the people militarize themselves to defend that triumph."

Is that what Felix Pedro fears? An armed people saying they will not be exploited any more? Loudly screaming that they will never again be subject to manipulations from oligarchs and those who would sell out the country? Is that why he protests?

With what moral authority does the mentioned writer question the guerrilla mystique attached to the People's Literacy Army, when this is a homage to all the heroes who fell, fighting for our liberation?

How else could we honor the names of our fallen ones if not by giving their names to the EPA squadrons?

It is illusory to think (although in his case it is bad intention) that nobody wants to attack us; how can we explain the death of that compita (comrade) border guard in Guasaule, and all the attacks we have suffered from former Somoza guards in complicity with the Honduran army? How can we explain the invasion by yankee marines who stepped on our sovereignty, and who are capable of doing it again when their interests are threatened?

Therefore, let us make clear to our readers the evil intentions of all these article writers from LA PRENSA, which under the guise of a false nationalism, of a false longing for democracy and pluralism, tries to discredit the revolutionary process before the people--by any method possible.

'LA PRENSA'S' CHAMORRO SAYS GOVERNMENT EMBARGOES NEWS

PA071848 Panama City ACAN in Spanish 0138 GMT 7 Nov 80

[Text] Managua, 6 Nov (ACAN-EFE)--Pedro Joaquin Chamorro Barrios, sales manager and editorial writer of the newspaper LA PRENSA of this capital, said today, that "there is a broad embargo on information" in Nicaragua.

This opinion was expressed by Chamorro Barrios during a 1-hour debate on freedom of the press broadcast over Radio Sandino, the official voice of the Sandinist National Liberation Front [FSLN], and Radio Corporacion, a privately owned station.

The representative of LA PRENSA said that government decree 511 restricts information on armed confrontations, riots, strikes, interruptions in public transportation service and labor conflicts.

"It would be better not to have laws that limit the freedom of information of either private media or government newscasts," Chamorro Barrios said.

Ignacio Briones of Nicaragua, dirctor of the Latin American Journalists Federation (FELAP) argued [words indistinct] deceased Pedro Joaquin Chamorro.

The FELAP leader said that now it is a question of trying to strengthen the government in which the great majority of people are represented, and not of attacking the government's authority "through all means possible, so as to defend capitalism."

Chamorro Barrios added that "we should not make the mistake of having the government be the sole source of official information."

Xavier Reyes, of the Union of Nicaraguan Journalists (UPN), said that LA PRENSA has its own system for embargoing the news; it doesn't defend the Nicaraguan revolution.

Fabio Gadea, representative of the association of private communications media, said it is a mistake to consider as an enemy of newsman who exercises the right to criticize and to correct the errors committed by a government.

SANDINIST YOUTH CREATES COMMISSION ON POLICE ABUSES

[Communique No 2 issued by the 19 July Sandinist Youth Movement on 28 October 1980--read by unidentified announcer]

[Text] The National Executive Committee of the 19 July Sandinist Youth Movement has learned of cases of certain members of the Sandinist police shocting, apparently without justification, at vehicles that have allegedly run stop signs. This has resulted in several people being seriously wounded.

While aware that this has not been and will never be the behavior of our armed forces, we understand that these have been isolated incidents that must be completely stopped. They endanger the lives of Nicaraguans and serve as an instrument to the enemies of our people, who are on a watch to discredit our revolution and its institutions.

Since most of the wounded have been youths and students and some of them and their parents have come to us to express their concern, the National Executive Committee of the 19 July Sandinist Youth agrees to create a commission made up of Fanor Herrera Perez, our delegate to the State Council; Fernando Cardenal, member of the National Executive Committee, and Ana Maria Morales, the person in charge of the Sandinist Children's Association, who will meet with the interior minister, commander of the revolution Tomas Borge and guerrilla commander Rene Rivas, national Sandinist police chief, in order to investigate the incidents in question and tell the people what is being done to the culprits.

Issued in Managua on 28 October 1980, the year of the literacy campaign.

For the National Executive Committee of the 19 July Sandinist Youth Movement [Signed] Fanor Herrera Perez.

UNIONS PROPOSE WORKER-EMPLOYER RELATIONS REFORM BILLS

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 19 Sep 80 p 10

[Text] The CST [Sandinist Workers Federation], CAUS [Center for Labor Unity and Action], CGT (i) [General Labor Confederation], CTN [Federation of Nicaraguan Workers] and CUS [Confederation for Unity of Trade Unions] central union organizations yesterday submitted to the Council of State two bills aimed at introducing reforms and order into worker-employer relations. This is the first time all the central union organizations of the country meeting in council have agreed to submit a bill to that organism.

One bill would prevent employers from continuing to delay their compliance with the Labor Ministry's decisions and the other would raise to 10,000 cordobas the limit on the amount involved in cases considered by this authority. Juan Antonio Gonzalez, a CST delegate, said that the Sandinist organization, the CAUS and the CGT (i) invited the CTN and the CUS to support this bill, which will help the workers' struggle to obtain compliance with their claims, something they can achieve at this time in view of the economic situation of the country.

The bill to reform Decree No 61 states that the amount of 4,000 cordobas, the limit in cases now considered by the ministry, is ridiculous because of salary adjustments and increases achieved by the workers, and that the temporary character of that decree should also be eliminated, so that the provision remains a part of labor procedures.

Article 2 of the decree would establish that the ministry will only consider those cases involving less than 10,000 cordobas.

No More Protection for Employers

In addition, the union organizations submitted a second bill to prevent employers from continuing to use the Protection Law to frustrate labor justice. The list of reasons states that:

1. The Sandinist People's Revolution was made by and for the workers, and the protection clause is improperly used by employers to circumvent workers' rights.

2. Belated justice is no justice at all, since the exercise of that clause demands compliance with the Labor Ministry's resolutions within at least 60 days.

3. The Labor Ministry's resolutions do not violate or contradict any article of the Basic Statute or the Statute of Rights and Guarantees; the protection clause was established to maintain the force and effectiveness of both laws; if those laws are not violated the protection clause has no reason to exist in contravention of the resolutions of the Labor Ministry.

4. To end once and for all those abuses which distort the purposes of the Protection Law and to do justice to the workers, the following was decided:

The reform applies specifically to Article 2 of the law, which would state that there will be no protection from the ministry's resolutions.

Sixty Percent of Cases Blocked by Protection Clause

Comrade Gonzalez, a CST leader, pointed out that at present 60 and even 70 percent of the labor cases decided in favor of the workers are blocked by employers' recourse to the protection clause.

CARRION DISCUSSES ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF LITERACY CRUSADE

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 19 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Conclusions

Joy is mixed with sadness in our emotions at this Second Congress, the last of the Crusade, but the first on adult education and on the new revolutionary education. The self-denial, enthusiasm and spirit of giving demonstrated on the field of the battle against ignorance have been present in this Congress. The unyielding firmness of Georgino Andrade and of all the martyrs of the National Literacy Crusade for whom we have named this Congress, has been present in the hearts and minds of each delegate. We all feel satisfied with having completed the task we are finishing today, and for this reason we must review briefly some of the major achievements of the National Literacy Crusade--and I say "some" because it is absolutely impossible at this stage to measure all the effects of this singular campaign on our life and on the national conscience.

We Are Establishing the Bases of Revolutionary Education

1. The National Literacy Crusade is establishing bases not only for adult education, but also for a true revolution in Nicaraguan education. It shows us very clearly that true education must be understood as a mutual process in which the teacher as well as the pupil has something to teach and something to learn, and that the basic principle of this education is /patriotic awareness and love of the people/ [in boldface].

It also teaches us clearly that the ways to bring our people out of their historical educational backwardness are not to be found within the frameworks formed by an archaic education, but in the enormous wealth, willingness and patriotism of our people.

It also teaches us that education must be clearly a part of the social, economic and political situation of the country and respond to the urgent need for technological methods, for qualified workers and for the professionals required by the development of our country.

It also presents us with a challenge: Will we be capable not only of maintaining, but of cultivating and developing the new, profoundly human and revolutionary values the Crusade has generated in all its participants? In other words, will we be capable of developing the embryo of the new man which has developed in the CNA [National Literacy Crusade], bringing together the best of the workers, the best of the peasants, the best of the students? /It is up to us!/ [in boldface]

We Opened the Doors to a New World

2. The Literacy Crusade has opened the doors of a new world for more than 400,000 Nicaraguans.

Ignorance, superstition, the tricks of usurers and swindlers, humiliation and shame are behind them.

Before them is the recovery of their human dignity: the right to form their own opinions; the right to know their historical roots; the right to know the causes of their poverty, so that they can fight them; the right to technical training in order to improve the quality of their work; the right to cultivate their talents and skills, reaching higher levels of training and education--all this through adult education.

Never again will they be victims of the deceit of those who forced them to fight in wars which were not their own; of those who called them brigands when they fought in a war which indeed was theirs: the Sandinist war; of those who told them that the brigade members were communists who were going to take away their lands and tell them not to believe in God. The revolution has confronted the calumnies with deeds, the lies with the impressive truth of accomplishments, and instead of taking the people's land away, it has taught them all to read and write.

The new Nicaragua is coming to life with these 400,000 Nicaraguan brothers.

The Final Offensive

3. We must not forget the valuable experience of the final offensive, in the area of politics and organization as well as in teaching. The final offensive was a kind of crusade within the Crusade. If we thought a greater degree of giving, self-denial, enthusiasm and spirit of sacrifice than that put forth in the first months of the Crusade, in the First Congress itself, was not possible, it was soon demonstrated how mistaken we were.

The final offensive demanded the last drops of energy of the thousands of literacy workers and technical advisers, who had already been working arduously for 3 months.

Our entire huge army of tens of thousands of workers regrouped its forces and pounced like a single man on the enemy it had to liquidate. It drew strength out of weakness to increase the number of class hours, to increase the visits to the UAS, and to guarantee assistance and improve the quality of the Saturday workshops.

The general staffs fully assumed their role as leaders in the final offensive, and only thanks to this enormous extra effort were we able to obtain such a resounding victory, bringing the illiteracy rate to under 13 percent. And to achieve this we did not use either money or petty means; we called solely and exclusively on the revolutionary conscience of the literacy workers. /This is why we say with pride that here is the embryo of the new man!/ [in boldface]

The Importance of the Municipality

4. The Crusade's only organizational base was the municipality, which later proved to a truly good choice and taught us many positive lessons.

In the Crusade we were able to ascertain that the municipality is a division of tremendous importance in a country like ours, where most of the people live in rural areas and therefore the knowledge and vision they have of the revolution is derived from their contact with the municipal branches of state institutions and political and mass organizations. In other words, the municipality is the side of the revolution which the people see.

In addition, we were also able to ascertain that in spite of the lack of resources and cadres and in spite of all the obstacles, when all the people's organizations and all the state and private institutions coordinate and concentrate their efforts on the achievement of certain goals, there are no barriers which can stop them. Perhaps one of the greatest lessons the Crusade taught its leaders and the people of the municipalities is precisely that the basic factor in the solution to their problems is to be found in themselves and in the collective will to solve them.

We believe this is a lesson to which all state institutions and mass organizations should pay attention.

International Solidarity

5. In a world such as today's in which international tension is increasing, in which imperialism's pretensions to war and hegemony threaten to bring humanity to the threshold of its own destruction, solidarity and the international repercussions of the Crusade encourage our hopes. As long as there are in the world men, organizations and governments capable of supporting a cause with such deep humanitarian content as literacy, humanity will not be lost.

The lamps from Switzerland, the notebooks and helicopters from Mexico, the pencils from Austria, the money from the United States, the FGR and so many other countries; the literacy workers and teachers from Costa Rica, Spain, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Puerto Rico, El Salvador, Panama, Guatemala, Uruguay, Chile, Bolivia, Colombia, Mexico, Vietnam, Hungary, France, Czechoslovakia, the GDR, Angola, Denmark and other places in the world--these are our reply to the makers of supersonic bombers and nuclear missiles, to the promoters of war and destruction. While some men devote their lives to fighting to bring millions of their brothers out of ignorance, poverty and hunger, others think only of the best way to exterminate and annihilate millions of men from the face of the earth; this is why the Crusade is also a victory in the struggle for world peace and a defeat for fascist criminals all over the world. For this reason we are and will always be deeply internationalist.

Protection By Our Armed Forces

6. When the criminal forces of the counterrevolution, the enemy of everything which favors the well-being and progress of our people, wanted to boycott the Literacy Crusade and did not hesitate to brutally murder literacy workers and teachers, our entire people closed ranks and demanded appropriate punishment for the criminals.

To this call the soldiers of our armed forces responded quickly. The police, the militia, the EPS [Sandinist People's Army] and the Ministry of Interior showed in practice in the rustic mountains of our national geography that "People, Army, Unity" is more than a slogan: it is an indestructible wall against the enemies of the revolution. They showed that the weapons wielded yesterday by Somozist mercenaries to murder our people today are in the hands of that same people to defend their homes, their families, their revolutionary conquests and the sovereignty of their fatherland.

When we recall those valiant lives offered in a supreme act of love and sacrifice, when we hear isolated voices raised in defense of those criminals and condemning the efforts of our government and armed forces to annihilate those counterrevolutionary groups, our hearts tremble with indignation. Only the accomplices of the murderers of our brothers can condemn the formation and activities of the Comandante Ezequiel Brigade.

The Crusade, A Gigantic Political Seminar

7. On one occasion one of our leaders said that the Crusade was going to be the biggest political seminar ever held. These words became a reality, and the Crusade was a gigantic seminar which had as its setting the entire country and as its instructor the people and their problems.

We are sure that when the Crusade began, most of those participating in it were not Sandinists, or perhaps many sympathized with the revolution but did not have a deep knowledge of its roots and its goals. Today, however, after 5 months of living with the most exploited sectors of our people and of intimate contact with our situation as an underdeveloped and plundered country, there are very few who do not understand why this revolution came about, why we are willing to give our lives in fighting to the death against the dictatorship, why we put up with the most cruel tortures and why more than 50,000 brothers did not hesitate to give their lives for this freedom.

Today there are very few who do not understand that our revolution is just taking its first steps: who do not understand that we cannot rest as long as thousands of children continue to die for lack of medical attention; as long as the majority of the Nicaraguan people do not even have a standard of living in keeping with their human condition; as long as poverty scourges our people with brutal force; as long as thousands of Nicaraguans lack jobs which will guarantee them the means for a decent existence. The youth, the Nicaraguan revolutionaries, will not stop until we have exterminated each and every one of the social ills which oppress our people.

Here, consciences have been formed and in each one of the thousands the enthusiasm and self-denial of the first Sandinists has been reborn.

What, if not conscience--what made 60,000 young people sacrifice without hesitation their comforts and their vacations and go far away from their families to accomplish their mission?

What, if not conscience, made them put up with hunger, disease and the difficult geographic conditions?

What, if not this conscience, made them unhesitatingly sacrifice even more, in a final offensive which was the key to victory?

What, if not this conscience, made thousands of literacy workers, far from being frightened by the crimes of the counterrevolution, raise their arms, willing to take up their weapons to annihilate these bands of murderers?

And to think there are those who call this "massification" and advocate a selfish individualism.

From this enormous source of great human talent will come the technical, professional, administrative and political cadres which our revolution requires. Participation in this experience is the guarantee of firmness, conscience and faith in the interests of our people which is indispensable in the new revolutionary cadres.

I must also emphasize that at this time tons of paper and ink are being wasted in trying to convince Christians that they cannot be Christians and revolutionaries at the same time. However, true Christians, religious as well as laymen, have not wasted any time on those theoretical theses, and through their outstanding participation in the Crusade they have demonstrated in practice that being a Christian and being a revolutionary is not only possible, but is also indispensable.

People's Democracy

8. Until 19 July 1979, the Nicaraguan people had not known democracy at any moment in their history. From that moment each step taken by our revolution has been directed at consolidating and perfecting a popular democracy. However, today some voices are raised which accuse this government of totalitarianism and dictatorship with much more vigor and belligerence than was used against Somozism.

How can they accuse of being a dictatorship a government which did not hesitate, in spite of material poverty and technical limitations, to launch this National Literacy Crusade, which is in itself a decisive step in the consolidation of democracy? If we wished to keep the people deceived and subjected, the last thing we would have done would be to teach our people to read and write.

How can they accuse of being a dictatorship a government which, carrying its generosity to the extreme, has freed elements who through naivete or confusion had collaborated with the gangs of murderers?

How can they accuse of being a dictatorship a government which places weapons in the hands of its people so that they may defend their conquests? We invite the Bolivian strongmen to give weapons to the miners to demonstrate the "democratic" orientation of their government of usurpers.

From this same rostrum during the First Congress we emphasized the role of the CNA as promoter of national unity, and we invited the parties which call themselves democratic to demonstrate in a practical way their democratic and patriotic convictions by supporting the CNA. That call is still awaiting a response. They are reticent about national unity for reconstruction, just as they were about national unity in the insurrection and only joined it when they saw that the people had won the battle.

We reiterate our call to those sectors to lay aside for a moment their personal and group interests, and, saving their electoral activity for 1984, to do something--for the first time in their history of pacts and treasons--something concrete for the benefit of the people.

I submit to the plenary session for its consideration the conclusions I have just read.

Our Deep Thanks

9. I cannot close without expressing my most profound thanks and recognition to all the departmental and municipal coordinators or the Crusade, to the youth, to all the members of the mass organizations who supported the Crusade, to all the internationalists for their support, to all the young brigade members of the EPA, to all the teachers, the MOAS [Workers Literacy Militias], to all the Peasant Literacy Militias, to the Urban Guerrillas for Literacy, to all the organizations, business firms and institutions who donated from 5 cents to several thousand dollars to finance this Crusade; nor do I want to close without expressing thanks to the National Directorate for giving me the privilege of sharing this effort with you and for giving me the opportunity now to have the greatest treasure for which I could ever have hoped--the letters from comrades who were taught to read and write and who wrote to me. Nor do I want to finish without expressing my thanks and recognition to someone whose work was very quiet and uneventful, but was really an example of self-denial, of giving, of dedication, of faith and confidence in the victory--I am speaking of Father Cardenal's secretary, Comrade Ana Saenz.

Comrades, we have finished the work of the Second Congress. We have today closed this passage in our history, but instead of being sad, we are going to celebrate it with a big party we have prepared for all of you.

WFTU CONGRESS REPORT--Companero Francisco Jose Gonzalez, secretary general of the Sandinist Workers Central [CST] in Carazo, arrived from the Soviet Union a few days ago. He reported that the CST requested admission to the WFTU during the 31st Congress of this federation. He said that the congress approved 14 general resolutions to boost the struggle of the workers on the international level. He said that the next WFTU congress will be held in Havana. Previous meetings were always held in Europe. In becoming a WFTU member, the CST will be able to get a greater solidarity. [Text] [PA302233 Managua Radio Sandino in Spanish 1800 GMT 30 Oct 80]

PSD HOLDS SEMINAR--The Social Democratic Party [PSD] has held a successful seminar in the Pedro Joaquin Chamorro Cardenal Room which was dedicated yesterday. Many speakers participated and many students attended the seminar. The seminar was named after Luis Medrano Flores, a well-remembered labor leader who was cowardly assassinated by the genocidal guard. There were speeches on the ideology and history of the social democracy in the world and about decisive differences between Marxism and the social democracy. There were speeches also about the influence of the social democracy, which as a modern political current has had much success in many European countries and in Latin America. Mario Alfaro Alvarado [not further identified], speaking at the first seminar of PSD cadres said: "Barricada and El Nuevo Diario have lost the ideological battle with LA PRENSA because they use insults in anonymous articles and give no answer to the serious problems that the Nicaraguan people expose every day." [Excerpt] [PA050347 Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 27 Oct 80 pp 1, 12]

CIA ALLEGED TRAINING GUARDSMEN--The CIA is training former Somozist guardsmen in camps in Miami for an eventual invasion of Nicaragua, (Alain) Castellon, Nicaraguan embassy counsel in Lima, has said. In a statement published in the newspaper MARKA, Castellon said the intent to meddle is abetted by representatives of the Nicaraguan bourgeois parties, who are conspiring against the Sandinist revolutionary process. He added that his country will continue to have relations with the United States but it will take action if Americans become aggressive toward the Sandinist revolution. He also said that the recent peace treaty between Honduras and El Salvador seeks to truncate the liberation process in Central America. SANDINIST THREAT IN LEON--Leon, (M.G.A.)--Julio Ramon Montes Martinez, one of the most renowned leaders of the Social Christian Party [PSC] of this city, has had the most unpleasant surprise on receiving a note with the Sandinist front seal and the Western Sandinist Coordinating Board [Coordinacion Sandinista de Occidente] seal threatening to send him to prison and also threatening to kill him if he continues his political work in the PSC. They "advise" him to leave Leon if he values his life at all. We wish to note that leader Montes Martinez has been in prison three times for his struggle in the PSC. In the month of July when he was last imprisoned, he received the support of the citizens of Leon who demanded his release. Regarding our aforementioned report, we know that Mr. Julio Ramon Montes will file a writ of habeas corpus before the Leon court to avoid being arrested. We also know that the Sandinist anonymous notes referred to have also been received by many persons in this city, that is, not only Mr. Montes received one. TORRIJOS DISCUSSES FOREIGN RELATIONS, EVENTS IN REGION

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 23 Sep 80 pp 2B, 4B, 5B

[Report on Spanish television network interview with former Panamanian President Gen Omar Torrijos at his Farallon residence, by Joaquin Soler Serrano; date of interview not given]

[Text] Gen Omar Torrijos has expressed his concern over the "defeatist and dependent attitudes" being displayed by some Latin American leaders with respect to the elections in the United States.

"Those leaders think in terms of things going better or worse depending on whether Carter, Reagan or Kennedy wins. It is almost as if the United States were about to elect God or the proconsul of the region. To me, it is indifferent: Let the Americans choose whomever they prefer."

Torrijos made these statements to the Spanish television network on a program lasting more than 1 hour.

The interview for the Spanish television network was conducted by Spanish newspaperman Joaquin Soler Serrano at the residence Torrijos frequently occupies on the Farallon beach. It was the first interview the general has granted in almost 20 months and lasts more than 1 hour on the screen. There were neither protocol nor limitations nor prior questionnaires. It was what we call in trade jargon an open-ended interview.

The Spanish television network includes this type of interview in its highly rated program titled "Sin Fronteras" [No Boundaries], which is transmitted via satellite and has a viewer audience of around 20 million persons.

So far, only public figures such as the former American secretary of state, Henry Kissinger; King Hussein of Jordan; the head of the Portuguese government, Sa Carneiro; and Venezuelan President Herrera Campins have been interviewed for "Sin Fronteras." The next interview will be with UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim.

This unique man, Omar Torrijos, of categorical and blunt speech, who is quick to take the middle of the road, who received his friend Graham Greene in bathrobe and shorts, accepts the characterization of himself by Gabriel Garcia Marquez, also his friend, as a cross between a mule and a tiger. "I respect the stubbornness and steadfastness of the mule," he said, "as well as the aggressiveness of the tiger; and I profoundly respect intellectuals, who are superior men, who see beyond the commonplace and who analyze things reliably over and above the purely conjunctural."

The Sandinist Revolution

The triumph of the Sandinist revolution is going to be a determining factor in the geopolitical change of the other Central American countries, Omar Torrijos also said during the interview for the Spanish television network.

"I know the Sandinists are not exporting revolution," he said, "but even if revolutions are not exported, their examples are always imitated."

The current convulsive process toward a change in regimes in El Salvador and Guatemala is, in the general's opinion, the result of imitating the Sandinist example.

"The government of Honduras," he said, "has very intelligently opted for the democratic transformation of the country by way of elections, and Costa Rica has enjoyed a consolidated democracy for a long time."

The situation in Nicaragua and the rest of Central America is disquieting for Panama as well "because the fighting and massacring of a young generation are taking place in countries that by virtue of their geographic nearness to us may be said to be sharing the same bed with us, although we here understood 10 years ago that either we must effect the change ourselves, integrating all sectors including those which up to then had been political outcasts, or they, those same outcast sectors, would effect it for us violently, on their own account and with help from the outside.

"Panama is thus inoculated against the revolutionary germ not because of the presence of American troops in the Canal bases, but rather because 10 years ago we undertook our revolution and self-immunized ourselves with concrete changes that did not exclude any sector of the country."

Torrijos, who asserted that there is a serious shortage of leaders in Latin America, confessed openly that he had participated in the bringing about the downfall of former Nicaraguan president Gen Anastasio Somoza Debayle, who had subjected that country to "one of the most bloody, perverted and savage dictatorships Latin America has ever endured.

"Nicaragua's rebellious youth supplied the dead bodies and Somoza supplied the bullets," he said. "I realized that the one who kills is as much an assassin as one who sees an entire people being massacred and does not intervene."

Together with Costa Rican leaders and with the then president of Venezuela, Carlos Andres Perez, Torrijos became convinced that an intervention must take place in Nicaragua "to avoid a prolongation of the massacre."

He Does Not Personify the Government

The general recalled on Spanish television his commitment to annul the 1903 treaty between Panama and the United States on use, occupation and control of the Canal Zone, which was replaced in 1977 by the Torrijos-Carter treaty, because "I refused to add another star to that country's flag and said I was interested not in a place in history but in the Canal Zone. The decolonization of the Canal is now an irreversible process."

(Paradoxically, the day the Panamanian people entered the Zone freely, Torrijos did not enter it. "I did not attend that ceremony because it was not necessary, because it was a Panamanian people's victory and not mine, and it was not I who should have entered the Zone but the Panamanian people, whom I idolize.")

Torrijos currently finds himself in a position of what he himself calls political withdrawal, inasmuch as "no leader must make himself indispensable for long; a termination must be set for every mission."

The general spends much of his time secluded in his Farallon residence overlooking the Pacific beaches, "from which I contemplate with satisfaction the leadership class that has emerged in Panama under my tutelage in the design of the new nation.

"I am not interested in returning to active politics," he said, "and if I had to go back in as the patron saint of the procession, it would mean Panama's political process had failed."

Torrijos affirmed that he will not be a candidate in the 1984 presidential elections. "That is no longer in my scale of aspirations," he said.

He added that he does not personify the government behind the scenes and from his winter garrison, and that the government is being personified, by way of election, by the president of the republic, Aristides Royo, who, like many Panamanian leaders was educated in a Spanish university.

Cuba and the United States

He evaded the answer to a question as to whether he is pro-Yankee or pro-communist so as not to fall "victim to those who settle things by labeling them, wasting their time in defining issues instead of solving them. Besides, Panama has adopted neither of those two options and has succeeded in building a new nation."

Torrijos said he has empathized well with former Presidents Daniel Oduber of Costa Rica, Carlos Andres Perez of Venezuela, Juan Domingo Peron of Argentina, and Tito of Yugoslavia, but that the saints of his greatest devotion are Carter and Fidel Castro.

Torrijos explained that he identifies with "the love for his people and the personal dignity that Fidel has shown."

The general also said that the recent massive exodus of Cuban from Mariel to the United States and other countries cannot be considered an isolated episode. It was, he said, the consequence of the blockade the United States has imposed on Cuba, but that "that Caribbean people, however, is not going to let itself be humiliated.

"The Americans," he said, "are committing one of the gravest of injustices, and every minute of blockade is 60 minutes of shame for the hemisphere."

He spoke of Carter as being "a new attitude in the United States, a profoundly moral man who is above the establishment and who has lowered the level of shame certain American politicians had attained."

Nixon, on the other hand, according to Torrijos, has a blacklist of Latin American leaders that had to be eliminated, "and among them was I."

The United States is full of politicians and greatly lacking in statesmen, Torrijos also said. "In dealing with Cuba, there have been many politicians but no statesmen; as has been said before, politicians are those who think in terms of the next elections, whereas statesmen are those who think in terms of the next generations. Just as the world's inventory of leaders is diminishing, so also is the United Stater's inventory of statesmen."

Three Countries in Agreement

Torrijos tells the story of the former shah of Iran in Panama (from which it is clear that the latter country together with the United States and Iran were in virtual agreement) in the following terms:

"The presence of the shah in the United States put the world on the verge of a conflict and Panama agreed to admit Reza Pahlevi here as a moral imperative and necessary condition for peace. He entered without any prior conditions and without our expecting anything of him or of anyone else in return for our having admitted him, even though we were aware of the reprisals to which we were exposing ourselves; but we placed the alleviation of world tension above all considerations of reprisals. When he arrived in Isla Contadora, the Iranian authorities contacted us. We sent a delegation to Tehran, and that delegation became convinced that the Iranian authorities themselves did not want the ex-emperor in Tehran. We would moreover have lost our credibility had we turned over to them a man we had invited into our country. Furthermore, our judicial system forbids our turning over a person whose ultimate fate will be execution. The Iranians knew perfectly well therefore that even though they requested his extradition we would be compelled to refuse. Subsequently, in response to Sadat's invitation, and seeking medical resources more in keeping with his cultural patterns, he moved of his own will to Egypt, with a letter of gratitude to us. We consulted with Tehran on his transfer to Egypt, and Tehran asked us to do our utmost to persuade him to remain in Panama, as his nearness to the region of conflict could cause them grave problems.

"However, since we had imposed no prior condition on his being here, he entered freely and left when he wanted to; and he did want to leave."

Torrijos also recounts that he spent much time with the shah and followed his illness closely. "He was a cultured man, and was perfectly aware of the seriousness of his illnes. He was educated to be a king within the cultural patterns that define a king, with which I do not empathize, although I respect them. But in addition to the cancer or lymphoma from which he suffered, he was burdened by a profound sadness that we cannot feel, which is the sadness of no longer being king. His illness and his sadness drained him of all will to fight, and the only thing he asked was a secure place to ultimately bury his remains."

With regard to the attitude of former Empress Farah Diva, Torrijos says that she is "a very concerned woman over the fate of her husband, but, by the game rules of the Persian monarchy, situated at a certain distance from the sovereign. She is also very concerned for the fate of her children."

Isabelita, Prisoner Without Hope

Torrijos met Peron when the former worked as a captain in the Panamanian airport of Tocumen. "I saw in Peron's liking for me a seeming desire to convey to me certain of his experiences. Isabelita was but the self-sacrificing wife of a leader, of one of the greatest leaders Latin America has ever had. This is why I have for 4 years been asking the Argentine Military Junta to release that woman, trying to persuade them that the world is more compassionate than revengeful and that the detention of a lady is inelegant. Peron would not have detained the wife of any of Argentina's military heads of today. I asked President Royo to send my brother Hugo as ambassador to Buenos Aires. But my brother found no one there with whom he could discuss the matter, and I recently requested his return to Panama, which was also granted."

Torrijos asserts that Maria Estela Martinez de Peron is a political prisoner, even though she is under house and private arrest in lodgings of her own property. "The bars of political prisons are made of vindictiveness; they do not respond to a penal system but rather to motives of incomprehension toward those who have rebelled or dissented against the constituted authority. We have strived for the liberation of other political prisoners in America, without fanfare. We have helped some 300 persons a year to escape from Cuba and more than 3,000 from Chile. But with Isabelita there is no hope, because there is no response, because we are denied dialog."

Admirer of Spain

General Torrijos visits Spain frequently and confesses his admiration for that country.

"I have had good relations with Spanish political leaders. I knew the king before he was crowned. I knew Suarez, Felipe Gonzalez and Santiago Carrillo. I admire them because it is very difficult for a country that has endured 40 years of iron-fisted political control and of democratic blackout, to make a peaceful transition into coexistence and tolerance. The architects of this transition have been the king, Suarez and Felipe Gonzalez. The role that Latin America hopes Spain will fulfill is that of continuing to aid us, because under no regime has there been an interruption of cultural interchanges, as is evident from the fact that our principal cadres have been educated in Spanish universities. An example of this is the president himself of Panama, Aristedes Royo, one of the most significant and best equipped men this generation has produced, who studied at the university of Salamanca."

Torrijos concluded his interview for the Spanish television network with a reiteration that he will not be a candidate in Panama's 1984 presidential elections.

During his interview, he also said he does not consider himself as meriting the Nobel Peace Prize, for which he has been proposed, and that it irks him when the subject is brought up in the news media. In one of his so-called blunt statements, referring to the United States presence in the Panama Canal Zone, he said: "No wrong can last 100 years, and no people will endure it."

SELECTED PRESS ITEMS ON MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS

Candidates Outline Platforms

Lima EL COMERCIO in Spanish 6 Oct 80 p 4

/Text/ Four slates will appear on the ballot for the Lima Provincial Council elections which will be held on 23 November. The slates are headed by Eduardo Orrego Villacorta of the AP /Popular Action/, Justo Enrique Debarbieri Riojas of the PAP /Aprista Party of Peru/, Ricardo Amiel Meza of the PPC /Popular Christian Party/ and Alfonso Barrantes Lingan of the IU /United Left/.

POPULAR ACTION--Eduardo Orrego Villacorta (architect) who resigned a few days after being named to the post of Transportation and Communications to run for mayor of Lima, announced that he would take his campaign to "every district" until the eve of the 23 November elections. He expressed confidence that he will receive more than the 45 percent received by the AP in the 18 May elections.

Basically, he is calling for a return of the functions and authority taken by the central government from the local governments. He emphasizes that it was vital for the local governments to regain control of everything related to such public services as water, sewerage, transportation, energy, food sales and so forth.

APRA--Justo Enrique Debarbieri Riojas (former rector of the Federico Villareal National University) says that the first problem to be tackled is that of food. His campaign slogan will be: "Human development before urban development." He is confident that he will be elected mayor of Lima.

He announced that as an educator he will carry out a project of great importance to help Lima residents. "We want to win so that we may serve," he told reporters shortly after he filed 8 days ago with the Provincial Court of Lima.

On the problem of sanitation and street vendors he said that the solution required a broad study. "We are friends and defenders of street vendors," he said.

POPULAR CHRISTIAN PARTY--Ricardo Amiel Meza (engineer) said that his government plan for the greater Lima area will be based on Social Christian doctrine which recovers gains for the individual and the family by promoting the highest relations in society.

He said that he would make his plan public as soon as he begins his campaign. He did say that it essentially and automatically covers regional and urban problems. The plan also includes everything "we must promote to make possible the harmonious development of greater Lima."

Amiel Meza said that as mayor he would use modern techniques of food storage and transportation. In addition, he said that he will give priority consideration to the sanitation problem now facing the city."

UNITED LEFT--Alfonso Barrantes Lingan (attorney) favors an authentic local government, recovery of Lima's autonomy and that it cease to function as an administrative appendage of the central government.

He announced that one of his major concerns will be to improve the food supplies and health of the people. He also will sponsor the establishment of social services centers, conveniently located medical centers with adequate medical supplies. Barrantes also said that he would pay special attention to neighborhood participation through popular organizations.

To achieve economic recovery in the cities, he expressed support for converting the communes into property and land owners as a means of guaranteeing them adequate sources for supplementing their current revenues.

Speculations, Predictions

Lima EXPRESO in Spanish 2 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Manuel Dornellas: "Voice and Vote"]

[Text] Is the nomination of Justo Enrique Debarbieri as an APRA candidate in the upcoming elections a victory for Townsend?

The selection of Justo Enrique Debarbieri as APRA's candidate for mayor of Lima is very definitely a victory for Andres Townsend who publicly supported his candidacy.

This is probably a surprise for the Townsend faction since Townsend maintained that it was necessary to fight the "party machine." The fact that that same party "machine" endorsed Townsend's candidate leaves the Townsend faction without any arguments, at least on this subject.

Aside from this, it is worth asking whether there is a subtle maneuver by Armando Villaneuva's faction behind this nomination. With Debarbieri as Townsend's candidate, what happens if the APRA candidate comes in a distant second or worse yet if he comes in third? In that event, would it be an APRA defeat or a defeat for Townsend's faction? The selection of Debarbieri, in other words, could be in the end a pyrrhic victory for Townsend.

Was Debarbieri the favorite of APRA's rank and file in Lima?

The rank and file selected Alfredo Barnechea to be their candidate for mayor of Lima at the APRA convention held in Lima on 15 September. But the people's mandate was later ignored by the PAP leadership which unsuccessfully offered the candidacy to Fernando Cabieses and Ernesto Aramburu Menchaca.

Finally, this past Sunday APRA's political commission decided to give Debarbieri the task of representing his party in the November election following Fernando Leon de Vivero's effort to have Barnechea--who was never formally asked--head APRA's slate in the municipal elections.

In this respect, according to those familiar with the inner workings of Haya de la Torre's party, there apparently was disagreement within the commission along generational lines since the younger members--i.e., Alan Garcia, Luis Alva and Luis Negrieiros--were inflexible opponents of Barnechea's candidacy which was backed by Javier Valle Riestra and the older APRA members with the glaring exception, we are told, of Luis Alberto Sanchez.

What is Debarbeiri's major weakness?

APRA's candidate for mayor of Lima has a tremendous advantage over his internal opponents. He represents party unity because he was fielded by Townsend and backed by prominent disciples of Armando Villaneuva.

On the other hand, on the negative side, there is his long association with the Federico Villarreal University--of which he is rector--an institution which correctly or not has the reputation for being the bastion of that party's activists.

/Text/ The left has not been able to achieve unity for the November municipal elections as witnessed by the filing of separate slates in different districts throughout the nation.

In the case of Lima, the Trotskyite PRT /Revolutionary Workers Party/ presented candidates for mayor and city council in seven districts where the IU had already presented a slate of candidates. The districts are Carabayllo, La Victoria, Rimac, San Juan de Lurigancho, San Juan de Miraflores and San Martin de Porres.

In explaining why they decided to present their own candidates, the PRT spokesman said that they were not pleased with the participation of the PSR /Socialist Revolutionary Party/ and the FNTC /Workers and Peasants National Front/ in the IU because they are "bourgeois parties."

The PRT spokesman said, however, that in the specific case of Lima it would give its "critical support" to the IU candidate, Alfonso Barrantes Lingan, because he is a "steadfast revolutionary."

DUTCH AID CONTRIBUTES TO STABLE 'NEW ORDER' IN SURINAME

Emergency Program Started

Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 4 Oct 80 p 1

[Article by Frans van Klaveren]

[Text] After 5 days of deliberations the Committee Development Cooperation Netherlands-Suriname (Cons) approved in principle 96 percent of all projects submitted by Suriname.

This means that President and Prime Minister Chin A Sen can begin to execute his urgency program. In person he will inform the media on Tuesday exactly which projects are involved. The total sum of development funds involved amounts to 500 million guilders.

After the completion of the successful discussions the chairman of the Dutch Cons delegation, Prof Dr F. van Dam, said: "We have learned from the past" when projects were inadequately executed.

Remarkable is the streamlining applied to guarantee fast execution of Chin A Sen's emergency program. To speed things up the Cons has set up a body called the Committee Urgency Program (Cup) which can give final approval to projects already approved in principle.

The Netherlands will also contribute 1 million Suriname guilders to a "monitoring center" which will be part of the Plan Bureau. Suriname also gave 1 million Surinamese guilders. This center is supposed to eliminate difficult situations in the execution of the projects.

It reports on a weekly basis to the president and prime minister on progress in the execution of the projects. The center will be in constant contact with the civil servants responsible for the execution of the urgency projects.

The amount of 500 million guilders needed to finance the urgency program was brought together through reallocation of already promised but not yet paid out amounts and by changes in the allocation of funds agreed upon in December of last year by Minister De Koning and the Surinamese minister Cambridge.

Dutch Support Emergency Program

Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 4 Oct 80 p 13

[Article by Frans van Klaveren]

[Text] The Netherlands has laid a solid foundation for the "new order of things" in Suriname by making 500 million guilders available for Suriname's government leader Chin A Sen's urgency program. After 5 days of deliberations between the Surinamese and the Dutch delegations of Cons (Committee Development Cooperation Netherlands-Suriname) it was announced in Paramaribo that more than 96 percent of the projects submitted by Suriname had been approved in principle.

This important solution for Suriname does not come as a surprise. After the partial failure of Dutch Minister of Development and Cooperation De Koning's visit to Suriname 2 months ago, one of the causes of a chilling effect on the relationship between the two countries, it was clear that no stone would be left unturned to prevent a further worsening of relations. Since Minister De Koning already promised full cooperation with Chin A Sen's urgency program--only the Surinamese demand that the promised funds be protected against inflation ruined the situation--it was important that projects acceptable to both countries be listed on the Cons-agenda. To prevent disagreeable surprises the Dutch Cons chairman, Prof Dr F. van Dam, traveled a month ago to Paramaribo for preliminary discussions. The result, according to the delcaration of both Cons delegations, was that the discussions took place in "a cordial, businesslike, and cooperative atmosphere." Or, as expressed after one of the meetings was finished, by adviser Hans van Mierlo: "Conflicts remained in harmony."

Suriname submitted a list of 57 projects in total, one more was added later. Of these 58 projects, 55 were approved in principle, of which 25 definitely; this amounts to 167 million Surinamese guilders.

Before the start of the Cons discussions President and Prime Minister Chin A Sen pointed out the importance of the beginning at last of the actual development of Suriname.

"The Netherlands is to Suriname what Russia is to Cuba and the American lobby to Israel." According to him the 15th Cons meeting should be the end of the past, when the poor did not benefit at all from the spending of development funds.

The combativeness of Chin A Sen's government declaration is also noticeable in the way new agreements were made within the framework of the Cons discussions. "With a view to the character of this urgency program" the approval of projects can be accelerated in the meantime.

To this end the Committee Urgency Program (Cup) was established; Cons is represented in it by the secretaries of both sections assisted by experts. Projects which could not be definitely approved at the Cons meeting will be referred to the Cup and can be approved by this body. If the Cup cannot reach a decision the problems will be resubmitted to the Cons.

If needed, an interim approval procedure to be decided by both chairmen can be used.

The Cup also holds a decisive voice in the choice of advising bureaus, which are needed to work out the details and prepare specifications of urgency projects and their budgets if the funds are coming from the Dutch development aid.

Watchdog

To report delays in the execution of projects and facilitate their elimination the Surinamese government--"to the great satisfaction" of the Cons committee--has instituted an "urgency program monitoring center" within the framework of the Plan Bureau. This center of seven experts acts as watchdog. Every week the team will have to report to the Prime Minister on progress in the execution of the urgency projects, present solutions to troublesome points, and suggest possibilities to increase efficiency.

If money is needed to eliminate problems the monitoring center has monitoring funds at its disposal, specially created for this purpose. Suriname and The Netherlands each contribute 1 million Surinamese guilders, which gives the fund a starting capital of 2 million guilders.

The 15th Cons meeting had to solve the problem of finding 500 million guilders for the urgency program. It was achieved through Wheeling and dealing, or, in Cons terminology, "reallocation of already allocated sums of money." In the end the parity fund was charged with a reserve fund established in the past to a total of 115 million guilders.

Reproaches

Surinamese reproaches about delays in transferring funds from The Netherlands will be something of the past.

As regards money transfers it was agreed in principle that requests will be submitted quarterly, but the possibility of interim requests is not excluded. The question now is which of the projects were approved in principle or definitely by the 15th Cons meeting, and which of the listed projects will be announced by President and Prime Minister Chin A Sen in person. Political observers in Paramaribo consider this a sign that Chin A Sen is happy about the result of the discussions, which will ultimately be the basis of his urgency program.

The next--16th--Cons meeting will be chaired by Prof Van Dam on 22 November; again in Paramaribo, because according to the agreement all Cons meetings will from now on be held in the Surinamese capital.

TRANSFER OF SOMOZA GUARDS ALLEVIATES NICARAGUAN-HONDURAN BORDER PROBLEMS

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 11 Oct 80 p 34

[Text] Tegucigalpa--The border problems between Honduras and Nicaragua prompted by the presence of former Nicaraguan national guardsmen there have been considerably alleviated, it was reported.

Murder, pillaging, assault, rape and armed holdups have practically disappeared since the Government Ministry ordered the former Somoza guardsmen transferred to the northern part of the country.

The residents of the departments of El Paraiso and Choluteca have returned to their normal, everyday activities now that the Nicaraguans have been transferred to San Pedro Sula and environs.

The problem now is the presence of similar elements on Nicaraguan territory who are taking advantage of the lack of border surveillance to enter Honduran territory and commit crimes, especially cattle rustling.

The hope is that drastic measures will be decided on at the meeting next Tuesday between the foreign minister of Honduras, Cesar Elvir Sierra, and the foreign minister of Nicaragua Miguel D'Escoto, in Tegucigalpa.

MEXICO, GUATEMALA STUDY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT

Guatemala City PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 14 Oct 80 p 6

[Text] Engineers from Mexico and Guatemala are conducting studies to determine whether it is advisable or not to build a dam on the Usumacinta River on the border between the two countries, Deputy Tomas Zepeda Guzman, the president of the legislature, said yesterday.

"The Mexicans are interested in building a hydroelectric plant, which would flood lands in both Mexico and Guatemala. So, we have to see whether the tradeoff of lands for electrical energy is a good one.

"In any case," he indicated, "the river waters between the two countries belong to the one that uses them. If Mexico builds the dam, it will have to compensate Guatemala on the basis of a partnership between the two countries. The costs would be lower, and we would both share in the profits from the power generation.

"The problem is that if Guatemala does not build the dam, Mexico will because it is very interested."

Peten Itza Lake

"We are concerned about the situation of the people living on the shore of Peten Itza Lake in Flores and elsewhere, because of the property damage they have suffered, which has forced them to abandon their homes.

"We could immediately build a breakwater to save the city and the property and lives of Flores residents," he indicated, "and then later build a tunnel to save the other cities by the shores of the lake, but this would take more time."

This water could also be used to irrigate fields. The National Forestry Service has a million quetzales for such a project from the exemption taxes that Peten has generated. These unused taxes could be channeled into this project to save the department capital and several of its municipalities.

Oil

Deputy Zepeda Guzman also commented that there is oil in Peten. Exploration has been done in San Francisco, and oil was found, but not in marketable quantities. Therefore, the drilling has to go deeper. "Exploration will continue in various places, such as El Naranjo and elsewhere."

VIOLA'S MILITARY CAREER HIGHLIGHTED

Buenos Aires CONVICCION in Spanish 4 Oct 80 p 12

[Text] The future president of the nation, retired Lt Gen Roberto Eduardo Viola, was born on 13 October 1924. The president at the time (between the two terms of Hipolito Yrigoyen) was Dr Marcelo Torcuato de Alvear, who was about the same age as the former army commander will be when he takes office.

Realizing his calling early in life, he entered the Military College of the Nation in March 1942, graduating as a second lieutenant on 21 December 1944. During this short period of his initial military studies, the presidency was held by Dr Ramon S. Castillo and Pedro Pablo Ramirez, with Gen Edelmiro J. Farrell coming to power afterwards. A series of changes, gains and setbacks brought Peron to the president's office 10 months before Roberto Viola received his lieutenant's insignia.

During the 10 years from then until 1955, our future president gained the rank of first lieutenant (1948) and then captain, the rank that he held when he opportunely joined the Liberating Revolution. Four years before, during tumultuous 1951 and the uprising of Gen Benjamin Menendez (senior) against the incumbent regime, 1st Lieutenant Viola took the entrance exam for the Superior War School and became a captain. His last post prior to September 1955 was in the Third Army Command, the first under the government of Lt Gen Pedro Eugenio Aramburu, the head of the Services Group of General Lemos School.

From 20 September to 13 November 1955, the presidential residence was occupied by Gen Eduardo Lonardi, who explained the triumphant movement in the following terms: "Argentina gave the world the first example of an absolutely totalitarian government, armed with all of the weapons of propaganda, supported by a deceived but considerable segment of the population and finally defeated not by a foreign war but by the love for freedom and the cult of honor."

While Lieutenant General Aramburu was president, Captain Viola was promoted to major (December 1956), taught at the General Lemos School (November 1957) and then served as a staff officer at the War Ministry (December of the same year).

On 1 May 1958, in an initial bid to return to democracy, Aramburu handed over power to Dr Arturo Frondizi, who began a term that concluded abruptly with his overthrow in 1962. Meanwhile, Maj Roberto Viola was taking the second part of the Information Course for staff officers; he then joined the army general staff and was promoted to lieutenant colonel in December 1960.

Frondizi, overthrown in March 1962, was succeeded by Dr Jose Maria Guido, who put Dr Arturo Illia in office on 12 October 1963. During these months, Lieutenant Colonel Viola was serving in the War Secretariat and then at the Chief Army Command.

Under Dr Illia's administration Viola was part of a military delegation that visited the United States; he was promoted to colonel in December 1965 and took the Superior Strategy Course for colonels.

The Argentine Revolution, headed by Lt Gen Juan Carlos Ongania, toppled President Arturo Illia on 28 June 1966. At the time, Col Roberto Viola was taking the Orientation Course for unit commanders. He had also visited the United States a second time and was appointed adviser to the Argentine delegation to the Inter-American Defense Board and later (December 1969) assistant director of the Military College of the Nation.

Ongania resigned on 8 June 1970 and was succeeded by Lt Gen Roberto Marcelo Levingston, who in turn resigned in March 1971. This period found Viola serving as an aide to the Officer Evaluations Board.

In 1971, he saw the presidency assumed by Lt Gen Alejandro Agustin Lanusse, who, in a second attempt at a return to democracy, handed over power to Dr Hector J. Campora. Peronism was back in power, and in the preceeding years subversion had been creating a highly explosive situation in the country.

With Lanusse in charge of the country, Colonel Viola headed up the delegation of the Military College that visited the Panama Canal and the United States, became commander of the Third Infantry Brigade in late 1971 and was promoted to the rank of brigadier general in December of that year.

Lanusse's term was followed by the "interregna" of Campora (May to July 1973) and Raul Lastiri (July to October). Peron then became president for the third time, serving until his death on 1 July 1974, when for the first time in the country's history a woman, Maria Estela Martinez de Peron, took office as president. The economy was artificially propped up and beset with runaway inflation, and subversion was mounting day after day. The country was a powder keg.

In the meantime, Brig Gen Roberto Viola served successively as a member of the Officer Evaluation Board; second commander and chief of staff of the Second Army Corps Command; secretary of the General Army Command; commander of the Third Corps in Cordoba; chief of staff of the General Army Command (August 1975) and late that year was promoted to major general, at which rank he carried out missions in several neighboring countries.

After all civilian recourses had failed, Lt Gen Jorge Rafael Videla took over as president of the republic on 29 March 1976, pursuant to a decision by the Military Junta, 5 days after the uprising on the 24 which marked the return to power of the Armed Forces and the beginning of the current National Reorganization Process.

In November 1977, Maj Gen Roberto Viola headed up the delegation to the 12th Conference of Armies of the Americas and performed various functions until 31 July 1978.

On that day he was promoted to the highest military rank. He became Lieutenant General Viola, commander in chief of the army and, according to the regulations of the process, a member of the Military Junta, the nation's highest institution.

As a member of the upper echelons of Argentine military leadership, he has been decorated by the government of Bolivia and by the armies of Venezuela, Peru, Paraguay and Colombia.

As of 31 December 1979, when he retired as commander in chief of the army and was replaced by Lt Gen Leopoldo Galtieri, he became one of the choices for president in 1981.

Yesterday, 3 October 1980, 10 days before his 56th birthday, retired Lt Gen Roberto Eduardo Viola, who is married to Nelida Giorgio and has two children and grandchildren, was appointed second president of the National Reorganization Process, a post that he will assume on 29 March 1981, when Lieutenant General Videla's term ends.

Lt Gen Roberto Eduardo Viola

MARTINEZ DE HOZ REAFFIRMS CONTINUITY OF ECONOMIC POLICY

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 11 Oct 80 pp 1, 9

[Text] Economy Minister Dr Jose Alfredo Martinez de Hoz asserted that, according to official statistics, real wages have increased 20 percent from the second half of 1976 to the present and reiterated that the current economic program has not generated social costs inasmuch as there is full employment.

He also appealed to "the responsibility of everyone involved in production, manufacturing and marketing" and asked that they figure the value added tax into their prices while deducting the savings provided them by several government measures, such as the elimination of the employer contribution to pensions and to FONAVI [National Housing Fund].

Dr Martinez de Hoz made these statements during a radio interview in which he analyzed extensively his performance as economy minister for the last 5 years, reiterating that the new minister would not make changes in current policy, because it "is approved by the Military Junta."

He defended his ministry's industrial policy, noting that its aim is to "strengthen Argentine industry" through "the incentive" represented by "both foreign and domestic" competition, inasmuch as industry had previously been "overprotected," which impeded its progress.

During the interview he denied that next year could turn out to be "difficult" for the country in terms of meeting its commitments to improve what is called the foreign debt profile, in other words, to stagger chronologically the expiration dates of the country's overseas commitments and liabilities.

Continuity of Economic Policy

In his replies Martinez de Hoz again confirmed that the next economy minister would continue the policy that he has been pursuing at the Finance Palace, inasmuch as "it was approved by the Armed Forces, which head up this government. Thus, there is no political party change" since "the Armed Forces are the ones in charge during this period," and the same goes for the Military Junta, "which is going to continue in 1981" and which "incidentally, is the same one that set forth the political foundations for the 1981-84 government term."

He acknowledged that the guidelines are not rigid and can be applied in various ways, inasmuch as "we ourselves have had to employ different systems to react to economic developments so that we could have the capacity to respond and attain better results."

He also underscored that our future president, retired Lt Gen Roberto Viola, "was part of the process and was closely tied to it as commander in chief and as a member of the junta until very recently, which means that his involvement is a guarantee of continuity, and this has been the understanding on all sides."

Industrial Policy

He went on to say that the previous policy had made Argentine industry "weak and not vigorous enough" in general terms, conceding that "there are exceptions" but adding that this sector no longer needs the previous "kid gloves protection."

"We have to moderate protectionism," he added, "which does not mean that it is going to vanish." He stressed that "we still have one of the highest levels of tariff protection in the world," and therefore "we have not moved to zero protection overnight."

Dr Martinez de Hoz emphasized later on that the aim is "to produce in this country everything that we can under the best possible conditions in terms of costs, price and quality" and that what does not meet these conditions "ought to be imported" so that we can have an end product that will go on the market at competitive prices" to benefit "domestic consumers" and the country, which can secure other markets to achieve higher sales volumes and practice what is called an economy of scale."

Despite this, he conceded that "in some cases" there could be a "political decision to produce certain things, not so much end products as raw materials that are important industrial inputs." He specifically mentioned steel, noting that "our country, like any other country that can do so, ought to have a sufficient degree of steel self-sufficiency to safeguard against shortages and fluctuations in world prices."

The 'Social Cost'

He was then asked about the economic program's so-called "social cost." The economy minister downplayed such a possibility, stating that "I do not think that we can talk seriously about a social cost in a country in which there is no unemployment, in which real wages have risen, in which there is no hunger, in which there are job opportunities for all and in which we are creating conditions for equal opportunity by eliminating all excessive privileges, subsidies and state giveaways."

Later, he declined to comment on whether the year would end with two-digit inflation: "Let's consider that a matter for guesswork or curiosity." He pointed out, however, that he hoped that this would come about.

Towards the close of the interview he said that as a private citizen he would continue contributing wherever possible to the success of the process, after having been called on by the country "to make a personal contribution over the past 5 years," during which "my activities have been many."

Lastly, he expressed the hope that the next economy minister "would be imbued with the same basic principles" that he followed and that "are the ones that have guided the policy of the Armed Forces during this process," emphasizing his belief that it could not be otherwise because if he were not, he would not be appointed.

RECENT EFFORTS AT LABOR UNITY DISCUSSED

[Excerpts] The new labor federation has begun pursuing its activities, normally it seems, by holding the two recent meetings of representatives from the three largest factions of the Argentine union movement. This federation was established after many efforts by the various factions and at a time when several groups of unions and union affiliates in the interior had begun an active campaign "for an immediate resolution of the unity problem."

As anticipated, the leaders of the new federation were appointed, albeit not definitively, in accordance with the records of those who took part in the prior meetings and represented major trade unions. We should also point out that both the secretariat, which so far will consist of 9 members, and the future 30-man Board of Directors will be made up of labor leaders with differing leanings in the multifaceted labor picture at present.

They include people with clear-cut Peronist roots and who at one point formed the so-called Peronist Union Movement, as well as the antiverticalists who during the government that was overthrown in March 1976 had already ceased showing absolute obedience to the regime and had even organized a bloc with its own independent characteristics and with a different political background, such as the case of those with a radical background.

Also included are those who have stated (and we have so reported on several occasions) the "need for in-depth self-criticism and a clear-cut return to democratic forms of union life by taking advantage of the provisions of the new union law, which basically aim at future elections of new administrative commissions for all orgqnizations."

Voting Method

This complex picture, which certainly does not enable us to use such trendy union expressions as "monolithic unity," has led to the first disagreements that the brand new CGT [General Labor Confederation] will have to deal with. One of them, which will perhaps be the major item on the agenda at the meeting scheduled for next Tuesday at 1600 hours at the tobacco workers local, will be the method of voting for the Board of Directors. According to the accounts garnered from circles close to the three groups, the CNT faction will defend the voting system by number of members, which the now dissolved CGT used to employ. Under this system, although each of the three groups would have 10 representatives on the board, the CNT, which comprises the largest trade unions, would have 26 votes. The Commission of the 20 would have 12 or 14, at best, and the Commission of the 25 would get 10.

Inevitably then, these two factions, which insisted on maintaining the coequality of previous talks and on transferring it to the decisionmaking system of the new labor federation, will oppose the CNT stand, which this faction seems to be clinging to with particular firmness.

A prior agreement is not ruled out, inasmuch as at all of the meetings so far there has prevailed a desire to surmount all of the differences standing in the way of normal workings for the CGT; this is again according to what the various representatives have said.

Contacts With Viola and Harguindeguy

As always happens in these cases, the issue will most likely be taken up at several joint meetings; this will require considerable "discussion time," which will take up most of the period until the new national authorities assume their posts. Furthermore, this is all the more likely because many leaders do not want to rush into decisions, preferring to wait so that the major problems affecting the workers can be explained to and taken up with the new government. In this regard, we should emphasize the report that president-to-be Viola "has been informed in detail concerning the seriousness of the problem of job source losses and realizes how urgently steps have to be taken to prevent this troublesome situation besetting a large part of industry from becoming widespread unemployment."

Meanwhile, dialogs will continue with the current interior minister. Gen Harguindeguy will receive a faction of the group called 32 Democratic Trade Unions, which will be represented by two labor leaders from the interior, one of them from Rosario. There will also be a meeting with CNT representatives Alberto Jorge Triaca, Ramon Antonio Baldassini, Enrique Venturini and Ruben Marcos. Delegations from the Commission of the 20 and the 25 Trade Unions are also expected to see him over the next few weeks. If these meetings are held, or at least the last three, it will mean that the CGT has not yet begun to operate, not even in terms of its relations with the current authorities, and that the labor leaders have adopted the approach that some of them have described as "waiting to talk to Viola."

'LA PRENSA' POINTS TO POLICY OF VACILLATION FOR MIDEAST CONFLICT

[Editorial: "The Mideast War"]

[Text] The Mideast war between Iran and Iraq, which are undertaking military operations using all types of weapons short of nuclear arms, is exceptional in a number of facets, because of its specific repercussions on the interests of the United States, the Soviet Union and industrialized countries like Japan and the members of the European Economic Community. The outbreak of the war apparently caught the Foreign Ministries of these countries by surprise, as well as those of the Arab world, which explains the vacillations and contradictions marking the policies that they have in general pursued since the conflict began.

European observers feel that while the combatants butcher each other in battle, the United States and the Soviet Union, though they have not squared off militarily, are nevertheless involved, in effect, in a fierce political and strategic struggle. In this regard, they point out that "the two giants are furtively getting their respective collaborators ready," inasmuch as Moscow has entered into a friendship treaty with Syria, and Washington, aside from having secured an offer for military bases on Egyptian soil, has undertaken efforts in Kenya, Somalia and the Arab Emirates to get permission to establish military depots and bases there.

One of the facets of the strategy that the two superpowers are trying to implement politically can be seen in the friendship between Libya and Syria. Although it is not too significant militarily, it could have an impact on the ever-changing relations among other Arab countries. Qadhafi's diplomatic offensive was probably originally aimed at achieving the dual objective of striking at Sadat and attacking the United States. Qadhafi's intentions of discrediting Sadat in the eyes of the Arab world and of inciting the Islamic world to halt the U.S. march towards the Persian Gulf are obvious. With respect to the Soviet Union, which is discreetly at work inside Foreign Ministries, it intends to exert indirect pressure on Turkey and, at the same time, warn Iran and Iraq that it could use its influence both to strengthen a front against Iran or to do the opposite. In other words, without intervening openly in the conflict, it is in a position to exert a favorable or unfavorable impact on either of the two combatants.

The concentration of the American fleet in the Indian Ocean is not just a move to counter the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan. It is designed to keep open the Straits of Hormuz, which are involved in the conflict, should this become necessary. Nor is it a secret, in the wake of a calculated indiscretion by Sadat, that there is a close understanding between the United States and Saudi Arabia and that the United States might expand its bases on Saudi territory. Sadat's intention is to secure a more categorical and clear-cut attitude on the part of all the governments that are determined to oppose the Soviet presence in the war region, so that in addition to obtaining the above concessions, the United States can take advantage of them through the corresponding military installations. And Sadat's policy also applies to the EEC countries, which he is urging to follow the indicated course of action.

According to the latest news reports, President Carter has for the first time described Iraq's attack as "aggression" and reiterated his opposition to any attempt to seize Iranian territory. U.S. policy towards the conflict is also unquestionably affected by the hostage issue, which is a real nightmare for American leaders, and hence the American president has expressed his willingness to meet with the Iranian prime minister to discuss the matter, but the prime minister's reaction has not been favorable so far. At the United Nations, Mohammad Ali Rajai lashed out at the two superpowers, the United States in particular, for trying "to impose a new Israel" in the Middle East by supporting Iraq. He went on to say that it is even trying to do this "under the banner of Arab nationalism." U.S. State Department spokesmen said that there was no indication whatsoever that Mohammad Ali Rajai was willing to discuss the hostage issue during his visit to the United Nations.

According to U.S. Defense Department statements, the country is capable of assuring access to the Persian Gulf but it does not yet have available the materiel to undertake a major land war in the region. At present, it has 2 large aircraft-carriers with minesweeper helicopters and fighter bombers in the Indian Ocean, aside from 21 cargo vessels, all of which would enable it to transport artillery, munitions and water for a reinforced Marine brigade of 10,000 to 12,000 men. The same source explained that if the hostilities were to directly affect the United States, the Pentagon would have available 200,000 combat-ready troops, without reducing its commitments to NATO, in addition to 100,000 reservists.

This, then, is the knotty picture offered as of now by the Mideast war, the development and results of which are closely tied to the oil needs of the superpowers and the industrialized countries. If supplies to the United States, Japan and the EEC nations were eventually threatened (the Soviet Union can supply itself, with the aid of other communist countries), the conflict could quickly become extremely serious. And so, the diplomatic war continues, while the other, military war, the one that Iran and Iraq are absurdly waging, drags on with its heavy toll of destruction and death, a war that can never be justified by the reasons cited.

COLUMNIST STRESSES GEOPOLITICAL SIGNIFICANCE OF SOUTH ATLANTIC

Buenos Aires CONVICCION in Spanish 12 Oct 80 p 12

[Article by Martin Olivera on speech by Adm Armando Lambruschini]

[Text] "Argentina and the South Atlantic are no longer some sort of detached, peripheral region of the world; this is a region of the utmost geostrategical value, bordering on communication routes that are vital to the planet's largest population centers."

These remarks are from the speech that Adm Armando Lambruschini delivered on Friday in Mar del Plata at the close of the series of lectures on "The Ocean and Related Problems." They also represent a starting point for formulating an Argentine geopolitical strategy that replaces the timid habit of looking inward with a creative, outward-looking view.

Lambruschini talks about the importance of the maritime frontier, but moreover he talks about the importance of occupying that frontier, because "maritime sovereignty requires an active presence and must be exercised in a continuous, organized and unwavering manner." It is of no use to declare sovereignty if it is not exercised, and this is the basic initial stand for reversing certain trends in Argentina.

Throughout its history, our country has been receding on all fronts, probably as a result of a mistaken geopolitical policy, the first major outcome of which was the loss of the eastern strip, then the eastern part of Misiones, the Paraguayan Chaco (in spite of a military victory), the northern and eastern parts of Jujuy, etc.

Clashing head on with the notion of national grandeur of our founding fathers like San Martin, Brown, Belgrano and Moreno, but fueled by the philosophy of Rivadavia that it was better to have a small country with a strong port and a vast hinterland than a large but "unprofitable" country, these views were reordered only as late as the generation of 1880, when men of the stature of Sarmiento, Avellaneda and Roca saw that our country was more than Buenos Aires.

It was to be expected, then, that maritime expeditions would set out to "exercise" sovereignty in the south and that Roca would set out by land to conquer the vast territory of Patagonia, which otherwise would have inevitably fallen into the hands of more expansionist neighbors.

But then everything returned to mediocrity, and the declining view of geopolitics enveloped the remaining facets of national life, as the regression penetrated the cultural, political, economic and social spheres, thus demonstrating precisely what the ideologues of this theory refused to admit: that a country functions as a whole.

It is often said that a nation's foreign policy reflects its domestic policy, but we must bear in mind that the inverse is also true: external weakness leads to internal weakness.

Since geopolitically we cannot question that borders constitute the limit of domestic policy and the beginning of foreign policy, a poor policy in this regard obviously has an impact on the entire structure of a nation.

It is therefore important to begin exercising sovereignty along our borders, as an indispensable step towards establishing an Argentina with real influence.

During the 55 months of the process, right and wrong moves have been made along the geopolitical courses chosen, but we have undoubtedly lacked a homogeneous approach in this regard for the entire country. Thus, the government emphasized the concept of sovereignty and clearly stated that it was prepared to defend it militarily, but the exercise of this sovereignty was not backed by socioeconomic measures.

Although it is true that we cannot expect miracles in just 4 years, we still do not know of specific measures to bring industries into key zones, to populate border areas, to occupy empty territory or to fill the major vacuum in Patagonia.

Because of all these negative points, the speech given by Admiral Lambruschini is pivotal in setting forth the guidelines for fully exercising our sovereignty in our strategically and economically most important area in the near future: ocean waters.

It is in keeping with this view of the role of the oceans that he upholds the policy of the 200-mile exclusive economic zone and Ireland's prescription regarding the subsoil of adjacent regions, where the greatest resources are to be found.

"The diplomatic struggle that we are waging to defend these inalienable rights," Lambruschini said, "is not just a statement of intention or a matter of rhetoric or prestige; it is the basis for preserving an essential source of future resources. It is the unavoidable condition for another of the vital challenges that history has posed to us: becoming a major maritime power."

Referring to our immense ocean area, Lambruschini pointed out that "if we do not develop it intensely and rationally, if the republic scorns the rewards that Providence has placed within our reach, then outside interests will be lured by their magnitude. In that case, Argentina would have to face up to conflicts or experience the frustration of another unjust amputation of its territory."

"The idea is not to repeat the mistakes of the past, not to think that 'the totality is fine' and to once again let history pass us by, only to feel sorry for ourselves later on when the major powers and the multinationals plunder our ocean riches."

We must not think about this as something far off. It is common for Soviet fishing fleets at present to haul in schools of fish at the edge of our exclusive economic zone, thus causing an ecological imbalance in it. This will stop only when this ocean area is occupied.

Lambruschini was very clear. He set forth a geopolitical strategy for Argentina's waters, but he cautioned that we must now implement it in practice, we must develop our strategic and economic resources.

So, we will have to wait and see whether Argentina today is willing and ready to put this geopolicy into practice. To this end, it will have to continue promoting the shipbuilding industry and develop a powerful, modern fishing fleet. Some segments of the economy seem to be playing their cards the opposite way.

If this trend is not reversed, Argentina will be the loser, and we will pay for it in the 21st century.

JUNTA'S FINANCIAL CONNECTIONS WITH DRUG TRAFFICKERS REPORTED

Paris LE MATIN MAGAZINE in French 18-19 Oct 80 pp 27-28

[Article by Francoise Jodet-Gouin]

The strong man around here is Gen Echeverria, the commander of the Second Santa Cruz Battalion, whose second in command is Col Lara, the commander of the Ranger Regiment. They are in charge of surveillance of the department of Santa Cruz (370 square km in area, population 712,000). The region is covered with estancias where sugar cane, cotton, rice and coffee are grown. On these farms another occupation is also engaged in, one that is making the region's fortune: the transforming of coca into basic paste.

Gone are the days when the peasants chewed coca to forget their hunger. Now, in the local markets, one has a hard time unearthing a chola (a half-breed Indian) who consents to sell a bag or two ($10 per kilo). For crushing the leaves mixed with kerosene the campesinos [countrymen] of Montero today earn their monthly salary in three days: 1,000 or 2,000 pesos (160 to 320 francs).

Gen Echeverria and Col Lara have under them paramilitary personnel who have been incorporated into the army. They are called "assessors." Their leaders are Rudy Landivar, Julio Canido and Abraham Baptista. Into this shock group are integrated German mercenairies who come from Paraguay and are installed in two "security houses" in Santa Cruz. These two buildings are used as an arsenal and a drug warehouse.

Early in July Jose Paz, the head of the Montero Mafia, put $800,000 on Gen Echeverria's table--his contribution to the coup d'etat. Several days later the architect of the putsch, Garcia Meza, received a still more significant sum, believed to be at least $1,000,000. The generous donors were Edwin Gasser, the owner of the sugar mill, "La Belgica," and Pedro Bleyer of Santa Cruz' Chamber of Commerce and Industry. These dollars were used chiefly to "convince" the reluctant military and to finance part of the coup d'etat. Some days later, on 17 July 1980, Gen Gracia Meza seized power. Today the sugar mills of Santa Cruz are operating at full capacity; they are being used to launder the dollars of the Colombian and North American traffickers who have come to buy cocaine. By placing their friends in the government the smugglers are assured of total impunity. Never has illicit trade been so flourishing; the American Interpol mission has had to withdraw. How can control be exercised? Several ministers are involved in this very lucrative trade.

According to the customs commander, over 100 clandestine runways are operating in Santa Cruz (see HOY of 22 August 1980). Landing on them are the little planes and the helicopters of those who snap their fingers at the laws: officials or civilians connected with the Bolivian armed forces. Washington authorities estimate the volume of the traffic operations at $500,000,000 annually.

Three principal groups, linked with each other, are obedient to a coordinated leadership:

The Roberto Suarez group can be considered the most dynamic; it is the best protected militarily. Production, evaluated at 20,000 kilograms of basic cocaine paste per year, is provided by the Chavez brothers of Montero and Pepe Paz. They are assisted by commando units composed of German mercenaries and Bolivian paramilitary personnel directed by Paye Gonzales. The little planes of Arce Gomez, the present minister of the Interior, are loaded with freight. Early in 1980 one of the planes had to make a forced landing in Trinidad; 300 kilograms of cocaine were discovered in the hold.

The second group, Jorge Nallar's group, has much larger production: 30,000 kilograms of basic paste per year, refined in the areas of Monteverde, Okinawa, Perseverancia, north of Santa Cruz. Two men, Omar Cassib and Abraham Baptista, direct the commandos. The heads of the traffic are Widen Razuk, the former prefect of Santa Cruz under Banzer, and the Asbuns of La Paz. Since June 1980 Miguel Razuk, the brother of Widen, has been imprisoned in New York for drug trafficking. Miguel Razuk's best friend is Col Rico Toro, chief of the army's Section II (information service).

The third group, that of Alfredo "kutuchi" Gutierrez is directed by the present prefect of Santa Cruz, Oscar Raman Vaca, and Roberto Gasser. It produced 20,000 kilograms annually in the region of Cosorio, Rio Grande and San Javier. The straw man is Mozo Rojas. Roberto Gasser is the son of Edwin Gasser, one of Garcia Meza's backers. It was he who supported Banzer in 1971 when he overthrew the leftist Torres regime. Edwin Gasser spoke this sentence on German television: "Bolivia's German groups financed the coup d'etat, because it was a game to buy the military." Obviously Banzer and his successor, Gen Pedera, have always closed their eyes to the transactions of Santa Cruz' sugar producers and to their relations with Colombian and North American narcotics traffickers.

In June 1980 Gasser junior, the editor of the rightist newspaper EL MUNDO, president of the Santa Cruz Chamber of Commerce and Industry, was arrested in Miami with Alfredo Kutuchi Gutierrez. They had brought into the United States 530 kilograms of cocaine. In addition, they were accused of laundering checks from the traffic.

They will be released after they have paid $1,000,000 (for Gasser) and $1,500,000 (for Kutuchi Gutierrez) bail in cash.

Kutuchi's shock groups were organized by Monroy, nicknamed "el Mosca" (The Mouth). Monroy is currently the head of the paramilitary. Monroy was imprisoned as a dealer in drugs under Guevara (June-November 1969). Released by an army officer on 17 July 1980, he seized the Quemado Palace (government headquarters). It was he who directed the taking of the COB (Bolivian Workers' Group) and arrested the principal leaders. For all these operations he uses ambulances stolen from the parking lots of the "insurance funds."

Early in September Monroy left for Canada with four acolytes, all of them armed with diplomatic passports and false identities. Their mission was to kill Jaime Paz Zamora, the leader of the MIR (Revolutionary Left Movement). Monroy was in Paris for several days. In 1971 this same Monroy had already distinguished himself: when Torres fell he had seized 68 kilograms of pure cocaine that had been seized by the police, and resold them.

In June 1979 a certain Romero was arrested in Panama with a shipment of cocaine. He confessed, denouncing his chief--Aviation Col Ariel Coca, the current minister of Education. Ariel Coca chaired the Bolivian delegation to the general conference of UNESCO that was held in Belgrade from 23 to 28 September 1980. Ariel Coca shields the Kutuchi Gutierrez group. Kutuchi's private airport with its 7 km of runway is Bolivia's primary civilian airport. The cadets of the Santa Cruz Military Aviation College train there. But its runways are ordinarily reserved for smuggling, via Asuncion, Miami and Panama.

The Santa Cruz-Panama-Miami line of the LAB [Bolivian Air Line] is very profitable; a tourist can never find a seat, all the chairs are occupied by smugglers. In Miami I learned that six Bolivian consuls are stationed there. The second consul is Roberto Ortiz Saucedo, the cousin of Arce Gomez and the owner of the Caballito Blanco, a Santa Cruz nightclub. Ortiz Saucedo is known to be a consumer of cocaine. Saucedo's sister, Mimi Ortiz Saucedo, is married to Edwin Gasser, the owner of the la Belgica sugar refinery we spoke of earlier. There are also some agents of Lloyd Aero (the Bolivian commercial line) who are heavily involved in the traffic.

The smuggling is such that Jorge Lonsdale, the manufacturer of Bellows, the national whiskey, denounced this black market in the newspaper LA PRESENCIA; foreign whiskey often costs less today than national whiskey. Two accidents involving Bolivian planes that crashed, one in Panama and the other on the Peruvian coast, provided further proof: their holds were full of contraband merchandise. There is even a smugglers' union, the "Union of Retail Sellers," which includes thousands of smugglers who transport the merchandise from border to border. It is a veritable anthill; anyone who "falls" is quickly replaced.

Most of the officers of the Bolivian army profit from this smuggling; their automobiles have almost all been imported fraudulently.

Gen Waldo Bernal, the commander of the air force, has just acquired in this way a superb $300,000 villa in Calacoto, a residential section of La Paz. Now, his monthly salary is $1,000. Bernal is associated with Edwin Tapia Frontanilla (Banzer's former minister) in a civilian assessors' office. When Banzer was in power Frontanilla did not hesitate to request diplomatic passports for two individuals who were captured in 1975 by the Canadian police when they were transporting drugs. They will be sentenced to 20 years in prison.

Marcelo Ostria Trigo, the present foreign relations secretary, had formed under Banzer (with his consul brother in Italy) a drug network in several Bolivian consulates. The scandal that exploded, by the way, was one of the causes of Banzer's downfall. The advent of Garcia Meza saved Jose Gamara Zorilla, who was since named economic assessor, by a sad piece of deception. Under Banzer Gamara had a budget of $35,000,000 for the Bolivian games. Just before the 17 July coup d'etat, he was served with a writ for misappropriation of funds. Gamara and attorney Carlos Gonzales are the directors of the los Sargentes equestrian club, whose lounges welcomed Argentinians and were used in preparing for the coup d'etat. In gratitude, Gamara received a new budget of $1,000,000 and the complaint was withdrawn.

Most of the people of the new Bolivian regime are involved in one traffic or another. To throw people off the scent President Garcia Meza is inaugurating an anti-drug campaign. Up to the present only a few small dealers have been arrested. Will he dare imprison part of his government?

(I cannot sign this article without compromising the Bolivians who took me in and helped me.)

RESULTS OF U.S. PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION ANALYZED

PY072114 Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 6 Nov 80 p 10

[Editorial: An American Decision]

[Text] Although Ronald Reagan's victory in the U.S. presidential elections is only a surprise because of the magnitude of his victory, it really represents U.S. citizens getting even with those problems that have been tormenting them.

Elections have the virtue of being cathartic: The right to vote, when exercised with regularity, is a sort of exorcism of ghosts; the reappearance of the problem of the U.S. hostages in Iran in the last leg of the elections probably stirred-up in many American citizens the wish to forget in some way this nightmare by turning a page of history.

The overwhelming vote against Carter was not brought about by unreal ghosts or concerns. Experienced analysts have noted that inflation was one of the most important of these concerns--a 14 percent inflation rate--unprecedented by U.S. standards--leaving millions of workers unemployed or threatened with being fired.

Defense was another decisive issue: At the voting tables how many people probably remembered the President's exasperatingly hesitant attitude in important international policy issues, or about the disagreements between the National Security Council and the Secretary of State--disagreements which have worn-out men like Vance and which seemed to be a part of the President's administration? When problems turned more serious Carter decided at a certain time to request the resignation of his entire staff. Unusual as this decision may have been, it gave the impression that the President himself was trying to avoid any personal responsibility.

In this regard the progressive development of soviet diplomacy probably struck as an insult to national pride. In 1971 only 11 percent of Americans approved of an increase in defense costs and 49 percent of them were against it. But in 1979 before the crisis with Iran took place already 60 percent of Americans were in favor of an increase in military spending. But the President was still hesitating. The SALT II treaty was being discussed by the Senate when the problem of the soviet brigades stationed in Cuba came up. The presence of these troops were first described as "inadmissible" but it was later accepted without any further explanations. When the invasion of Afghanistan took place Carter himself requested congress to "freeze" the study of the SALT II treaty. The forthcoming elections left the Afghanistan issue out of focus and Carter introduced himself as the paladin of the SALT treaty to confront an adversary who had many objections to it.

In addition to this hesitant attitude there was another issue in the election campaign: The profound transformation of the international situation where the old Roosevelt doctrine brandishing the democratic flag, seemed to be moving toward the precipice. Roosevelt's policy which was based on a carefully studied government intervention program and fulfilled its function in history: It made the country grow. But in 1978 already 76 percent of Americans believed that Washington had become too powerful. The high tax index rate was supporting government intervention and was becoming an obstruction to private initiative and in its role as a true promoter of the economy in a country that had become stronger both socially and economically by Roosevelt's liberal policy.

It was then that the welfare state reached its limit. What did the republican platform offer? A social welfare system could not be financed if the country lacked a powerful private economic sector. The democratic platform did not have any real alternatives to offer to counterbalance this position except to defend what it had already done--and thus took on the burden of the unsatisfactory responsibility of the government machine--the big government. [given in English]

The republicans were able to take advantage of this discontent--and the fact that discontent exists is shown by the unexpected majority they obtained in an election that was predicted to be a very difficult one.

Confronted with these geological movements it was useless to take recourse in cliches--thus following a manichean theory that gave tricky explanations.

Ronald Reagan was not elected because he is a "hawk" or because he is a "rightist"--even less because he is Ronald Reagan.

He was elected by such a strong movement that within a year it transformed a candidate who was being ridiculed into one who virtually destroyed the incumbent president who was seeking reelection.

The reelection of the incumbent president has always been a tradition in U.S. politics. But this time tradition had little influence. If there was any, it was in a more extensive meaning of the word: favored. An extremely agile electoral mechanism the United States is on its feet again and it has returned to its old values after the Watergate moral "crisis" and after the Vietnam War. Reagan summarized all this when after his victory he requested work and dedication from fellow citizens.

Is the new president suitable for his new functions? This question is inappropriate at this time; since Reagan was not elected for his virtues but for having been able--which is no little matter--to tune his instincts to a powerful current for change. It is the U.S. political system that has to be praised for its virtues--mainly because it enables a common citizen to become president.

Eisenhower, whom Reagan points out as his ideal, was no political genius. He governed without any major problems--probably because the times were not as complicated as they are today. But in any period what gives vitality to U.S. political life is to keep its stability but at the same time accept what is new. Reagan has beside him able politicians--beginning with Vice President George Bush. Also beside him is the defeated president, who despite his defeat praised the political process that defeated him. It is this respect for public opinion that minimizes personal vices in the United States. The President is "primus inter pares". The nation has therefore, little to fear.

NEWSPAPER ANALYZES REAGAN'S ELECTION

[Article by Barbosa Lima Sobrinho]

[Text] For many people--as for Pompeu de Sousa--the results of the U.S. elections spell some sort of revenge on the part of people who cannot absorb the defeats their country has been experiencing on the world stage, from the withdrawal from Vietnam to the disastrous rescue operation on U.S. hostages in Iran--two cases in which the responsibility of the Pentagon cannot be ignored. These defeats are too much for the pride of an immature and rattlebrained nation. This explains the scramble in search for a national hero in the image of a cowboy--the terrible Indian killer, with his huge hat and with two pistols in his holsters--as played by an experienced actor like Ronald Reagan, despite his doubtful black hair and the unavoidable wrinkles on his long face. We must agree that for such a role Reagan was better qualified than Carter at a time when there is a need to hold onto a vague hope.

Therefore, the surprise factor was the number of votes obtained by the winning candidate. And in looking for explanations, there are those who believe in the influence of his aggressive tone of President Carter's campaign whenever he made personal references to his opponent. Elections are frequently decided at the last moment, so no importance should be attached to the polls conducted by public opinion pollsters. Everything can change from one moment to the next, and even more so with the presence of inflation, which the people of a country that dominates the world economy do not understand. The Americans believe that inflation is the scourge of dependent, not dominant, nations. An inflation of 10 percent represents corporal torture and punishment for the Americans. For other peoples, an inflation of 100 percent is the work of miraclemakers. Hence the revolt staged in last Tuesday's elections. Although the solution was not much to their liking, the Americans chose to jump in the dark; and between the fear of the unknown and the fear of the known, they opted for the former--in the apt phrase of an American journalist.

Let us agree that the unknown leaves a greater margin for hope, for the unpredictable, for surprise. Hitchcock would have said: "For suspense." It at least makes room for the imagination. More so at a time when the impression of Carter's liberalism had already vanished with the growing influence of Brzezinski in the episode of Cyrus Vance's replacement. Brzezinski is a naturalized Polish-American with ideas not perhaps shared even by Reagan.

I do not believe that the election of the Republican Party's candidate will help in strengthening the international position of the United States. But I do believe that it will raise the hopes of General Pinochet and the Bolivian general who is in power. This election has already elicited favorable comments from the Soviet Union, which could not fail to recognize that it will help to make relations between Moscow and Beijing less difficult. In view of Reagan's enthusiasm for the traditional friendship with Taiwan on this point, there is a great distance between republicans; Nixon visited the PRC ruled by Mao Zedong, but Reagan longs for the alliance with Taiwan, adopting a position that can only draw immediate applause from the Soviet Union.

The difference is not only over the Chinas. The traditional U.S. allies in Europe--Italy, France and the FRG--do not conceal their fears, and this cannot but weaken the ties between the European Union and the United States, especially since the first effect of Reagan's victory was to create a bullish market for the stocks of weapons manufacturers. The sensitivity of the stock market is more significant that that of political circles, and the European countries naturally prefer persuasive action to effective belligerence that will expose them to more sacrifice than the United States, despite the range of nuclear weapons. The European countries feel that way because their proximity to the potential enemy makes them more vulnerable to plain machineguns or even rifles.

True, there are other aspects to be taken into consideration, and the Soviets did so promptly. One of those aspects is Reagan's campaign, with its fiery reactionary oratory during the primaries. When he was trying to attract the votes of conservatives; this was toned down during the presidential campaign, when he was trying to lure the different factions of the American electorate. Another aspect is the President-elect's personality, which is contradictory. He was a confirmed McCarthyite as president of a movie actors association, pointing out suspects; but still he will be favorable to a Rooseveltian new deal at a crucial time for American liberalism. The action of U.S. political parties in fraught with contradictions: President Kennedy supported the invasion of Cuba and President Johnson escalated the war in Vietnam, while Nixon, a Republican president, took the initiative to visit Red China in the most spectacular gesture against the cold war.

In view of those facts, we can ask if the American people really opted for a policy of provocation or defiance by electing Reagan--and everything depends more on the American people than on temporary occupants of the White House, in a democracy in which ulitimately public opinion always prevails. After all, the elections do not give the elected president carte blanche for his 4-years mandate. The American electorate is more independent than is generally understood. Even now, when the American electorate gave the republicans a majority in congress--by the slim margin of 57 to 47 votes--it handed the democrats a majority in the Chamber of Deputies by 242 seats against 192 seats. [sentence as published]

By the way, that is another characteristic of the American democracy. The Chamber of Deputies [as published] is renewed every 2 years, thus making the nation's president dependent on public opinion from the start, through pressure applied by his own partisans who consider identification with the sentiments of the people the means to renew the mandates they hold or to gain new ones.

I do not believe that the people who recently demanded the withdrawal of American troops from Vietnam are inclined to new military adventures. I am sure that those sentiments, supported by an independent and extremely militant press, will weight more in the decisions than the personal inclinations that might be held by whoever happens to occupy the White House. But I also believe that Reagan's victory should be above all considered a victory for the multinational companies. And this is no small matter for the rest of the world to absorb.

COMMENTATOR DISCUSSES REAGAN FOREIGN POLICY

PY071703 Sao Paulo Radio Bandeirantes Network in Portuguese 1000 GMT 7 Nov 80

[Article by Newton Carlos from New York]

[Text] U.S. President Ronald Reagan has taken the first steps toward his foreign policy. He wants to reassure allies and adversaries alike that he will act cautiously. He wants to erase as early as possible the image of an irresponsible warrior which President Carter has built for him during the electoral campaign.

It is known that Reagan's foreign policy will be conservative, but not how conservative it will be. Difficult challenges are awaiting him: Relations with the Soviet Union and the Western allies, the Middle East conflict between Israel and the Arabs and the oil supply from the Persian Gulf. There is also Latin America, especially Central America and the Caribbean.

There could be problems with Western allies. For example: The FRG, a powerful and important ally, has just reduced its military expenditures, while Reagan's government is planning the opposite--that is, to increase U.S. military expenditures--and wants the Western allies to do the same. The FRG is also making efforts to maintain detente with the Soviet Union.

The first indication of how conservative Reagan's policy will be will come from his choice of cabinet ministers. Gen Alexander Haig is still being mentioned as the future U.S. Secretary of State, that is, the head of future U.S. diplomacy. This is a very [words indistinct], but not so the others. The choice is not easy. The world situation is very complicated.

DAILY SPECULATES ON REAGAN POLICY TOWARD LATIN AMERICA

PY110256 Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 9 Nov 80 p 3

[From the "Notes and Information" page: "The West's Last-Ditch Defense"]

[Text] After being elected, Ronald Reagan stated that he intends to meet the Latin American presidents during the first half of next year, that is, as soon as he begins his tenure. Now, in his first meeting with the press, he has made it clear that a firm effort should be made to improve U.S. relations with Latin America, adding that his government will prefer to obtain this improvement through "bilateral agreements so that North America, Central America and South America will be united in their resolve to be free." Reagan noted that U.S.-Latin American relations have experienced a period of deterioration "which must not continue," making an indirect reference to the human rights defense policy implemented by the Carter administration.

In our opinion, all this is mere truism since, after all, from Theodore Roosevelt to Jimmy Carter all U.S. Presidents started their administration with similar words, filled with eloquence, making great promises to the effect of strengthening U.S. relations with the Americas. Cooperation agreements summed up in attractive "slogans" were thus prepared only to be tossed into the waste basket of good intentions at the end of each tenure. In the end, policies such as the "good neighbor policy" proposed by Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the "Pan American operation" proposed by Dwight Eisenhower, and the "alliance for progress" of John Kennedy, were just beautiful programs which existed only on paper, mere documents filled with refined rhetoric. Especially in post-war times, the United States--forced by historical circumstances, it is true--primarily focused its interests on Europe, Indochina, Korea, Formosa, the Middle East and the Persian Gulf, having overlooked Latin America to the detriment of its own interests, having forgotten that our continent is not part of the "Third World" but of the West. "Brazil is the West," Castello Branco [former Brazilian president] used to say. This truth based on geographical, historical and cultural grounds is also applicable to the entire continent.

While the culturally confused "Third World" is a potential victim (at least according to the Kremlin's goals) of totalitarian expansionism, Latin America, despite enduring a pauperized status and political authoritarianism, is today still capable of effectively incorporating Western values, if it receives adequate help. It is neither selfishness nor boastfulness to say that Latin America, with powers such as Brazil, Argentina, Mexico and Chile is the great "reservoir" of the West. Like Europe, or after Europe, Latin American countries deserve to be treated just as the main European countries were treated under the Marshall Plan. But the problem is that the United States, even in relation to the "slogans" mentioned earlier, has treated Latin America not as a group of individual countries but as an overall abstract group, thus replacing politics with rhetoric. For having forgotten its neighbors, the United States from time to time has experienced surprising events such as those which took place in Cuba, Nicaragua, and Grenada, which could have been perfectly well avoided had the great nation of the north paid due attention to Latin America. In the end, from the standpoint of purely U.S. national interests, Latin America is more important than both Indochina and Afghanistan.

It is, then understandable that the first reaction to Reagan's promises regarding Latin America is one of skepticism, in view of the many bitter disappointments we have endured. Yet, as the saying goes, "hope is the last thing one should lose." The tone with which Reagan referred to Latin America was less rhetorical and more practical than his predecessors. By stating that he seeks to base relations with Latin America on "bilateral agreements," he indicated that he is aware that south of the Rio Grande there is a continent which is not an abstract, undefined whole, but one having an important political reality and containing rising nations which one day will play an important role on the international scene. Still, during the electoral campaign we were surprised to hear a Reagan adviser say, in the face of the almost miraculous political recovery of the small island of Jamaica, that the time has come to give substantial economic aid to Jamaica. Contrary to African and Asian countries, the Latin American countries have not yet been lost by the West and they deserve to be not treated only as countries of the future but as countries carrying some international weight, whose cooperation the United States will some day need as much as, if not more than, European cooperation. From this standpoint, it is worth quoting Fiat President Gianni Agnelli, who in an interview to the Italian press said that "the main foreign policy concerns of U.S. President-elect Ronald Reagan will be centered on the American continent, from Canada to Mexico, Brazil and Argentina." If Agnelli--who is regarded by the Italian press as an expert on U.S. affairs--told the truth, Reagan will be demonstrating that he is a prudent man who is preparing to strengthen a region which one day may become the last-ditch defense of the West.

PAPER FORECASTS REAGAN'S POLICY TOWARD USSR

PY101405 Rio de Janeiro SAO PAULO LATIN AMERICA DAILY POST in English 9, 10 Nov 80 p 4

[Editorial: "Reagan and Linkage"]

[Text] Judging by the first few declarations that Ronald Reagan has made as President-elect, one can conclude that his foreign polich as President may not match the tough right-wing rhetoric that he has used for over a decade. But Reagan certainly will take a tougher stance on his approach to the Soviets, and will also de-emphasize the Carter administration's use of human rights as a part of policy making.

The Reagan approach towards the Soviet Union will likely follow the "linkage" system favored by former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger. At his Thursday news conference, Reagan allowed that he would not let human rights considerations harm relations with long-time allies.

In short, what we should expect of the Reagan administration is a continuation of the kind of foreign policy practiced during the Nixon and Ford periods. That will certainly be more "hawkish" than Carter's but not as drastic as some first thought.

The "linkage" theory as practiced by Kissinger means that all Soviet-American relations are considered to be related. No action can be isolated from the totality of relationships between the two nations. Thus, Reagan would likely take Soviet interference in third world areas and "link" that problem with, for instance, arms limitation talks. Carter tended to isolate these problems and proceeded independently on separate issues.

The linkage theory is seen in the Kremlin as a theoretically hostile position and is not likely to help warm Soviet-U.S. relations. But Carter plunged those relations into the deepest chill since the cold war itself after Russia's Afghanistan invasion, so perhaps Reagan's new approach can be effective.

The Russians know full well that Reagan's campaign rhetoric will not necessarily translate into policy. They, like the rest of the world, will now be looking for the specific proposals to be forthcoming from the President-elect and his staff.

PAPER BELIEVES REAGAN HAS MADE GOOD BEGINNING

[Editorial: "Reagan's Moderation"]

[Text] The positions outlined by Ronald Reagan during his first press conference as President-elect placed him some distance from the radical positions that has been attributed to him, or which he himself encouraged, perhaps for tactical purposes.

Moreover, the winner of an election in the United States feels the desire to confess, after the results of the balloting are known, that his campaign rhetoric does not correspond exactly to his real attitude. This is part of the American democratic style for the simple reason that it is a system where presidential power is manipulated within a scene of counterbalances and shields of protection [anteparos].

Reagan's most radical statement after the elections refers to freezing the SALT II agreement until it is renegotiated with the Soviet Union. He is not only asking for an equitable agreement for the two parties in the limitation of nuclear weapons, he also wants to have this within an overall context of intentions in which the Soviets would definitely clarify whether they prefer understanding or confrontation.

In the human rights chapter, for example, President Carter's crusade ended up with the United States complicating the lives of friendly countries at the same time that he approved clamorous, and even privileged, exceptions for certain countries which do not respect human rights because they had a part in Washington's strategic interests.

Falling into political and ethical contradictions, or turning a blind eye, as Carter did, Reagan prefers to play only with international reality without stressing missionary whims.

Reagan acknowledges that a task of recovery must be undertaken in Latin America, and he is not proposing anything similar to renewed U.S. interference. He speaks about improving bilateral relations, especially with those countries that are complaining about Washington's treatment. And he will probably let the Panama Canal treaty stand at the point it has reached when he inherits it from Carter.

On the other hand, Ronald Reagan's viewpoints on various internal affairs brought up during the press conference complete the image of the moderate and flexible leader he wishes to project in his role as President-elect. He stated, for example, that he supports equal rights between men and women and that he will take the minorities into account in the organization of his government. It is, without a doubt, a good beginning.

NEWSPAPER PRAISES U.S. DEMOCRACY AT WORK

[Editorial: "Lessons from the Spectacle"]

[Excerpts] This latest U.S. Presidential election has again offered the world a spectacle which universal opinion should already be used to, but which always causes surprise, not because of the election's results but because of the functioning of a system insuperable in its expression of force and beauty. To understand it, it would be necessary to travel the path the American nation has travelled since its independence, from which--as appropriately said by one of its historians--emerged not only just a nation, but a new society. From the racial and geographical heterogeneity a unity was born that was many times put to the test in contentions against the central power and in attempts to break it up, and which was cemented once and for all by a war that would strip the last separatist ideas from the memory of the nation.

That unity is the foundation for the most perfect democratic regime in history. But just as that unity was achieved throughout the initial and eventful years, the regime has gone through a gradual improvement in a process that is not yet completed and which can serve as an example for other countries, although not as a model to be copied. Any mechanically and thoughtlessly-made copy is at best useless and if made so, it would just be unworkable. The U.S. democracy could only take roots in that country because of the very peculiar circumstances surrounding its historical development. The American nation was born, so to speak, without the stigma of original sin, as were other colonial peoples in general. From its settlers, the United States only inherited two positive traits: The religious tradition responsible for the habit of hard work and saving, and the political tradition of stability underpinned by a visceral respect for the law.

Everything else was done with a spirit of innovation. A regime of a unique nature was thus created and protected by safeguards which were later adopted by other peoples caught up in the confusion of frequent crises, but these safeguards and no anchor in the spirit of those peoples. The founding fathers of the most perfect democracy in history were close to founding an imperial system which was not adopted only because Washington refused to accept the emperor's crown. But the emperor's image lying at the bottom of the collective soul invested on the president of the republic the same psychological and political role of a king: The role of being a symbol of the unity of the people and of being the symbolic guardian of their freedom.

The man representing that role can be a common man, even one embodying the common qualities and also the defects of the American people, and this is a trademark of the evolution of the regime that was led at the beginning by an elite. It was a member of this elite, Washington, who wisely and generously firmed up the tradition that mandates are temporary, as well as the tradition of peaceful transfer of power to the elected. Initiating this tradition, Washington--who had already turned down the king's crown--refused to stay in the presidency for his lifetime and stepped down in perfect health to allow the first debate for succession (between Hamilton and Jefferson) to be conducted in his presence as a protector.

The founders of the American democracy gave it the conditions to thrive and to offer us, once more at the end of this century, the unrivaled spectacle of how to elect a president not by simply trusting in the generosity of fate or in the goodness of God. The original and clever electoral system they devised surrounded the choice of the president with all safeguards against the risks of collective emotionalism. Until 1912 when the constitution was specifically amended, the American Senate was made up of Senators appointed by the legislative assemblies of the states, not elected by the people.

The essence and purity of the regime was preserved for many years until the people were given the right to directly elect the representatives of the union in Congress. The electoral college set up to elect the president has not yet been modified, but it has gradually evolved to the point of becoming a mechanism for direct election--as attested by the election of Ronald Reagan.

The United States has just given us a reminder--now that Brazil is once again on the path toward democracy--that the road to democracy is long and that it must be traveled with caution and without hast to reach its destination. In addition to this lesson, we can draw others from the recent spectacle of the U.S. elections, but it should be sufficient to recall the most important one: That once it is attained, democracy can be defended and strengthened to the extent that it is put in practice. The vigor of democracy depends on the regime itself, not on the force that we have many times used, by mistake and misunderstanding, against democracy under the pretext of protecting it.

SOVIETS TO SUPPLY 300,000 TONS OF PETROLEUM THIS YEAR

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 19 Oct 80 p 32

[Text] A supply of 300,000 tons of Soviet oil for Brazil by the end of this year has been assured since last Thursday, when negotiations were concluded that involved PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation]--representing the state oil-importing monopoly--and a private Brazilian businessman--Mario Pacheco Junior, representative in this country for SOYUZNEFTEEXPORT, the state oil company of the Soviet Union. The transaction was for about $70 million and is equivalent to 20,000 barrels a day at $33 a barrel.

Mario Pacheco describes himself as an advocate of Brazilian private initiative in foreign trade, on the economic level, and as a liberal, on the political level. He considers this the proper moment for the nation to seek to diversify its petroleum sources and broaden initiatives to this end, as is already being done in relation to Venzuela and the USSR.

Negotiation

At the office of Mapa International Enterprises, where oil business between Moscow and Brazil has been developed in negotiation with PETROBRAS, the businessman points to some tables and graphs that show Brazil's current situation during the war between Iran and Iraq.

"The 440,000 barrels a day that Brazil received from Iraq before the war began made this nation the second-largest buyer of Iraqi petroleum, surpassed only by France, with 560,000 barrels a day. And our current forecasts, based upon information we received from the company's offices in Moscow, Geneva, Paris, London and Lisbon, are that the war will continue for some time," says Pacheco.

Recalling that even after peace is made the two countries will have to face a period of recovery from their damages, Mario Pacheco predicts an increase in the spot-market (parallel market for short-term purchases) petroleum price to as much as $40 a barrel, under current conditions. And again he points to the graphs:

"The price of oil on the spot market, which had been falling because of the large quantities of oil channeled to this market by middlemen and the Arab governments themselves, is showing signs of recovery. The major ports of this market are Rotterdam, the Caribbean, the Gulf of Mexico and the Persian Gulf, as well as Singapore and some Italian ports."

According to Mapa data, everything indicates that, after a period of retraction in spot-market purchases (and, naturally, in sales, which means the end of a cycle of making profits on the difference in price between the parallel market and the official market), the aggravation of the crisis is again pushing the spot price upward, with a growing participation by intermediaries other than the international petroleum companies.

"Trading companies are constantly more active in oil trade. For example, Cargill and Phillip Brothers (known in Brazil as Phibro Mining, Industry, Trade, Export and Import Company), which is connected with the Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa.

"A large part of world petroleum supplies--including those of East European countries--go through such companies," the businessman says. Clearly the petroleum multinationals and the governments of the producing countries themselves continue with the advantage of proximity to and ownership of the sources.

Indication

An indication of this fact can be found in the data referring to purchases of oil from Iran and Iraq, where the "Others" category--which includes sales in the spot market--reached 325,000 barrels a day before the war, while petroleum companies were buying 510,000 barrels a day. This is without counting the presence of traders at various points of the petroleum-trade circuit, even in government-to-government sales.

"During October," the businessman goes on to say, "pressure from the crisis has increased the price of Arab light crude--used as a benchmark--by up to $4 a barrel. Under such conditions Brazil can only benefit from buying oil from the Soviets, who also hope to increase their business in this area."

According to Pacheco, petroleum transactions throughout the world are now entirely unlinked from any other type of commercial exchange. But he assumes that reactivation of oil purchases from the USSR opens the way for other goods--such as capital goods and equipment for the energy area--to be negotiated, "complementing orders to Brazilian business.

"But it is well to stress that the Soviets also want to buy more Brazilian goods sold directly by Brazilians. The amount of goods from our country now in the USSR but not exported by Brazilians is enormous, as in the case of canned goods," the businessman says.

Freeze

Oil trade between the USSR and Brazil had been frozen since 1978 because of constant oil price increases and the Soviet priority for countries of East Europe. Between 1974 and 1975, however, understandings between PETROBRAS and SOYUZNETFEEXPORT--negotiated by Mapa in Rio de Janeiro and in Europe--resulted in supplies of 3 million tons a year of Soviet petroleum--a figure that declined greatly in later years.

FIGUEIREDO IN TERESINA JUSTIFIES CURRENT ECONOMIC POLICY

[Full text of speech by President Joao Figueiredo at dedication of housing project in Teresina, Piaui, on 17 October: "Struggle Against Unemployment"]

[Text] In a speech given yesterday at Teresina, President Figueiredo regretted that his intention to give more emphasis to social problems is being thwarted by economic difficulties that must be attacked with priority. It would do no good, in his opinion, to see the Brazilian worker with a home, health care and children in school if he could not depend upon employment. "That is why," he added, "the fight against inflation is not producing the expected results either. It is being done in such a way as to avoid recession, as a drop in the rate of inflation at the cost of a social crisis and unemployment would not be desirable."

The president spoke extemporaneously at about 1100 hours from a reviewing stand erected in a public square where a crowd of about 10,000 residents of a housing complex he was dedicating were assembled in the dust and hot sun of the Piaui capital. Preceding his speech, Transportation Minister Eliseu Resende announced that by the end of the year there would be an asphalt highway between Teresina and Brasilia, by way of Barreiras, Bahia; Interior Minister Mario Andreazza pointed out that, upon completing its first 2 years in office, the current administration will have delivered to the public about 2 million economy-type houses; and Governor Lucidio Portella called Figueiredo "the great statesman who has become enshrined in national respect and recognition for the notable work of redemocratization he has been carrying out."

Coming from Sao Luiz, where he had spent the previous day, the president arrived in Teresina a few minutes after 0900 hours, accompanied by ministers Danilo Venturini, chief of the military household; Octavio Medeiros, chief of the SNI [National Intelligence Service]; Mario Andreazza, of the Interior Ministry; Eliseu Resende, of the Transportation Ministry; and Waldyr Arcoverde, of the Health Ministry.

He met few people on the way to Karnak Palace in the center of town. There, before several hundred persons, a Military Police contingent passed in review. He reviewed their parade and later, in the Palace, removed his coat and tie to carry out the program for the visit: dedication of two bridges over the Poti River (he unveiled the plaque on one and merely rode by the other in a car) and a complex of 4,254 low-cost homes. He had lunch in Karnak Palace and then returned to Brasilia shortly after 1400 hours.

While the president was watching the parade of Military Police, someone in the crowd gathered in the square held up a hand-lettered sign saying: "Joao, why are you persecuting me? The Church." The sign appeared and then disappeared almost instantly, perhaps seized by a security agent.

Figueiredo was in a good mood the whole time, waving to the crowd as he left the palace and later to the few dozen who saw him dedicate one of the bridges located a short distance from the center of town.

Request

Crying a lot and between sobs, Luzia Pereira da Silva, a 45-year-old widow, mother of 6 children, broke through security lines (which, incidentally, were not very rigorous) to approach the car in which President Figueiredo was riding. She wanted to ask for assistance (something such as a pension, she explained) to support her family. The widow managed to speak to the president, who promised to help her, suggesting she send her request to his aide-de-camp.

Struggle Against Unemployment

The following is the full text of President Figueiredo's speech in Teresina:

I want nothing more than to express my thanks for the generous words I have just heard from the governor of the state. Although it is true, as Minister Mario Andreazza said and Minister Eliseu Resende pointed out, that something has been done during my administration for the state of Piaui, I must confess, in all conscience, that the resources allocated for the state's needs have as yet been few. I confess to you all that my intention of giving more emphasis to social matters is being hindered by the economic difficulties the country is passing through. On the one hand, as a result of the world situation and, on the other hand, as a result of our shortage of funds to cope with the energy crisis and with payments for imported petroleum.

If more funds are not being appropriated for housing, health, education and leisure, it is because I also must have sizable funds so that the rate of our development does not fall to the point of not being able to generate new resources so that I may allocate them to the social sector. Above all, it does me no good to have the satisfaction of seeing the Brazilian worker with a decent home, health services and his children in school if I cannot provide him with employment that enables him to support his family.

And that employment will exist only if I am able to keep up the rate of development that we have had so far. If it is true that the fight against inflation--which I and the cabinet ministers are engaged in so strenuously--has not brought the results that were expected of it, it is because I decided that the process of coping with this evil of inflation was to be carried out in such a way that, on the one hand, would enable the nation to have satisfactory development and, on the other, would not bring on a depression of such a nature that there would be sizable unemployment.

I must admit that the superhuman effort the government is making to avoid unemployment and to generate new jobs is one of the reasons why the rate of inflation is not falling much more rapidly. Nor would it be desirable for inflation to fall sharply at a rate such as we see in other countries of South America, at the cost of a social crisis and mass unemployment. But I have faith in God that, with our energy program, without depending upon imported petroleum, through our own resources and with the effort of Brazilians, we will have--over the medium term if not the short--nearly total independence from imported energy and we will then establish a growth rate that can in fact bring well-being to our people.

Although it is true that the alternative energy program began with slow steps, I can declare in all conscience to the Brazilian people that at least one part of it, PROALCOOL [National Alcohol Program], is already a reality that will save us at least one-fourth of imported petroleum within a period of 3 years. If we are able to overcome the rest of the problem we will have coal and charcoal to replace petroleum; we will have a saving of another one-fourth or a little more in imported petroleum. And if we persist in these two and avail ourselves of other alternative energy sources, we can then look calmly at our balance of payments and return to that development rate we had in 1973.

I will then have funds to give to Piaui, to come here and pay off the debt and, in fact, bring to these people and to this state the progress to which so many are entitled because of your potentialities and the strength of your people.

BANK OFFICIAL SEES FOREIGN BANKS LENDING MORE CAUTIOUSLY

[Text] The position of large international banks in relation to Brazil will be much more cautious in lending next year. Although, on the one hand, they realize that they will have to continue renewing loans as they become due, they have decided, however, that this recycling will take place in the light of a new criterion: detailed examination of each case.

On the other hand, the new loans--whose amounts will be within well-defined limits so as not to represent an increase in comparison to the capital of each bank--will depend upon examination of the projects for which they are earmarked.

These were the impressions gathered by Prof Theophilo de Azeredo Santos, president of the National Federation of Banks (FENABAN) in discussions he held with various bankers during the International Monetary Fund meeting held in Washington last week.

This means that the international financial system is certain it cannot under any circumstance abandon Brazil to its fate. First, because it would jeopardize their own reliability as banks. Second, because Brazil represents a great economic potential, with its large market and enormous mineral reserves. But it must be borne in mind that bankers are also required to be guided by the viewpoint of their stockholders, which makes them more cautious and more demanding.

In his conversations, Azeredo heard detailed analyses of the excellent financing opportunities for projects such as Carajas (iron ore), Serra Pelada (gold), PROALCOOL [National Alcohol Program], PROCARVAO [National Coal and Charcoal Program?] and various others in the Amazon region. They are areas of application where the bankers are willing to take almost unlimited risks.

These projects require enormous funds for their accomplishment, produce goods that are strategic for industrialized countries and represent proven economic alternatives to petroleum. It can thus be assumed that Brazilian authorities have sufficient maneuvering room to avoid serious constriction of terms for financing the nation's external-account deficit. It is also safe to assume that loans to average-sized and less attractive companies will fall to proportionally lower priority levels in the eyes of the banks. In other words, on the whole, Brazil can maintain the flow of foreign resources needed, but with the drawback that it will be concentrated in new and large projects to the detriment, by outside decision, of a varied range of small undertakings.

A banker from one of the major banks told the FENABAN president that, according to data he has, Brazil in a few years may have a gold output similar to that of South Africa today--the largest gold producer in the Western World.

CARAJAS TO PRODUCE 35 MILLION TONS OF IRON ORE IN 1985

[Text] Brasilia--The Economic Development Council (CDE) yesterday approved execution of the Carajas project for annual production by the Rio Doce Valley Company of 35 million tons of iron ore beginning in 1985. Mines and Energy Minister Cesar Cals asserted in an interview that approval of the iron ore project represents "the first step toward carrying out the greater Carajas project."

He explained that approval of the Rio Doce Valley Company project, which has already been started by the company, is intended to place it within the context of the greater Carajas project, which provides for development by private enterprise of various other minerals in the region and execution of agriculture and livestock projects. Overall investments are about $30 billion, to be spent over a 10-year period, providing annual export revenue of $10 billion. The average price of iron ore is now $22 a ton.

Cesar Cals announced that, of the $2.5 billion to be invested in the Carajas iron ore project, 40 percent will come from the Rio Doce Valley Company's own funds and 60 percent from loans. Of the expected production of 35 million tons per year, 25 million is already contracted with the foreign market, essentially Europe and Japan, and the remaining 10 million tons will be for the domestic market, providing raw material for production of pig iron, sponge iron, ferroalloys and semi-finished steel, which will be carried out by private enterprise.

Projects

Without actually revealing which economic groups are interested in establishing projects in Carajas, Minister Cesar Cals reported that there is also a project for producing 5 million tons of sinter (metallurgical coal) with planned investments of $260 million, to provide annual revenue of $150 million.

There is also a project to produce 7 million tons of pig iron, budgeted at $2 billion, that will lead to revenues of $800 million annually. Another project is for production of 2 million tons annually of sponge iron, with investments of $500 million and sales of $220 million. And another is production of 1.6 million tons of ferronickel, budgeted at $1.1 billion, with expected receipts of $400 million a year.

There is a project for producing 150 million tons of ferromanganese, with investments of $220 million per year [as published]. For producing semi-finished steel, there is a project for 10 million tons a year, with planned investments of $9 billion and annual revenues of $5 billion.

Gold

Minister Cesar Cals revealed that gold production in Carajas, including the deposits of Serra das Andorinhas and the metal associated with the Carajas copper, should reach 6.5 tons annually, which represents the nation's current official production.

In regard to other nonferrous minerals, Cals announced that plans exist for producing 2 million tons of bauxite, 640,000 tons of alumina and 320,000 tons of aluminum, with aggregate investments forecast at $2.4 billion and revenues of $728 million a year.

According to him, a project will also be executed for producing 1 million tons of copper concentrate and 160,000 tons of metallic copper. Of the output of copper concentrate, 50 percent will go to the Caraiba Metals project in Bahia and 50 percent toward production of metallic copper in the region.

Agriculture and Livestock

Cesar Cals reported that production of wood charcoal will involve an area of 179,000 hectares, for which an investment of 1.3 billion cruzeiros [as published] and annual revenue of $420 million is forecast.

In the agricultural sector, he said that 1.5 million hectares are to be incorporated and divided into modules intended for producing rice, corn, beans, manioc, soybeans, sugar cane, African oil palm, babassu and other crops. Needed investments are estimated at $570 million and will result in annual revenue of $830 million.

In the livestock sector, 1 million hectares will be used, also divided into modules, for the purpose of achieving annual production of 100,000 tons of cattle, with investments of about $350 million and revenue of $223 million.

Energy

Electric power will be supplied by Tucurui Hydroelectric, which will produce 3.9 million kilowatts in its first phase and 4 million kilowatts in its second phase. There are also plans for constructing the Santa Isabel (1.6 million kilowatts) and Carolina (2 million kilowatts) hydroelectric stations.

Shipment of all production will be made by the Carajas-Ponta de Madeira (Maranhao) Railroad and by boat on the Tocantins River to the Vila do Conde port in Belem.

TRADE DEFICIT THROUGH SEPTEMBER PUT AT $2.9 BILLION

[Text] The Brazilian trade deficit from January through September this year must have been about $2.9 billion, according to an estimate made yesterday by Finance Minister Ernane Galveas in revealing that, based upon preliminary data, last month Brazil imported about $2.1 billion--the highest monthly total of imports in the history of Brazilian trade--while exports are not likely to have reached $1.7 billion. If these figures are confirmed, the trade deficit in September was over $400 million--one of the highest this year.

On petroleum alone the nation spent about $890 million--an amount that was surpassed only in April, when Brazil spent $910 million on imported oil. On the export side, coffee sales, from which the government expected a greater contribution during the second 6 months, brought in only $170 million.

The finance minister confirmed that the latest attempt to reduce the trade deficit is approval of additional export quotas for restricted products, such as textiles, footwear and steel, besides those for soybeans and their derivatives, which have been arranged. Another mechanism to help in this effort is reduction of Export Tax rates. Galveas acknowledges that there is a very serious dilemma between permitting higher export quotas and keeping the domestic market supplied, so as not to have problems with consumption. Imports of food--corn, rice, potatoes and garlic--also were a burden on the trade balance.

Despite this $2.9 billion deficit during the first 9 months of the year--beyond the government's most pessimistic expectation--the finance minister predicts a "substantial" reduction of this amount. He said he is counting on additional exports and a reduction in imports of petroleum and other raw materials. Galveas believes that by the end of the year the deficit may be around $2.5 billion. Before the September outcome, his estimate was about $2 billion.

The finance minister also pointed out that the inflation indices this month should be significantly higher than those of the previous month, mainly due to higher prices for petroleum derivatives.

POLITICIANS, CHURCH OFFICIALS COMMENT ON PRIESTS'S EXPULSION

PY031606 Sao Paulo Radio Bandeirantes Network in Portuguese 1000 GMT 3 Nov 80

[By correspondent (Carlos Rodriguez) from Brasilia--recorded]

[Text] There is no denying that the relations between the church and the state remain tense. In congress the opposition scores and the Social Democratic Party [PDS] supports the decision of the government to expel Father Vito Miracapillo.

Father Vito is already in Italy but one question still remains unanswered: What will be the repercussions of this expulsion? From the political viewpoint, even in the opinion of some PDS parliamentarians, this measure could undermine the image of the government and the PDS and harm them in times of election. This opinion, however, is not shared by PDS leader Deputy Hugo Mardini.

[Begin Mardini recording] First of all we were not the ones who decided on the expulsion of the priest. He himself is to blame for the decision of the government to expel him because he refused to hold Mass on the occasion of Brazilian Independence Day on 7 September.

Everyone sees it this way, and besides the Brazilian people are enlightened and no longer allow their electoral decisions to be swayed by anything but their consciences and cultural background. [End recording]

In the north and northeast there are several areas of tension where the church has taken the weakest side and there are rumors that more priests will be expelled.

Luciano Mendes Almeida, secretary general of the National Conference of Brazilian Bishops [CNBB], has explained his own viewpoint to this radio station.

[Begin Mendes Almeida recording] I am sorry to say that there are some points of conflict which must be solved as soon as possible and I have no doubts that the government is well-disposed toward providing a solution to these conflicts. Sometimes the solution is long in coming and difficult situations crop up.

There is also the fact that many persons are worried about the measures which might be directed against other priests. I must admit that we have no information of such measures and I do hope that none will be implemented, since Father Miracapillo's affair has had a marked effect on the fulfillment of the church's mission. [End recording]

The Father Miracapillo affair is bound to elicit still more reactions when President Figueiredo meets with the apostolic nuncio. Cardinal (Carmine Roco) indicated that the Miracapillo affair could be among the issues to be discussed at these talks and (?avoided) giving any further information concerning the development of the case.

ARMS PURCHASE FROM KOREA--Brazil is likely to purchase artillery equipment from South Korea. An Army delegation headed by Major Gen Mauricio de Freitas Moraes, military engineer in charge of the Salvage Directorate, departed for South Korea yesterday. Majors Cesar Rogerio Mathias and Jose Dante Alegretti were also in the delegation. The three officers will travel as members of the Materiel Inspection Commission provided for in the purchase contract for the artillery equipment. The contract was signed between the Brazilian government and the International Trade Group Limited (ITG). They will remain in South Korea until 24 October in order to fulfill the provisions of clauses of that document. The mission is considered "incidental and of a military nature," according to a ministerial directive. [Text] [Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 15 Oct 80 p 6] 8834

STEEL PRODUCTION DATA--Steel production in Brazil increased 10.8 percent in January through September of this year, reaching 11,346,000 tons compared to 10,237,000 tons in the same period last year, as announced yesterday by the IBS (Brazilian Iron and Steel Institute). In September 1,259,000 tons were produced, 5.5 percent more than the production of the same month in 1979. According to the IBS, production of rolled steel--9,423,000 tons--was 9.2 percent greater than that of January through September last year. Flat-rolled steel totaled 5,244,000 tons and nonflat-rolled steel was 4,178,000 tons, which were increases of 7.1 and 12.1 percent respectively. In September rolled steel reached 1,037,000 tons, 1.6 percent higher than 1979 production. Pig iron produced by integrated mills during the 9 months totaled 7,665,000 tons, compared to 6,978,000 tons the previous year, representing an increase of 9.9 percent. By region, September production had the following distribution: Minas Gerais, 467,000 tons; Sao Paulo, 390,000 tons; Rio de Janeiro, 294,000 tons; and other states, 106,800 tons. In September, production of pig iron by the integrated mills--without including independent producers--was 833,000 tons, compared to 809,000 tons in the same month of 1979, increasing 2.9 percent. DECLINE IN CRUZEIRO--Brasilia--Beginning today, the cruzeiro is devalued an additional 1.551 percent against the U.S. dollar, which is now purchased nationwide for 58.28 cruzeiros and sold for 58.48 cruzeiros, in the 16th minidevaluation of the year, 15 days after the 23 September readjustment. The 1.551 percent increase was added to the prevailing purchase rate of 57.39 cruzeiros and raises the cumulative increase since 31 December 1979 to 37.68 percent. With the increasingly remote possibility of a maxidevaluation, the fortnightly minidevaluations of the cruzeiro still have a margin of 5.389 percent until the end of the year within the new goal of 50 percent preestablished by the monetary authorities. Initially, it was 45 percent. Should this new goal of 50 percent exchange devaluation for the period from July 1980 through June 1981 not be revised, the cruzeiro will be devalued about 40 percent by that date, as it has already lost 9.721 percent of its purchasing power against the U.S. dollar since 1 July. RISE IN INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION--Brazilian industrial production increased 6.45 percent in the 12 months ending with August of this year, according to data reported yesterday by the Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics. Production of petroleum derivatives fell 3.5 percent. The increase for the first 8 months of this year over the corresponding period last year was 7.32 percent. During the 12-month period, there was also a drop of 0.2 percent in production of automotive vehicles and about 4 percent in production of tobacco. The largest increases in the same period were in mineral extraction (18.3 percent), plastic goods (14.8 percent) and machinery and electrical and communications material (about 12 percent). The IBGE [Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics] data indicate that in the last 12 months capital goods production increased 4.2 percent, intermediate goods production increased 7.3 percent and consumer goods production increased 4.3 percent. In the last item, durable consumer goods production increased 8.9 percent. Durable consumer goods also had the biggest increase over July--7.8 percent. SENATORS COMMENT ON REAGAN'S ELECTION--Senator Francisco Leite Chaves [Brazilian Labor Party, Parana State] today warned the Brazilian Government about the reactionary ideas--which would be contrary to our national interests--contained in an interview granted to the press by a foreign policy adviser of U.S. President-elect Ronald Reagan. He believes the Brazilian Government officials should look with concern on the new U.S. Government because Brazil cannot go along with a policy marked by submissiveness. After expressing his concern about the upcoming Reagan administration's promises of adopting a tough stance, Leite Chaves praised President Carter whom he regarded as the greatest President of recent times. Senator Luiz Cavalcante said he preferred Reagan, while Senator Gilvan Rocha noted that the U.S. elections have confirmed that there are neither friends nor enemies, but countries which are either strong or weak from the commercial viewpoint. TRADE BALANCE DEFICIT--From January through September, Brazil's balance of trade has accumulated a deficit of $2.8. This is the difference between $17.2 worth of imports and $14.4 of exports. The finance ministry has explained that this is the greatest 9-month deficit since 1974 when the petroleum crisis was at its peak and it is exactly twice as large as in the first 9 months of 1979. [Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 1 Nov 80 p 1 PY]

FUEL FROM VEGETABLE OILS--The Energy System Production Company of Ceara State has disclosed the development of a chemical process whereby vegetable oils from cotton, peanuts, coconuts, African palm trees (dende), oiticica, castor beans and others can be transformed into a fuel with properties comparable to those of diesel oil. The process has already been granted a patent by the National Industry Property Institute and a prototype plant is already manufacturing the product, which has been given the name "prodiesel." This product is currently being tested at official laboratories. [Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 31 Oct 80 p 27 PY]

TEACHERS ON STRIKE--Porto Alegre--Demanding a 45.27 percent salary readjustment, 100,000 teachers in Rio Grande do Sul state schools have gone on strike. The movement has stopped activities in 442 schools in the state's capital Porto Alegre and has been joined by 80 to 90 percent of teachers throughout the state. REACTION TO PDC LEADER ZALDIVAR'S FORCED EXILE

Speculation on Reasons for Action

Santiago HOY in Spanish 22-28 Oct 80 pp 8-10

/Article by Ignacio Gonzalez Camus: "The 'Debts' of a Dissident"/

/Text/ On Thursday the 16th a relative arrived at the home of the Zaldivar family which was stunned by the government's decision. The relative had been inquiring about--at the level closest to where the decision was made--how firm the decision made by the government was. He shook his head. "There is no case. The 'yeses' won."

It had not been that simple. During the course of reviewing the decision, there was disagreement at the Diego Portales Building, the relative was able to ascertain during his inquiry.

The government's hand, after remaining extended to prominent political figures, closed into a tight fist. The leader of the PDC /Christian Democratic Party/, Andres Zaldivar, could not reenter the country because of statements he is alleged to have made to the Mexican daily UNO MAS UNO (See the following article).

Above an overwhelmingly gray backdrop, typical of a country where there have been no "political events" since last month's plebiscite, this mushroom cloud loomed resplendant and threatening, the result of a human decision. The thread of events had seemed so normal that they appeared like a provincial siesta. Reverend Raul Hasbun was pleased with the peaceful situation and on his return from Europe he hailed the situation he found. He found a changed Chile. There is a good, calm feeling," he said reassuringly.

Zaldivar left Santiago on 3 October on a 20 day trip. The chapter on the plebiscite was closed. The positions were established. That is why the government's decision was so devastating. There also was an intangible but comforting element. It was believed that the assurances, to the effect that the regime did not "hold any blank checks," given by sectors favoring an "opening" before and after 11 September were still in effect. No one expected anyone to call in some debt that was outstanding since the start of the plebiscite campaign.

Limits--However, conditions have been placed on the doves. It is perfectly all right to have differences but the legitimacy of the regime must be kept in mind and Marxist factions cannot be considered as valid players. If dissidence from the center and center-left is expressed along accepted avenues what problem could arise?

The government's charges against Zaldivar included precisely those demands set aside as requirements for surviving. The former senator is accused of seeking to divide and, what is more, cause the armed forces to revolt by saying that he expected the rise of "officers who favored democracy" to form a civilian-military government and by refusing to accept the "existing legal order and the one which was just approved."

Thus Zaldivar was placed in a situation not unlike that of 10,000 Chileans who are not allowed to return to Chile, according to figures made available to Chilean ambassadors at the start of the year by the Interior Ministry.

However, the reason on which the government based its decision--certain statements made abroad to a Mexican daily--was denied not only by Zaldivar but also by the journalist who allegedly interviewed him as well as by the newspaper itself. As a result, the regime's decision was without foundation. Pinochet's former press secretary, Federico Willoughby, defended the decision although he conceded that it was based on "unsubstantiated and unreliable" reports.

A new statement by the government contained a small development. Its original decision was a preventive measure and was not meant as a sanction. The decision would be reviewed if Zaldivar "made a proper retraction" and if he would promise "officially and publicly to respect the framework of our legal system."

Retroactive Scope?--The Zaldivar Larrain family interpreted the move as more than sanctioning of an isolated incident. In their opinion it was an effort to punish a collection of opposing positions. Attorney Adolfo Zaldivar told HOY that it had been proved that his brother had not been in Mexico or granted an interview. He added: "In the meantime, if the measure isn't reconsidered, it will be obvious that the reason for the decision is that the regime considers him to be a political dissident."

The initial reaction to the incident was a questioning of the tacit "statute of guarantees" which had been displayed before the groups that are permitted to operate in this new society by the "supporters of a democratic opening." HOY questioned the president of the New Democracy group, Roberto Pulido.

"I would have been in complete agreement with the measure if Zaldivar had actually made the statements. But he has already explained the situation. Once it was confirmed that he did not make the statements, then I believe that the decision should be revoked. In addition, it would mean that he recognizes the existing framework and continues to be a politician who works within the acceptable limits of public action and politics in our country. This is an indication of how the international press lies, how it comes to distort the statements of an opposition leader to hurt Chile."

Other supporters of a "democratic opening" preferred not to be quoted but they assured HOY that unofficial efforts were made to have the government back off from its decision. They preferred not to make statements, feeling that "it could be more harmful than helpful."

Repercussions--One of the factors which had a major impact on the review of the government's decision was concern over international repercussions resulting from the refusal to allow Zaldivar to return to Chile. At least until the plebiscite was held, the government's position was skeptical and pragmatic at the same time. It was not possible to give ground on the chosen institutional road in exchange for international recognition which, on the other hand, would not necessarily be completely forthcoming. There were certain domestic measures which had to be adopted regardless of other considerations.

However, there was a ray of hope. Brazilian President Joao Baptista Figueiredo visited Chile and invited Augusto Pinochet to Brazil. But wouldn't this spoil the effect? International commentator Alejandro Magnet in a news analysis over Radio Cooperative pointed out that the decision against Zaldivar placed Figueiredo "in an uncomfortable position" because of congressional opposition in his country. Congress criticized his visit to Santiago because "to a certain extent it implied a diplomatic pat on the back for General Pinochet's regime."

PDC leaders told HOY that Zaldivar received telephone messages of solidarity in Rome (where he is in semi-exile pending a permanent decision by the government) from the prime ministers of Spain, Belgium and Holland, from West German CDU /Christian Democratic Union/ leader Helmut Kohl, from the president and vice president of Ecuador and President Luis Herrera Campins of Venezuela.

They added that UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim sent a cable to Pinochet and that both Madrid and Washington sent messages to the Chilean ambassadors in their respective countries. The Vatican, the sources said, contacted the Chilean ambassador to the Holy See, Hector Riesle, and the Chilean representative on the mediation team, Enrique Bernstein.

For his part, the president of the World Union of Christian Democrats, Mariano Rumor, made an appeal in Rome to international political and social forces to begin "at every turn" action against the measure.

Action Taken--The actions of the Chilean Christian Democrats in response to the government's decision are based on a deliberate and calm strategy in which the initial effort was left up to Zaldivar. The former senator took a stand with the backing of his parents, brothers and four daughters: He is not ready to compromise his principles to gain permission to return.

He made this clear in the statement he issued in Rome on 18 October. He said he was trained to respect the law and that is why he feels he has the right to maintain and express differences with developments in Chile. "I have no doubts about what my conduct should be," he added. He stressed that the only road to democracy was the peaceful road.

The "Zaldivar case" has laid bare another serious problem, that of setting moral limits. Where is the subtle and just line of disagreement with governments against whom there is substantial opposition? Up until what point must one obey?

With the cards on the table, the Interior Minister reported on Monday the 20th that he would reconsider the decision if Zaldivar signs a formal statement prepared by the government before a Chilean consul in which he promises to accept the duly constituted authority, the existing legal system and the new constitution. It definitely is a limited option. It is a promise designed to place a "man of ideas," which is what a politician is, in a very difficult position.

HOY Editorial Protests Action

Santiago HOY in Spanish 22-28 Oct 80 p 7

/Editorial by Emilio Filippi: "In the Wake of a Decision"/

/Text/ A Mexican newspaper published statements it attributed to PDC President Andres Zaldivar when he was in Israel. During the alleged interview the opposition leader is pictured as making statements which the government felt threatened domestic peace and led it to announce that Zaldivar could not return to Chile.

Not long after the contents of the interview and the government's decision were made public, the former finance minister hastened to put things in order. The Mexican daily did the same by stating that "it had inexcusably interpolated" the compromising and false statements. Later it was clearly seen that Zaldivar not only had not granted an interview to the foreign newsman but that the statements which were quoted correctly came from a press conference Zaldivar held in Santiago before the plebiscite was held.

These are the facts.

As this column was being written, the Minister of the Interior had not yet reconsidered the explusion order. However, Zaldivar clearly went on record as being a man who is mindful of the law, who has always worked within its limits and, even though he is clearly and publicly in the opposition, this has never placed him nor does it now among the ranks of those favoring sedition and violence.

This was acknowledged even by some newspapers which unquestionably support the present regime and on many occasions, as is natural, have disagreed with former Minister Zaldivar.

We have never supported this kind of repressive action. We believe that it is in Chile's best interest to be tolerant of others opinions--even though sometimes they are unpleasant--and we believe that when a crime is committed through free speech then it should be handled by the appropriate courts with an impartial and fair trial.

If injustices are committed even in the judicial process, can we not expect them to occur with even greater frequency when unilateral administrative decisions are made by an individual who is judge and jury? In the case under discussion, there is no question that the decision was made hastily because punishment was imposed for an error that was not committed. The case is worse than that because the victim not only did not say what the Mexican daily attributed to him but his views are just the opposite.

But it is interesting to note that some government politicians have taken advantage of the situation, have made use of the government's decision to express their fanaticism and hate despite the fact that they claim to "represent public opinion." The same people who earlier demanded respect for their opinions, who organized armed militias or conspired openly, today express shock because there are people who use the road of non-violence and peaceful opposition to express frank and loyal disagreement with government policy.

If it is true that we are starting to move down the road of transition towards a more vigorous institutional system, it would be well for those who call themselves government supporters to be consistent. The transition period requires that past stages be surpassed, including the state of emergency, so that the country can develop politically. This can only be done by creating conditions for peaceful coexistence. And we all know that political and social coexistence means living in the company of other whose customs, opinions, aspirations and views are different. To achieve this it is necessary to have mutual respect which after all is nothing more than tolerance. In other words, the opposite of fanaticism and sectarianism.

Group of 24 Issues Protest

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 25 Oct 80 p C-2

/Text/ The Constitutional Study Group, the so-called Group of 24, yesterday released a statement protesting the decision forbidding Andres Zaldivar to return to Chile and expressing its support for the family. Following is the text of that statement whose final paragraph points out that the majority of the Group's members are attorneys who view their action to be in the service of freedom:

The government adopted the decision because it believed attorney Zaldivar made statements to a foreign daily which it viewed as crimes against the state. Mr Zaldivar denied the charge saying he did not make the statements attributed to him. The daily itself corroborated Zaldivar's denial and stated that "inexcusable interpolations" were m a d e in the original. The denials did not satisfy the government which has demanded that Zaldivar promise to officially and publicly respect the framework of what it calls "our legal system."

Mr Zaldivar issued another statement saying that as an attorney he respects and has always respected the law, but this did not satisfy the Ministry of the Interior which is requiring Zaldivar to go before a Chilean consul and sign a statement prepared in Chile in which he promises to "respect the duly constituted authority, the existing legal structure and the new political constitution approved during the 11 September plebiscite." This is the price he must pay if he wishes to return to Chile.

It is obvious that the government's position we have just described constitutes a gross violation of Zaldivar's basic human rights such as free speech and the right to return to Chile and live in his country as guaranteed in international documents which bind the government, in the constitutional documents prepared by the government and in the constitution itself which the government promulgated. Unquestionably, the government's decision was made because Zaldivar is a well-known critic and opponent of the regime in power. On the other hand, it is very surprising that the government is trying to force recognition of and submission to what it calls "our legal system" since, as it has proclaimed, the constitution it promulgated received the support of an overwhelming majority of the people.

Since the creation of our organization, the Constitutional Study Group understood that it was its civic duty to promote, through study and free examination, the basis for a broad democratic agreement to serve as the foundation of the future institutional system. At its center lies the full and real exercise of human rights--which ethically rank higher than any other in the legal order--as an insurmountable barrier against the spread of state power so that no public institution or official can, in exercising their functions, under any circumstances violate or ignore these rights.

Within that frame of reference, our group recently signed a solemn commitment to democracy "as the only system that is compatible with the values of liberty, equality and participation, that is based on the people's right to govern themselves and which guarantees the effective existence of human rights." In keeping with this position, we assumed the duties of fighting in our country for the restoration of public liberties, full enforcement of the Declaration of Universal Human Rights and the complementary pacts ratified by Chile, the re-establishment of unity among Chileans and an end to all forms of repression, terrorism or exile, to defend as a nation the dignity of the individual, to express solidarity with the persecuted and to give moral and material support to the victims of repression.

These events lead us to vigorously protest the violation of the basic rights of a very honorable Chilean like Andres Zaldivar Larrain and to express our solidarity with him and his family. We also protest the veiled threats in the government's documents mentioned earlier against those of us who disagree with the regime's proposals and procedures. We once again warn that the government's action delays the possibilities of obtaining true internal peace based on justice and achieving national unity because, on the contrary, it accentuates the conditions leading to an ever growing dangerous polarization.

/Article by Jorge Edwards: "The Case of Andres Zaldivar"/

/Text/ I left on a trip a little over a month ago when the echoes of the 11 September plebiscite campaign had not yet died down. We had been called on to vote "yes" or "no" on a new constitution. Many of us maintained that the campaign was not balanced because most of the press and TV coverage was given to the supporters of the new constitution.

There was, however, small but tangible space given to those wishing to dissent and one of the most prominent opponents, one of the visible leaders, was Andres Zaldivar. His position and that of all opponents to the new constitution, including myself, provoked "standard" and predictable criticism from what could be called the leftist flank: Support for a "no" vote in actuality meant to play the government's game. In other words, it would make the anticipated "yes" vote, which also seemed very predictable, legitimate.

The truth is that at that time I never heard Andres Zaldivar make a statement which could be construed as being subversive and I followed the campaign very closely. Disagreement and subversion are two completely different things. They are almost conflicting ideas. And I believe that we would be in great danger, that national coexistence would be threatened if we did not fully understand this difference. Our desire for order which has always characterized Chile, according to the best Hispanic American writers, that stability which made us stand out from other republics in the past, is nothing more than a capacity to coexist in the midst of diversity. The only function of a political constitution, the only essential function, has been to create a framework for coexistence.

Later, while in Washington, I was surprised to learn that an article from a little known Mexican newspaper had been used to prevent Andres Zaldivar from returning to Chile. I don't know what the article said, but I do know that Zaldivar issued a denial and that the Mexican daily supported his denial and, in the process, fired the reporter.

The letter of obedience which Zaldivar is now being asked to sign is not, unfortunately, anything new in modern society. It corresponds to the purification ceremonies of Ferdinand VII and to the self-criticism of present-day totalitarian states, but on a smaller scale. During this trip I met with Cuban dissident poet Heberto Padilla and I can assure you that I learned much about the subject of self-criticism. Has an effort been made to keep this from happening in Chile? Wasn't that the purpose of events of recent years?

The action against Zaldivar places us all face to face with the following alternative: humiliation or exile. I deliberately used the word "everyone" because it would not be too difficult for today's conformists to become tomorrow's dissidents. I could name dozens of people who voted "yes" only a month and a half ago and who today disagree, or at least feel very uncomfortable, with the decision against Zaldivar.

Without having consulted anyone, I believe that it would be reasonable to revoke the decision and I am convinced that the great majority of Chileans would be relieved to see it revoked.

Rodriguez Grez Defends Action

Santiago TERCERA DE LA HORA in Spanish 26 Oct 80 p 3

/Article by Pablo Rodriguez Grez: "Zaldivar's Expulsion"/

/Text/ The basic mission of the government is to respect the law and to have it respected. This is a very important prerequisite for peaceful coexistence in Chile. If the government violates the law or if it allows the law to be violated, all social organization would be destroyed and anarchy would take over the country.

Unfortunately, while the military government has consolidated its power and outlined the new institutional system, the "professional politicians" seem to have lost their common sense and sight of reality. Instead of adapting their strategies to the new conditions, their views have crystalized and they ignore the course of history. This mistake has a price for the government as well as for the victims.

Desperation is always a poor adviser. For example, the political opposition argued that the plebiscite would be a monumental "election fraud." They directed their criticism in this direction for the obvious purpose of disavowing the results. Later, faced with the exemplary fairness of the plebiscite--which the majority of Chileans admit without hesitation--there is talk of "political fraud," a euphemism for their stupidity and obfuscation.

But more serious by far, I believe, is the fact that the denigrating campaign is not directed at the Chileans but rather at foreign political groups which for 7 years have maintained a hostile position towards the military regime. The same old leaders of traditional party politics travel periodically to the five continents to discuss Chile's internal situation and to discredit the armed forces. They thus heighten the virulence with which Soviet and Cuban activists combat the political situation Chile is experiencing. Unpatriotically they encourage the attacks on us and they poison even more the international atmosphere at a very delicate moment given the boundary disputes we must face.

Existing legislation

On 17 October 1973 the military government junta through Decree Law No. 78 "recessed all political parties, organizations, groups, factions and movements not covered by Decree Law No. 77 of 8 October 1973" which outlawed Marxist groups and parties.

Later, on 12 March 1977 Decree Law No. 1,697 "dissolved all political parties, organizations, groups, factions or movements" not covered by Decree Law No. 77.

From this we can see that party politics is illegal and that communism, regardless of how it operates, is an illegal association which has been defined as a crime.

This does not mean, as some superficial opponents claim, that political ideas are banned. What has been banned are partisan tasks or participation in proselytizing campaigns which are characteristic of political parties.

I accept, as I have said on many occasions, the grounds on which the government's decision is based. Prolongued partisan silence is the only way to revamp our political habits and help us out of the crisis we were in in September of 1973. The activities of this administration, supported by two out of every three Chileans who voted to have it continue in power, are the best proof of popular support for the inspiring principles of the military government.

Zaldivar's Conduct

In an interview with a Santiago daily on 7 February 1979 with the above mentioned legislation still in force, Zaldivar announced that his party had not disbanded and that it was still intact. Later, he very bluntly said that he did not respect the laws outlawing political activity and he took it upon himself to judge their moral and legal basis. We can imagine what would happen if everyone in Chile would do the same thing. It would be impossible to keep order and the law of the jungle would prevail. Paradoxically, these individuals are the same ones who confidently and irritatingly speak of democracy and a state of law.

On 14 September, after the results of the plebiscite were made public, Zaldivar, speaking on Peruvian television in the name of "his party," insisted that "a great fraud" had been perpetrated, called the government a dictatorship and blamed it for monumental deceit. He made similar statements in the 22 September issue of VISION in which he slanders the president of the republic.

Even if the "extrapolations" /sic/ (read lies) are omitted, Zaldivar's statements to Mexican daily UNO MAS UNO, which he did not deny until after he learned of the preventive explusion measure, are nothing more than a reafirmation of his previous statements in which he ignores the moratorium on political activities, disregards the law outlawing political parties and makes slanderous remarks about government machinations to win the plebiscite.

There is no need to continue. It is sufficient to remember that Zaldivar calls himself the president of the Christian Democratic Party, a title which he uses to mock existing legislation on the subject.

The decision then is fully based on laws that are in force and it has been adopted with sufficient reason.

But the government, taking pride in its level of tolerance, has said it is willing to reconsider its decision if Zaldivar formally agrees to respect the law, constituted authority and the new constitution approved by the people. This position demonstrates the justice with which the Minister of the Interior is acting and his reason for making this painful decision.

It doesn't seem possible that under these circumstances resentment or prejudice could exist against the government, that individuals could question the governmens authority to make a decision that was necessary to safeguard internal law and order and Chile's sovereignty.

KHOMEYNI BLAMED FOR RIFT WITH SUNNIS, ARABS

Bogota EL SIGLO in Spanish 4 Oct 80 p 4

[Editorial by Fernando Buitrago: "Khomeyni, the Man Responsible"]

[Text] Fernando Buitrago, 41, is a veteran journalist of the spoken and written press. Currently he edits the television newscast entitled "Seven Days in the World."

Rather than a limited war, the current conflict between Iraq and Iran is religious, with Sunnite Moslems against Shiite Moslems. It is also a war between two national groups with a deadly hatred for each other: the Arabs and the Persians. And within the Arabs and the Persians there are the Turks and the Kurds. For the time being the conflict fits within this framework. Up to a certain point, East and West having nothing to do with it. However it is very possible that they will find themselves involved. Russia and the United States have adopted cautious policies. Mr Gromyko, the eternal minister of foreign affairs of the Soviet Union, who has held that post for 34 years, gave a speech at the UN urging conciliation between the two parties.

It is the fault of the Ayatollah Khomeyni, who since his triumph over the Shah has been nurturing the hostility of the Shiites against the Arabs, that war was declared by Iraq. The intention of the Iranian leaders to carry through their fanatic and absurd revolution, with the persecution of everything which smacks of the West, as far as Southern Asia, the northern part of Africa and the Middle East, has never been concealed. This statement is confirmed by the fact that the Arabs say openly that they are trying to overthrow Khomeyni. They want to get rid of him. They want to pay him back for all his bold ventures in the name of that religion and that hackneyed morality he preaches.

Khomeyni is also to blame for the fact that the Persian Gulf, aptly termed the "throat of the Western world" because through it passes the greater part of the oil bound for Europe, Japan and the United States, is in the threatened condition it is. For the Shah won the title of "policeman" of the gulf, and he made it valid. He was a good policeman. He had his armed troops, who served as a real fortress both on land and sea and in the air. No one dared challenge them. Now this is no longer the case, Khomeyni annihilated these armed forces. He murdered their generals, and the few who remained deserted en masse. A brave air force general, Said Mehdiyun, who was placed in command of the air force after the revolution against the Shah, was executed a little more than a month ago, the justification being charges of conspiracy. The boastful claims of this mentally unbalanced man have totally isolated Iran. The Ayatollah alienated the United States and forced its withdrawal. He invaded the American embassy with his revolutionary student kidnapers, inflamed and impassioned by his preaching. It is now almost a year that 52 innocent officials at that facility have been hostages. He has also kept Russia excluded from any influence on the course of the Islamic revolution, such that in one way or another, he must pay for his lack of political vision. How can he fail to see today that thanks to his arbitrary handling of foreign relations, no one except for the Iranians themselves abroad feel any sympathy for this revolution?

Another circumstance placing Iran at a disadvantage with regard to Iraq is found in the fact that its military equipment was supplied by the United States and Great Britain. These supplies have now been halted and, naturally, this equipment is now becoming worn and outdated. No relations are maintained with the United States, and Britain is maintaining an attitude of cautious waiting. It is not known what the result of an Israeli offer to supply weapons to Iran might be.

As proof that the most influential Arab governments are opposed to Khomeyni there is the support which has been offered to Iraq by extremely wealthy Saudi Arabia, the Moorish chieftains in the emirates and the kings of Jordan and Morocco. Only Syria and Libya, due to natural differences among the Arabs themselves, remain uninvolved in the conflict. And also Algeria, due to pure politics, because it represents Iranian interests in Washington and thus cannot intervene in favor of Baghdad.

What can be extracted from this is the question as to who will command in the Persian Gulf. Not Iran, because it has already lost mastery of the islands which surround the gulf. Neither Khomeyni nor any successor of his has the capability to deal with the new situation. The Iranians no longer have powerful armed forces nor a social organization which would define them as a modern, well-armed state. The country is in chaos. If it is Iraq, it will be the Arab world which will command. An Arab world which is pro-Western and pro-Soviet at the same time. This alternative would be very dangerous for the West. Will the superpowers intervene? Will there be a more direct dispute over this zone? This is the unknown factor. On the other hand, a conflict will certainly have a deleterious effect on the world oil supply. Another OPEC increase. This is a natural assumption, because this war has destroyed a part of the large refineries where crude oil for the West is processed.

UNITY CANDIDATE DISCUSSES POSSIBILITY OF VICTORY

Administrative Austerity, Honesty Urged

San Jose LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 8 Oct 80 p 12

[Interview with Rodolfo Mendez Mata, by Wilmer Murillo in the column "Political Wednesdays in the Repbulic"; date and place not given]

[Text] A serious, honest, responsible and integrated effort by the governmental team, capable of bringing about profound administrative reform such as to promote the economic and social development of the most neglected classes--this is the basis of the thinking of the faction represented by engineer Rodolfo Mendez Mata, according to what he himself has said.

The proposed presidential candidate said moreover, in an exclusive interview granted to LA REPUBLICA, that his government would be one of total austerity in which the various groups and sectors would be given a role.

[Question] By training, you have always been an executive, a man of action and an organizer. What led you to leave all of this and enter fully into politics?

[Answer] The world is experiencing difficult problems, which inevitably affect Costa Rica. The present picture is dark and the future still more so, and thus a broad formula of national consensus is required and there is a need to provide an alternative which will give Costa Rica courageous solutions of sacrifice and reorganization on the economic, social and political levels.

In February of 1980, the National Liberation Party chose its candidate and presented the country with a traditional solution, a prospect now known to all, embodied in Don Luis Alberto Monge, who I believe cannot be the solution for the year 1982.

I waited for many months and repeatedly rejected the pressing arguments urged upon me by leaders from the base to the national level.

I awaited the appearance of an individual who could unite the various groups making up the Unity coalition to offer a solid solution, an alternative of unity which would not only guarantee triumph in the 1982 elections but also the solutions Costa Rica needs for its next government.

I thought over my decision very carefully and came to the conclusion it was my duty to participate in political action. I have consistently proclaimed the need for all of us citizens to participate in order to make of our representative democracy a truly participational democracy, and therefore an example had to be set by precisely those who proclaimed this type of citizen's participation.

I should make it clear that I am not a traditional politician, and I have taken this step not for reasons of pride or to satisfy personal vanity, but with a clear desire to serve Costa Rica.

For many years I have held important government posts, have explained my views to the public and have derived from this service the experience and capacity to claim with honesty that I can carry out the task of serving the country as president of the republic.

[Question] If you become president of the republic, what would the three basic pillars of your administration be?

[Answer] It is difficult to limit the support or foundation structures of an administration to a given number, but I believe that the characteristics would have to be and would be serious, honest, responsible and integrated work by a government team capable of bringing about profound governmental administrative reforms such as to promote economic and social development to the benefit of the needy classes, and increasing production on the basis of recognition that Costa Rica can perfectly well be competitive on the international market if we equip ourselves with proper administrative mechanisms and continue in speedy form with measures to promote the export of farm products. It would be an austerity government in which we would seek to offer a role to the various groups and sectors such that they will be guided by the action of the government, but taking into account that we can only achieve full development with labor and the national effort which comes from collective action.

[Answer] I feel that the possibility of triumph for the Unity coalition is very broad and clear because of the fact that the National Liberation Party is offering a weak candidate who does not have a consensus even among its supporters. On the other hand, the political parties are strengthening their own action and work, although they are in the opposition, demonstrating that they are interested in promoting national development, interested in and capable of finding or proposing solutions to the benefit of the needy classes.

The national liberation party, on the contrary, has concerned itself solely with seeking to block the work of the government, to paralyze major projects for the communities and to avoid solutions of an economic nature, and this is weakening the party.

On the other hand, Unity has the alternative of offering a capable, strong and united group, offering proposals and programs to continue those which have been accepted by the electorate and to correct the others which require correction.

We should recall that Unity represents the majority sector of the country and that if it wins the elections, as it should, with a candidate rallying and uniting all supporters, this is a guarantee of triumph.

[Answer] I have made it very clear that the next government will be one structured on the basis of social Christian doctrine. I believe this would be the most apt definition.

[Question] If you win at the February convention and if you become president, would you govern with the participation of all the parties in the coalition? What role would you give them?

[Answer] Unity rallies the various coalitions and therefore it is representative of them, and a government must be representative of all. We must proceed to act in such a way that, forgetting our origins, we constitute a single group, without distinctions of any kind. I would seek to govern with the participation of all Costa Rican citizens, since it is they my government would be trying to benefit. Citizens' participation in government positions, as well as in communal, trade union or any other kind of action, is basic to the development of our country.

[Answer] Personally I do not believe in "anti" positions. I really believe that Unity offers the people of Costa Rica an alternative, an alternative which should be outlined in positions of consensus and through definite government proposals and programs. I would want then for our action to become national unity action on the basis of the concepts of work, seriousness, responsibility, action and thought which we will outline throughout the political campaign which is beginning.

[Answer] I would hope for very critical but constructive opposition, an opposition making an effort to contribute to the building of the Costa Rica we all need. Let it make its line of thought known, but not devote its efforts to destroying what it has cost a great deal to build. We must understand that we have the responsibility of improving social, economic and political conditions for our people, to which end I will always be available for dialog. I will always be ready to listen respectfully and calmly to the positions put forth to this end by those who are our opponents. Similarly, I would hope for reciprocal respect.

[Question] Do you believe that the law on political party campaign financing should be maintained, amended or abolished?

[Answer] I have made it clear that the postponement of the political debt should be eliminated, but knowing and understanding that this system has already sunk deep roots among the Costa Rican people. Secondarily, it should be limited, since it is reaching an entirely undesirable point.

[Question] Theoretically, how should the legislative assembly be organized and how should it function?

[Answer] The political parties should be most cautious and careful when it comes to selecting their deputies, such that they will be truly representative of the community to which they belong, emerging from these communities through a democratic process, and having the training and competence to carry out local and national work. Those who are elected as deputies should realize that their function serves not only the interests of the political party which elected them but that they have a priority obligation to the country and the people who elected them. They must therefore make their effect felt as servants of the communities they represent and as servants of the country and the entire population, devoting themselves absolutely and constantly with responsibility, seriousness and objectivity to the analysis of the proposals which may produce solutions of a national nature. They must also maintain critical views of the work of the executive branch, but with a clearly constructive attitude, rather than a destructive one which is often seen.

[Question] What general policy would you pursue with regard to the rest of Central America, given the conditions currently prevailing in the isthsmus?

[Answer] Costa Rica must continue to work toward the strengthening of the Central American Common Market, to which end the closest relations among the countries included becomes indispensable. Central America is experiencing very difficult political and social problems which we hope can be overcome in the course of the coming years. Relationships based to this end on friendship will have to be analyzed in accordance with the circumstances with which the future provides us.

[Question] Are you optimistic about the February convention?

[Answer] Yes, I truly feel very optimistic because I have received massive support from the leadership in Costa Rica and the community in general, particularly in the past 10 days, since the official launching of my participation in the convention process. Thus I remain optimistic, due to the welcome given me by the various communities and the organization cadres which have been consolidating, which I hope will serve for a truly objective analysis of the present political situation.

Opposition, PUP Discussed

San Jose LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 15 Oct 80 p 9

[Interview with Rodolfo Mendez Mata, by Wilmer Murillo in the column "Political Wednesdays in the Republic"; date and place not given]

[Text] The Unity voters, faced with the process of choosing a presidential candidate, have before them four possibilities. And if no unforeseen event intervenes they will go to the polls on 22 February to choose one of the four candidates, in what would seem to be the most bitter electoral dispute in the anti-liberationist sector.

What may possibly happen at the polls is something which obviously no one can predict without risk of error.

One of the aspirants is engineer Rodolfo Mendez Mata, until a short time ago minister of public works and transport. He has clearly described his campaign as one in favor of a consensus formula for the resolution of the problems of the country. He claims to be a candidate who can create unity. In stating that he is the consensus candidate, he says that he has justified hopes that his message will be understood by supporters and adversaries. Mendez explained his viewpoints to the readers of LA REPUBLICA as follows.

[Answer] Out of a sense of responsibility. The difficult situation Costa Rica is experiencing requires the full and broad participation of all citizens to find the necessary solutions. I am not a traditional politician. Truly, for a long time I sought to refrain from direct political action, in the hope that there would within the Unity emerge an individual who could represent the various groups which make it up. But in my view this did not happen. I was subjected to pressure by the leaders at the base to adopt a position in the struggle. They believed that the work I had done in the MOPT [Ministry of Public Works and Transport] demonstrated a level of capacity, responsibility and honesty, and that they not only reflected the thought necessary for government action, but achievements as well. My relations with the various communities are a factor in Unity. I have no aspirations for personal satisfaction. I regard myself as a part of a mechanism, and I am devoted to the task of representing these groups with a view to finding consensus formulae not only within my party, but throughout the country, in order to surmount the problems we are experiencing. And I am doing this with dedication and devotion.

[Question] The weapons case is still being discussed. You were accused of providing MOPT vehicles to aid the Sandinists in the civil war in Nicaragua. Were you involved in the transfer of weapons?

[Answer] There is no doubt that there are persons who can use this type of argument for political purposes. But those who have a certain administrative or governmental maturity know that each ministry is administered within its own scope. In special situations what happens is that one must turn to other institutions to provide vehicles, or some type of resources so that the other ministry can carry out its programs. If Public Security used MOPT vehicles during the emergency in Nicaragua, this does not mean that the head of the ministry knew of the specific use being made of them.

[Question] Were you informed at all times of the aid being provided to Nicaragua?

[Answer] I was aware of the situation Nicaragua was experiencing, but I did not know any specific details about what was happening.

[Question] What was the role it fell to you to play as a government official in connection with aid to Nicaragua?

[Answer] My role in government was as minister of public works. I played no role where Nicaragua was concerned.

[Question] If you are the elected Unity candidate, would you defend the work of the government of which you were a part?

[Answer] The work of this government is plain to see. It must be assessed by Costa Ricans in terms of things which were desirable and some which were not. My task would be to encourage good proposals as a government leader, to continue the things deemed desirable, with even greater speed if possible, and to revise certain others. What concerns me is that we sometimes want to retain the feeling of seeking reasons for objection, and I believe that if we want to raise Costa Rica from the level at which we are we must find the formulae for solutions to the problems. This is the responsibility of all--those who have served in the government or outside it, in activity in our political life and outside of it.

[Answer] The institutional transformation of the MOPT, which will produce substantial improvements in a series of projects and services being carried out and to be carried out in the future. Although I sometimes have been tempted to speak of the port work, the change in the transport apparatus, the advancement of road programs, the impetus given to primary and secondary-school projects, and finally so many things one could mention, the basic thing for me was the institutional reorganization of the MOPT.

[Answer] The return of the PUP must be examined on the basis of the commitments made and the corresponding moral alternatives. I absolutely support the attitude taken by the coalition officers. Although we are not represented in that committee, we believe that the party is very well represented within it and the decision it makes must be accepted.

[Question] Do you believe that the present status of the PUP benefits certain factions?

[Answer] What I believe is that currently we have embarked on a convention process and the groups which can vie for the domination of various parties must proceed to consolidate positions. The important thing for me is Unity. If we feel that we represent a permanent, ideological and democratic party, the basic thing is to strengthen Unity as such to the maximum. To some extent I regard other secondary aspects within the Unity as less important. Therefore I am trying by my attitude to strengthen the officers' position. They are imbued with a great desire for unity among all the members of the coalition and a prompt definition of Unity as a party.

[Answer] I represent a Unity faction.

[Question] You are frequently identified with the Calderon faction. Would you say this is an obstacle to your hopes for the nomination, in view of the fact that you are vying with Mr Calderon?

[Answer] I do not believe in obstacles or advantages deriving from one's origins. I believe that obstacles and disadvantages develop as a result of personal status, capacity and experience, method of acting, and demonstration of what has been and what can be done. There is now sufficient political maturity so that a decision can exclude mere origin.

[Question] You have launched a campaign concept to the effect that you are the candidate who can unite. Is this because you believe that both Calderon and non-Calderon supporters will support you?

[Answer] Over a period of time I have shown the membership of Unity that I maintain a position equidistant from the various groups which make it up. I was the first secretary of the coalition, chosen at a difficult moment, because it was felt that I represented various groups. Later I served in command of the campaign for the same reason. And throughout my service as an official I have had excellent relations with the various groups.

[Question] It has often been commented in the country that the trips taken by a minister who may run for office take on the nature of political tours. Would you reject the argument that you sought the candidacy when you were a minister?

[Answer] Yes, I reject it. I based my work in the government precisely on open concern for the needs of the country, and not any political orientation. In fact there are people who have criticized me for remaining so long in the government, saying that it was prejudicial to me. Thus we have here counterarguments of a political nature. My work as a minister should have demonstrated to the country responsibility, seriousness and honesty, as well as executive ability in thought and action and achievement in public service.

[Question] Governments often arouse considerable resistance among the voters. Do you not fear the accumulated criticism which might blame you even for responsibilities which were not yours?

[Answer] We are entering into a process in which every factor is a political consideration. We must recognize that currently Unity governs, and this government is a factor which plays a role in the decisions the electorate must make during the elections. However I would attribute to the PLN [National Liberation Party] a series of responsibilities for matters not yet surmounted, and I hope that in the course of my campaign I can point out the advantages to the country of making a well-applied social democratic ideology the solution to future problems.

[Question] Don't you believe that the alliance of the Calderon faction with the Christian [illegible]ts would threaten you as a possible candidate, in view of the fact th[illegible] CRC now dominates the PUP assembly as well?

[Answer] This alliance has no political importance, because it is not adding anything new to the guidelines which a given prospective candidate might be making his personal platform. Our movement too will encourage the social Christian trend. I am happy that other factions have the same feeling. I do not believe on the other hand that the fact of such an alliance could be threatening, if what we are thinking of is a permanent party. There will be an opportunity to choose the district and regional assemblies through the mechanisms of the electoral code, in the conviction that the maturity of our supporters will make the desire to democratize this movement prevail.

[Question] It is often said in political circles that you have the support of President Carazo. Is this true?

[Answer] This question should be asked of the president. I cannot speak for him.

[Question] But you have an opinion. Does he or does he not support you?

[Answer] I cannot tell you.

[Question] Whom do you regard as your main adversary in the factional struggle?

[Answer] The forces are polarizing definitively in two groups, one headed by Mr Calderon and one by myself. However, I in no way minimize the other possible candidates. They are fully capable persons with the faculties to pursue the high honor of representing Unity.

[Question] What makes you think you will win at the convention?

[Answer] The massive and speedy support I am receiving from the electorate. The work and the organization. I headed the action in the last campaign, and the realization that the leadership is made up in the same form and with the same characteristics as in 1978 gives me a feeling of faith and optimism in the struggle we are waging.

NATIONAL PROGRESS CANDIDATE DISCUSSES ELECTIONS, ECONOMY

[Interview with Miguel Barzuna, by Wilmer Murillo in the column "Political Wednesdays in the Republic"; date and place not given]

[Text] There are those in political circles in the country who have been insisting that the proposed National Progress [PN] candidate, Miguel Barzuna, has embarked upon a series of cautious talks about the method of getting out of "the presidential race."

Seemingly the architects of this theory have carried objectivity too far, to the point of stating that Barzuna would refuse the nomination by his party in favor of former President Mario Echandi Jimenez.

But Barzuna categorically denies these assertions, which in his view are nothing but stratagems designed to "undercut him." And what about Echandi? "Well, we are friends, politically we think the same, and naturally I do not see why we could not work together in the future," he said, among other things, in the following interview granted to LA REPUBLICA.

[Question] Recently it has been said that you would refuse to continue as a candidate for the presidency of the republic. Is this true?

[Answer] Nothing could be more inaccurate. I have been maintaining the thesis that economic problems become social ones, and then great political problems. The first thing the country needs is to settle its economic problems. And obviously, many have been discussing this same subject but no one has explained how the problems can be resolved. I have been working with study groups on the drafting of an overall plan to correct the economic situation. But it needed the support of technology and suitable financing. I had to go to the large industrialized countries which have these things to make arrangements. And, obviously, while I was discussing my plan there, all of the traditional politicians remained here engaging in all kinds of conjectures. Our position, as the country will see, will be more stable in the future. There will be the certainty that the overall development plan we have proposed is supported by the necessary technology and financing.

[Question] Would you be prepared to enter into an alliance with former President Echandi to strengthen your party, and if so, how far would you go to achieve this goal?

[Answer] Don Mario and I have a great friendship. We were in the Unity and withdrew from it together. Politically we think alike, and naturally I see no problem in our working together again. National Progress is a party established on the national level, with a national leadership, and it has its candidate. We do not want alliances or pacts which the country does not want. And not only Don Mario but many other national politicians will swell the party in the coming months. The National Progress offensive will begin in the next few days. The final struggle for a great change will be launched.

[Question] It is frequently argued in political circles in the country that you are facing economic difficulties, and that you are thinking of "getting off this merry-go-round" as soon as a suitable withdrawal becomes possible. Would you say that this is a sensationalist claim lacking in foundation?

[Answer] I think these are mere conjectures or stratagems to undercut someone. I do not believe there is a single party without economic problems. Perhaps those of us who do not embark on a campaign to take the people's money before going to the polls have more political problems. I have already said this.

Political wealth is the same as political financing. With a political debt and without political financing there are difficulties. But if any deputy believes that we are the only party with economic difficulties, he deceives himself or lives on the moon. All the parties have, and this is logical. If the campaign were based on money, those who believed this would be dead. We have been campaigning for a year and a half. We do not owe accounts to anyone. We do not even owe rent. We have been paying our debts religiously. I foresee no economic problems. Well, different problems from those others may have, nothing more.

[Question] There appear to be a number of parties seeking to divide up the electoral pie in the presidential campaign for 1982. What slice does National Progress hope to get?

[Answer] There is a difference between our position and that of the traditional politicians. This confuses many people. There are politicians who are creating small parties to see what they can grab later. We are not in politics to see what we can negotiate, but because ideologically we must be in order to effect the reforms we believe desirable. Only those who think like us can identify with our struggles.

The problem is the following: the PLN [National Liberation Party] is exhausted and has sins which have not been expurgated. It leads many to believe that they can win and achieve something in the PLN. Apart from this there is a heavy political debt, something like 80 million colones, for the Unity alone, and many individuals think they can get a piece of this pie. There is much to be seized. The picture offered by some politicians, given the circumstances in the country, is regrettable. The "pie" is the debt. And it is not only I who say so. The fact is no one can be convinced that the Unity has a chance of winning. No one believes that the country would vote for a continuation of this government. There you have those who have been ministers, former presidents of the assembly. All of them are responsible for what is happening. If Costa Ricans vote for them, it is because they want what has been happening to continue. I do not believe this will happen. It is for this economic and political booty that the battle is being waged. A great wave of money comes and there is a struggle to see who can find a seat at the table and serve himself with the big spoon.

[Question] What is the difference between these parties and National Progress?

[Answer] We wage a battle for ideas, to maintain a democratic tradition, to improve it and to move forward with it. We want a profound change, and to show the people that they should not continue doing what they have been doing. We seek profound changes in our economic and social system and to bring about the utopia of transforming Costa Rica into the American Switzerland.

[Answer] When I was president of the coalition, I resigned because there was no way to establish a party. My struggle and my political participation are for ideology. I do not participate in coalitions which are political compromises in the struggle for power.

[Question] Don't you think that in a country such as ours, clinging to the status quo, that the mystical tones of the National Unity and Progress perhaps place your party in a precarious situation?

[Answer] I have been saying that a solution to the problems of the country is found on the basis of more production and more exports. During my recent trip to the Far East and Europe I arranged very substantial investments which will be reflected in production and exports. From the plains, as a critic of this government and the preceding one, I have been developing national solutions. This is the only way in which the people can hope that they can carry out effective work. To believe anything else is an insult to the intelligence of the people. Many believe in voting for selfish interests and they cannot think of the best national solution. This is an insult. If it is not possible to change, if we continue along the path of hatred and personal convenience, the country will continue to sink into the abysm and we will never get out of it. We are waging a struggle which could be our last.

[Question] It is frequently said that the most probable thing is that reality lies between the extremes of complete optimism and pessimism. Let us speak of cheerful things. After your long trip through the Orient and Europe, do you have new plans?

[Answer] I believe this is the most important question in this interview. After such a tour as this, one feels that there are no optimal conditions for speedy development of the economy through foreign investments. But one also becomes convinced that because of its traditions, Costa Rica can in some way surmount this whole crisis Central America and the rest of the world are experiencing. When an opposition candidate, a critic of the government, goes to these countries and speaks in positive fashion of the potential our country offers, one gets a very interesting, a very positive feeling. Governments come and go but the republic remains. Thus, through this thesis, I obtained support and collaboration. I was successful. I am a good negotiator and I always have been. If I was successful in negotiations in private business I do not see why I cannot achieve the same in an effort to serve the country. If no one really begins to think and believe in Costa Rica, then indeed we had better light candles.

[Question] What is the solution you see to the problem of inflation, the sizable and continuing increases in prices, government deficits and withdrawal of credit from private enterprise?

[Answer] This is a very complex thing to summarize in a few words. But in brief synthesis, I would say that the battle is waged with more production, maximal reduction of the bureaucracy, encouragement of exports and putting an end to excessive currency issues. A notable economic improvement could be achieved thereby.

[Question] It would seem that we have entered into an era of limitations, forcing a search for smoother and less costly means of achieving satisfaction. In your opinion does this mean a serious economic deterioration in the Costa Rican way of life, or that after all we will find a suitable solution?

[Answer] If I did not believe that, I would not be bringing in investments. I would sell what I have and do as others have and depart. But it is my thesis that the country can easily become the Switzerland of America by the beginning of the century, but more modern and with much higher living standards. The conditions for achieving this without any loss of liberty and democracy exist. Costa Rica enjoys exceptional conditions. When we have been on the brink of catastrophe, we have somehow avoided the fall. Some attribute this to the Holy Virgin. I believe that in addition, there are profound traditions and convictions which cannot change.

[Question] How do you view the struggle for the Unity candidacy at this point? Who do you think is most likely to win?

[Answer] Whoever wins, it is unimportant. He who wins the convention may lose the election. The battle is being waged to see who is a great loser.

[Question] Don't you think that the winner, even if he loses the election, always wins political power?

[Answer] That is what the Unification leaders thought. They think the same in Unity.

[Answer] Insofar as the same programs are retained, they will continue to gain ground. For this reason we are building an ideological war to block extremism and to contribute to developing the country.

[Question] Speaking of your party, what structures have you been able to set up to date with a view to the coming elections?

[Answer] There are 15 open clubs, committees in all the districts and regions. There are propaganda, finance, electoral, plan and program committees, etc., and we are gaining ground in the electoral realm exceeding even our own expectations.

REPORTAGE ON REACTION TO VENEZUELA'S CAMPINS VISIT

PCD Scores Venezuelan Aid

Santo Domingo LISTIN DIARIO in Spanish 7 Oct 80 p 8

[Paid advertisement by the Dominican Communist Party (PCD)]

[Text] In Light of the Visit by Venezuelan President Herrera Campins and the Signing of New Agreements That Compromise the Credit and the Nonrenewable Natural Resources of the Dominican Republic:

This week's visit by Venezuelan President Herrera Campins; the announcement that agreements will be signed on that occasion whereby the Dominican Republic accepts the oil financing terms set forth in the declaration signed in San Jose, Costa Rica on 3 August 1980 by the presidents of Mexico and Venezuela; and the fact that these payment deferrals are designed to benefit private Venezuelan investors and facilitate the penetration of Venezuelan capital into major areas of the Dominican economy, oblige us to make the following remarks:

1. They are doing us no favor, nor will any benefit accrue to us, by deferring payment of part of the periodic oil price increases that the developed economies have managed to fit into their pricing and cost systems but that strike a devastating blow at dependent, backward economies. The payments deferral agreed upon by our rich brothers, Mexico and Venezuela, at their meeting in San Jose, Costa Rica are a recognition of the imminent declaration of insolvency that will soon be the only recourse of a number of countries in the area that have been decimated by debts that they cannot pay.

2. In the case of the Dominican Republic in particular, Venezuela aims to use the terms of the agreement to move in around $150 million a year of its private capital at the current price of oil and at sales volumes similar to now. This would add a flood of Venezuelan capital, with all of its implications of dominance, to the already oppressive control of the Dominican economy by American consortiums.

3. This incoming capital, totaling more than $750 million over the next 5 years, could come to represent a majority of the total private capital in the country and accord rights to its owners that would further erode the decision-making capacity of Dominicans regarding vital problems.

4. Part of the money that will not have to be paid in dollars to Venezuela for oil must go immediately in pesos to Petrolera Las Mercedes, which is licensed in Venezuela but owned by Texaco of the United States, so that it can continue its oil explorations in our country under a contract that is highly favorable to it in comparison to other existing contracts and that it has methodically violated in its drilling commitments to date.

5. The possibility that the Banco del Caribe and other similar private Venezuelan entities might take over private Dominican banks and obtain shares in state banks or set up their own oil refineries, is too high a price to pay for a moratorium on paying another extremely price for an item needed to maintain normal power generating activities.

6. The prices that Venezuela has set for the scant Dominican exports of black beans are, on the average, lower than the prices on the normal market for the item.

Thus, we are witnessing mounting demands by foreign interests on the decision-making capacity of Dominicans, and this must not be endorsed in agreements that increasingly compromise subsequent chances for changing current realities.

7. For some years now, as a result of utilizing its enormous oil wealth to expand its bourgeoisie, Venezuela has exhibited the characteristics of an intermediate power with the potential to export capital and with obvious ambitions for supremacy in the Caribbean.

What is worse, Venezuela today, under the current Social Christian administration, is utilizing its power along with the United States to sustain the repressive Military Junta in El Salvador. This marks its government not only as a factor undermining the economic independence of the nations in this turbulent zone, but also as a factor encouraging the use of force to repress their yearnings for freedom and democratic gains.

Be careful, President Guzman, about what you sign with President Herrera Campins, and remember that the flood of votes that gave you the powers that you enjoy today also contained a component of fervent nationalism, of unblemished national independence, vis-a-vis any foreign power!

PRSC: Aids Christian Socialists

Santo Domingo EL NACIONAL in Spanish 8 Oct 80 p 16

[Text] The Christian Social Revolutionary Party (PRSC) is confident that the visit by Venezuelan President Luis Herrera Campins to our country, which began yesterday, will result in a stronger, better organized party with good chances for victory in 1982.

This assessment was made by one of the party's leaders, Dr Jose A. Cruz Infante, who said that "one of the major concerns of Social Christian leaders on the continent is that we have real political development and real democratic institutions here."

He pointed out that for this to come about "it is indispensable for us to develop a strong, competent and organized Social Christian Party, because the political choices will become more clear-cut in this way, so that the people have an opportunity to choose their leaders more freely."

Cruz Infante was yesterday's guest on the "Entrevistas" program hosted every day at 1330 hours by newsman Felix A. Gomez for Onda Musical.

"As Dominican Social Christians, we are overjoyed at Dr Herrera Campins's visit to the country," Cruz Infante declared.

He indicated that the "South American chief executive's visit is not ceremonial," adding that the Dominican people will reap benefits from the agreements that the two presidents will sign.

He stated that the political and ideological record of our visitor guarantees that his policy will have an application in the Dominican Republic. "The Venezuelan Government is not trying to portray itself as a nouveau riche administration. Instead, it wants to convey the advantages of its status as the Western world's leading oil supplier to countries with developing, dependent economies (because of the high prices that they have to pay) under smooth, optimum conditions."

He stressed that the Venezuelan president has pursued this policy for the benefit of poor nations. "We know that his visit will benefit the entire Dominican people." He reiterated that "we will benefit from his visit."

Cruz Infante said that the personal relations between Social Christians here and their counterparts in Venezuela, especially Herrera Campins, "enable us to give assurances that we will have fruitful political and fraternal exchanges with him, like the ones that have always characterized out ties."

He said that the Venezuelan president is scheduled to meet with our main Social Christian leaders, who might accompany him on his visit to the south and perhaps at some of the ceremonies that he will attend in the Dominican capital. He asserted that Herrera Campins would have an opportunity for a firsthand look at the inner workings of the PRSC. In addition, he feels that the visit will help to unify Dominican Social Christians.

Separately, Cruz Infante discussed former President Joaquin Balaguer's statement to the effect that the Reformist and Dominican Revolutionary parties are the only political forces capable of maintaining democracy here.

"Bearing in mind the ceremony at which Dr Balaguer spoke (last Saturday at the Dominican Plaza Hotel), we can see what he was aiming at with his remarks. He was trying to instill drive and loyalty in the new members of his party. He was trying to create a new movement capable of keeping up Reformism's hopes of regaining power, and he recognized the Dominican Revolutionary Party just because it was in power. This is just Balaguer's political assessment."

He said that Dr Balaguer recognized that the future of the country lies with its youth and that he was therefore trying to attract it to the party. "Young people are a step forward towards modernization."

He contended that Dr Balaguer kept young people on the sidelines during the 12 years of Reformist government and that he was now trying to inject new life into the party by bringing them in. "Dominican politics would gradually decay without young people."

"We are sympathetic to the appeals by the old bosses to the country's youth," Cruz Infante stated.

Paper Hails Cooperation

Santo Domingo EL CARIBE in Spanish 10 October 1980 p 8

[Editorial: "Dominican-Venezuelan Cooperation"]

[Text] The bilateral cooperation program signed by our government and the government of the Republic of Venezuela on the occasion of President Herrera Campins's welcome visit to our country this week, unquestionably offers good prospects that could, if developed in a practical and realistic spirit, lead to benefits for both nations.

Venezuela's wideranging experience is obvious in energy and mining sectors, especially in everything having to do with the development of oil resources, and therefore we can see how valuable the technical and financial aid available to Dominicans could turn out to be. The exchange of technologies and know-how in the agricultural, livestock and other sectors could be equally useful in enhancing techniques and methods with an eye towards boosting output and productivity, which is of such concern to our countries.

Corrective measures would seem most feasible and urgent in trade, however, in light of our heavy trade deficit stemming from the continuous rise in oil prices over the last 5 years. For the moment, if we broach the issue realistically, the only xport item that we could export much more of to Venezuela is sugar. As far as Venezuela's needs are concerned, it is also the only item that it will need in considerable volumes for some time. Hence, the basic conditions are there for successfully concluding the negotiations that the appropriate authorities of the two countries have been carrying on for some time in this area.

In this regard, we feel that a long-term sugar pact, like the one that has been mentioned, could turn out to be mutually beneficial as long as it provides for a suitable period and, of course, satisfactory prices. The Dominican side would have to keep very much in mind (and the Venezuelans would have to understand this) the bullish nature of the market and the reasonable prospects that this trend will continue for a more or less lengthy period, as the cycles in this industry clearly indicate. Therefore, a fixed price agreement, for example, would have to be based on the maximum average price that the Dominican sugar industry could secure during the life of the agreement under the best possible marketing conditions. Such an approach would undoubtedly be the fairest for the contracting parties. In the judgment of a number of experts, the average could be around 30 cents a pound over the next 4 to 6 years.

A pact like the one under study would have other benefits for the two countries, of course. Venezuela would have a reasonably secure supply of a high quality product from a neighbor (which would lower freight charges) and would benefit from other factors that would facilitate its domestic refining and supply programs over the next few years. The Dominican Republic, in turn, would be able to market a considerable portion of its exportable output and to count on predetermined earnings, with all of their advantages for planning recovery work and achieving the badly needed goals of greater industrial efficiency. These factors, we should emphasize, could be of prime importance in examining the reciprocal advantages of the agreement.

We trust, then, that the good and sincere intentions that have motivated the presidents of Venezuela and the Dominican Republic in their recent efforts at cooperation will soon shift from the volatile realm of good intentions to the arena of specific, well-balanced accomplishments, which, in the final accounting, are the only ones that are of interest to their respective nations.

VENEZUELAN FINANCIAL, PETROLEUM AID SCORED

Santo Domingo LISTIN DIARIO in Spanish 18 Oct 80 p 14

[Commentary by Bernardo Vega: "Venezuela: Financing, Refineries, Exploration and Other Odds and Ends"]

[Text] Now that sufficient time has elapsed since the conclusion of the visit by the president of Venezuela, we can more objectively assess its concrete economic results.

In our view, the visit confirmed a group of Venezuelan situations and positions with which we were personally familiar, but which, unfortunately, were not believed in leading Dominican government circles, and which, as a result of deliberate "leaks" to the press, had been creating an atmosphere of very false hopes; something that was detrimental to both countries and governments because, when it was time to tell the truth, the concrete offers and real positions of Venezuela clashed openly with those false hopes. Hence, the visit destroyed a series of myths, which we shall cite below:

1. The myth of financing in the amount of $150 million per year. Several spokesmen had raised false hopes, talking about annual financing of $150 million, through the Costa Rican agreement. When comparing this with the text of the agreement, we saw that the amount could not exceed 30 percent of the value of Venezuelan sales, subject to the agreement; in other words, 50 percent of our consumption. The 14 million barrels that the country imports at $32 per barrel represent about $450 million. Half of that amount totals $225 million, and 30 percent thereof represents about $62 million per year as the maximum Venezuelan financing. Actually, the figure would appear to be less, because the Venezuelan Government decided to offer only 30 percent of the value of the imports of the refinery, excluding the imports of fuel oil made by CDE and the sugar mills, as well as the oil taken by Falconbridge; therefore, the base was reduced to about 10 million barrels per year, and the annual Venezuelan financing, to $53 million, in other words, a third of the figure cited by certain Dominicans. In short, the financing offered by Venezuela, as we mentioned in a previous column, is of benefit to the country and a great step forward in regional cooperation. It is a shame that some misinformed Dominicans have created false hopes.

2. The myth of the need to nationalize the refinery. Some Dominicans may have created the rumor that the nationalization of our refinery was a prerequisite for securing Venezuelan financing. The visit served to confirm that this was not Venezuela's official position. Both presidents even paid a visit to the refinery, which received little publicity, and there they were received by the representatives of the state and Shell, at the board of administration offices.

3. The myth of the need to create a state importing enterprise. This was another alleged Venezuelan stipulation on which certain Dominicans assumed public positions. The visit proved that the mechanisms for financing would be similar to those which existed under the Puerto Ordaz agreement of 1974 between Venezuela and Central America, wherein the financing originates rather in the central banks, and the Dominican state need not necessarily be converted into a direct importer. This position is even more logical if the basis of the calculations is only the imports of the refinery, excluding other users (CDE, the cement factories and Falconbridge).

4. The myth of the compulsory use of 50 percent Mexican oil. The visit also cleared up this point. The Dominican state, if it wishes, can continue to bring 100 percent of the crude from Venezuela; however, the Venezuelan financing will cover only 50 percent. Hence, the country would benefit from exploring to the maximum possible extent the use, through the refinery, of 50 percent oil of that origin, because the financing would be doubled to $106 million per year. That exploration should begin with a formal request to the Mexican Government to send an official from Mexican Petroleum (PEMEX) to discuss with Dominican technicians, including those from the refinery, the purely logistical aspects, including the type of crude that Mexico could supply and in what proportions (ITHNUS Maya, etc.), and the possibility of shipping reconstituted crude, as well as matters relating to the freight charges. These logistical aspects may not be so complicated if one considers the fact that part of the Mexican oil now going to Europe is being sent first to Curacao, where it is transferred to ships of larger size. Therefore, the mixture that the Dominican market requires might well be prepared in Curacao, where Venezuelan reconstituted crude would be mixed with Mexican reconstituted crude in a proportion which, although it would not be exactly 50-50, would indeed allow for the use of the bulk of the financing by both countries. These studies should be made before a high-level Dominican mission goes to Mexico, because otherwise there would be a repetition of what happened in the case of the Venezuelan president's visit, when no concrete agreement could be signed because of the lack of previous technical studies approved by the parties involved.

5. The myth of the export refinery. Venezuelan backing for a new export refinery has also proven to be false. This type of project is of no interest to a country whose oil policy is based, correctly, on the attempt to process its oil within its own territory insofar as possible. The plan submitted to the Dominican Government has, rather, been promoted by a private American firm. We have serious doubts about the economic viability of a refinery in the Dominican Republic which would export a large portion of its production, because it would not bring profits in its international sales, and would even have difficulty finding external markets, owing to the fact that in the United States there is ample unused refining capacity, and the international prices of finished products are determined very competitively, based on the processing costs of huge and by now depreciated refineries, against which a new Dominican refinery of smaller size would have to compete. In brief, we would not accrue a relative advantage with a new medium-sized refinery, operating with imported crude. The problem of the deficits not made up for by the present refinery should be solved by its expansion but, as an essential preliminary step, the state must decide whether or not it is going to continue with Shell as a partner; because the latter obviously will not make any new investments in the refinery, in view of the present uncertainty, including a request for information by a government minister regarding Shell's position with respect to selling its shares. Without going into great detail here, we think that the solution lies in a new agreement with Shell whereby that company's shares in the refinery would receive an annual fixed dividend not associated with the real earnings, and it would be given a contract for administration, with the state retaining the benefit of all the refinery's earnings, while the latter sought financing for expansion which, under those circumstances, might well come from the World Bank.

6. The myth of the Dominican financing of Las Mercedes. It was speculated that, with the funds from the 30 percent of the oil billing, the Dominican state would lend money to Las Mercedes Petroleum, so that the latter could continue searching for oil. A quick analysis showed that this would be politically disastrous for both governments. The Dominican Government would be subjected to heavy and deserved criticism if it lent funds from the foreign debt to an essentially foreign private firm which has a concession for exploration. The concessions are granted to foreigners so that, at their own risk and on their own account, they may use their own capital to search for oil. If they lack the capital, and have to borrow it from the state, this eliminates the only justification for the concession, because the state can purchase the technology by itself. If Venezuela lends us funds so that we may search for oil, then the state must do so at its own risk and on its own account, with Las Mercedes or another firm acting as a mere contractor, but without being a concession holder; in other words, the oil, if it should appear, would all belong to the state, which would be the only entity that would be assuming a risk.

7. The myth of the sugar purchases. A sugar sales contract for 3 years, at fixed prices, would be feasible for us at the present time only if the price is equal to or higher than the commodity exchange price. Our country can sell all its (not yet sold) sugar from the current 1980-81 sugar harvest on the commodity exchange today for about 44 centavos, and that from the 1981-82 harvest, at about 36 centavos. A Venezuelan offer for 3 years would only guarantee us prices for the last year (1982-83). In order for such an offer to be attractive, its price would have to be between 30 and 40 centavos, a figure that is apparently not acceptable to the Venezuelans, for understandable reasons.

To summarize, with the myths dispelled, we must work fast to make the maximum use of the enlightened new international position of Venezuela and Mexico, which serves as an example of international cooperation for the other OPEC countries. Once the logistical aspects have been cleared up, we must sign the San Jose agreement with both countries as soon as possible. The technical assistance generously offered by Venezuela for oil exploration should be used by the state exclusively for its own benefit, and not be shared with private concession holders, because the latter are economically absurd and a bomb from a political standpoint. In order to be able to expand the refinery, we must decide on the type of agreement, if any, that we want with Shell. Until this is determined, there will be no expansion. As a general experience, the visit also served to show that if international economic agreements are to be implemented, they require a set of preliminary studies and agreements on the technical level which, if absent, only allow the politicians to arrive at general accords that do not represent any immediate assistance to the Dominicans.

PAPER COMMENTS ON PRD, NEED FOR POLITICAL PARTIES

Santo Domingo EL NACIONAL in Spanish 23 Oct 80 Sec F p 8

[Editorial: "Concern"]

[Text] EL NACIONAL is not affiliated with any political party. That is (and will be) a definitive position. This newspaper will maintain its independent views above everything, and will respect the opinion of others, as it has always done.

EL NACIONAL believes firmly in the need for strong, well-defined political parties, as a backing for representative democracy.

Therefore, this newspaper shares the concerns voiced by many Dominicans to the effect that the conflict which is upsetting the Dominican Revolutionary Party (PRD) is damaging and detrimental to the entire nation.

PRD is the government party at present. Winning that position at the polls, in the elections of 16 May 1978, cost it a great deal of effort.

Everyone remembers the campaign against PRD here. It was accused of being headed by friends of the communists and Castroites. In this way, an attempt was made to intimidate many people. PRD won the elections and assumed power.

This is not the time to judge the PRD's performance in government; but there is something that should be stressed: President Antonio Guzman has been a man with respect for the views of others; he has maintained the public liberties and has not ordered any persecution on political grounds.

It may be claimed that crises appear in any democratic political party. True; however, it cannot be concealed that the struggle being waged in PRD is having negative repercussions not only on the government, but also on the country's economic progress. And it is not right that this should happen.

The quality of the arguments has deteriorated. Funds are being diverted for an advertising campaign. Public funds have been allocated to meet the expense of the quarrels and squabbles which are making no contribution to the solution of the many ills besetting this nation. And what is even worse, many major problems have been set aside in order to deal with isses to which unnecessary importance has been attached. There are no exceptions: This is happening in the executive branch and it is happening in the legislative branch.

Therefore, the country would be very pleased to see the relations between the public authorities become normalized, and take a direction which would benefit the entire populace.

And it would be very pleased to see the intrapartisan struggle be confined to that, without upsetting the progress of activities paid for by the taxpayers, at a very high price, to be sure, and without undermining the political organization which is essential to the support of the incipient Dominican democracy.

WESSIN OUTLINES PQD PLATFORM, ASSAILS PENA GOMEZ, PRD

Santo Domingo LISTIN DIARIO in Spanish 15 Oct 80 p 10A

["Test" of speech by Elias Wessin y Wessin, president of the Democratic Quisqueyan Party, in Valverde Mao; date not specified]

[Text] The president of the Democratic Quisqueyan Party (PQD) claimed in Valverde, Mao that it is not true that the only alternatives for the coming general elections are the Dominican Revolutionary Party (PRD) and the Reformist Party.

Former General Elias Wessin y Wessin stated at the same time that the PQD will win the general elections of May 1982.

Speaking before hundreds of party followers, Wessin y Wessin harshly criticized Dr Jose Francisco Pena Gomez, secretary general of the PRD.

Here is the complete text of Wessin y Wessin's speech:

Quisqueyans:

First of all, I would like to extend my warmest congratulations to the organizers of this well-attended event, which gives the lie to allegations by certain national political personalities who are anxious for everyone to believe in this long-suffering nation that the only alternatives for the upcoming general elections are the Dominican Revolutionary Party and the Reformist Party.

Dominicans are shocked by the unusual campaign that has been waged, especially through the press, for the purpose of proving--we could say for better or worse--that here there are only two parties.

Recently a big frog in the little pond of the written press (one of those who sell out to the highest bidder) had the audacity to call the other political parties of the nation "bit-players" or "stand-ins," with astounding aplomb.

Do you think that our glorious institution, with more than 200,000 leaders, duly organized throughout national territory, recognized formally by the Central Electoral Board, and with a strength proven by this very gathering, is merely a stand-in?

The lies of some journalists should concern no one. What is inexplicable, however, in this typically political campaign which is obviously demagogic, is that the leader of the PRD is apparently involved up to his neck in it. He seems to have decided to lead people to believe that the only choice they have is to accept that their fate is the lesser of two evils.

This new strategy of the PRD secretary general is shameful and repugnant from any standpoint.

What patriotic and truly democratic Dominican could be pleased with Dr Jose Francisco Pena Gomez' insistence that the only other party in the country is the Reformist Party? Anyone would think that the PRD leader was ignoring the real situation of the PRD itself.

He seems to be unaware that he is playing with fire, because that infantile "strategy" of bipartisanship he is using places him in the same position as those who are striving to elevate once again to the National Palace the tools of rampant corruption, of influence trafficking, of falsified files, of murders with impunity, of arbitrary imprisonment and deportation--in sum, the systematic violation of the most sacred principles of democratic society, under the shameful pretext that the Constitution is a mere scrap of paper. These were the forces which Pena Gomez fought so vehemently.

Along these lines, it is not true, as Dr Balaguer asserted, that the people have two doors through which they must pass. They have already crossed those thresholds, which led them to the brink of the abyss. This nation needs to go down new paths; through a gate illuminated with the light of truth, that will lead us with firm steps toward the conquest of a better life. This path can be rsached safely through the wide and generous door of the Democratic Quisqueyan Party.

There is no doubt that due to the economic resources available to those two political parties, the Reformist Party and the PRD, filched from the national budget; and due to the evident complacency with which they are treated by some of the media, there is no equal opportunity for all political organizations.

Nonetheless, our party, the PQD, to make up for that disadvantage, has shown its increasing strength with the development of a persistent effort from province to province, from municipality to municipality, from section to section, from neighborhood to neighborhood, and finally from house to house, to bring to each Dominican, out of our own mouths, the truth of what is happening in the country. In this way, they cannot be fooled by the adverse effects of misinformation.

Since August 1978, I have made more than 500 trips to the interior of the country, and I have been able to speak directly to more than half a million Dominicans. The result of this systematic effort is truly encouraging. Despite those who make every effort to ignore it, our powerful party now has 10,000 grassroots organizations and 1 million members. To those who doubt this assertion, we can say that we are in a position to prove it.

At this moment, in this hard-working and friendly city of Mao, I am accompanied by thousands of people and more than 500 vehicles. This is simply one more proof of the extraordinary sympathy that the PQD has earned, and of the unshakable faith of the people in the principles and postulates we firmly uphold.

We can proclaim with pride that we are the only party in the history of this country whose recognition was granted in strict accordance with the law, after an exhaustive and rigorous investigation.

There are countless reasons why we PQD members are convinced that today we are the main political force of this country, and why I can affirm once more that with the help of God and the Blessed Virgin, beginning 16 August 1982 we'll all go to the fields with our sleeves rolled up!

From what I have just said, one might deduce that we are attributing too much importance to the opinion of the old boss of the Reformist Party and the virtually disoriented leader of the PRD. Our intention is to warn the Dominican people of their capacity to damage and deceive. Under the evil slogan that the end justifies the means, they are misleading the population with fantastic promises that they never fulfill. That is why we think the best possible definition that one can apply to the Reformist Party as well as the PRD is the lesser of two evils. No one can deny that the history of the last 14 years in our lives reflects clearly and obviously what we have just said.

Furthermore, we can assure all Dominicans, with the dignity and resolve that have characterized our actions, that we are prepared to put the country on the road to solving its great problems and moving toward real progress. The PQD has prepared an integral doctrine based on clear and precise concepts which, after being duly considered by the National Political Committee, will be revealed at the next convention, which will take place at the Plaza Dominicana Hotel on 25 October of this year, at 0800 hours.

Basically, our doctrine envisions the development of an administration that is geared toward achieving the establishment of a system which will bring about effective equality of justice and opportunities for all Dominicans.

We will also be able to guide the actions of the government in a rational and effective manner in order to realistically confront the tremendous problems we have to face, aggravated more and more each day by the improvised measures that have been the constant expedient of the PRD administration.

We can guarantee that the severe shortage of basic necessities and the skyrocketing cost of living, growing unemployment, health problems, the high rate of illiteracy, threats to personal safety, crime, vice and increasing criminality, all calamities which have proliferated alarmingly under the present administration, will be combatted with determination by the government we will lead as of 16 August 1982.

There is one aspect of the PRD administration to which we should refer on this occasion. There is clear evidence that the monster of corruption is undermining the credibility which it enjoyed in the beginning.

It is public knowledge that in the State Sugar Council, the Price Stabilization Institute and numerous state enterprises and agencies, all kinds of violations are being committed which call into question the highly touted honesty of the PRD administration. Everyone knows that the State Sugar Council and the Price Stabilization Institute, superstructural agencies that maintain a topheavy bureaucracy and always have, have only served to dish out scandalous illicit riches. They have never served the purpose they were theoretically created to do.

To do away once and for all with the administrative disaster that has prevailed there, the Democratic Quisqueyan Party, once in power, will assume the responsibility of adopting vigorous measures to reorganize on a rational basis these centers of corruption, so that they can be cleaned up and properly administered and thus provide a valuable contribution to the national economy.

I sincerely believe that the government leaders who in one way or another have left their mark on history in their respective countries, in economic terms, have been like Cato: They have known how to make their citizens happy without giving in to odious squandering. As is happening with the present administration, such waste only sows the seeds of discontent and mistrust among all citizens.

Gentlemen: It is time to break with the past once and for all, and to rebuild our long-suffering and deceived society on more serious and responsible bases. We should understand finally that the problems of our country are the problems of Dominicans, and that we will never attain the desired prosperity as long as we continue tilting at windmills and blaming our vicissitudes on businessmen and on a supposed imperialism that in today's world, which is marked by a generalized state of dependency, is more a fantasy than a reality.

I would like to take this opportunity to clearly and categorically affirm that in a PQD administration the rules of the game will be obvious enough to assure everyone that there will be no surprises. Businessmen and investors will be not only protected, but also stimulated so that they can increase production. We understand that the best way to help the consumer is to provide an abundance of consumer goods.

By the same token, we can assert that the people will not be burdened with new taxes; in this regard, we will limit ourselves to restructuring the tax system so that it will be based on the individual's ability to pay taxes. We should inform public employees that a civil service and an administrative career track will be established so that those who work for the state will be protected by a legal statute that guarantees them job security. Thus, they will no longer be subject to the whims of politics and their jobs will be more dignified. Social security will be adequately revised so that its scope will be broader and it will become a real social security institute instead of an agency with no goal other than the collection of taxes for the purpose of squandering them on demagogic projects. Education should be duly reformed, to teach Dominicans to build a society for mankind, instead of mankind for society. Health services must be given priority so that the majority of the population that needs such an essential public service will have access to it. The working class will also receive our careful protection; its interests will be rationally balanced with those of management, since an integral development depends to a great extent on the harmony of these two factors.

These, gentlemen, are some of the points included in our initial platform, aimed at fomenting the establishment of a true rule of law in which there is equality of justice and opportunities for all Dominicans.

PQD brothers: in view of the imminence of a resounding victory for the Democratic Quisqueyan Party in the upcoming election, I would like to warmly urge the following:

It is time to reclaim our nationality once and for all; it is time to combat hunger and poverty, which have continually plagued the poor and peasantry of this country, with true patriotism; it is time for justice, equality and fraternity among Dominicans. To carry out our tremendous plans, we need to control the Congress in Caraca, and therefore justice.

Consequently, our party's current goal is to win the elections on each electoral board, in each section, in each municipality, in each province and in each place where there are Dominicans with the right to vote.

This is a commitment and responsibility for every leader of our glorious party. If we are successful, you will see our homeland helped along the road to achieving the dreams and ideals most cherished by our immortal forefathers.

Long live liberty! Long live democracy! Long live the Dominican Republic! Long live the Democratic Quisqueyan Party! Thank you very much.

PENA GOMEZ: NOT INVOLVED IN GUZMAN, CHAMBER CONTROVERSY

Santo Domingo LISTIN DIARIO in Spanish 17 Oct 80 pp 1, 13

[Text] Yesterday, the secretary general of the Dominican Revolutionary Party [PRD], Dr Jose Grancisco Pena Gomez, said that the obdurate snipers in national politics are beginning to spread confusion in sectors of the Armed Forces, giving the impression that they are implicated in the controversy between the executive branch and the legislative branch.

He declared: "We want everyone to know that the events which caused this controversy occurred when we were abroad, and when our concerns were focused on the air accident which almost cost the life of Dr Hugo Tolentino Dipp and ours."

Speaking on "Democratic Platform" [radio program], Pena Gomez stated that he knew that, sooner or later, his name would be involved in a controversy which the entire nation repudiates.

He noted that it was for this reason that he hastened to request the parties to refrain from making further statements, a position which, according to Pena Gomez, placed him above the leaders of the discussion.

He added: "We arrived in the country on the very day that President Luis Herrera Campins visited the National Palace, and since then we have not had occasion to speak personally with Hatuey Decamps; although we did so briefly on the telephone, as we did today, to ask him to be discreet and to demand that he forget the bill which stipulated automatic homage paid to every head of state who visits the National Congress."

And he went on to say: "Hence, we demand that our name not be involved in this controversy, and that they not continue to use us as a scapegoat with respect to the military, blaming us for events which may not be to the liking of the military commanders."

Pena Gomez remarked that, despite the appeal made to him to give up the controversy, Hatuey Decamps made further statements, while his opponents made use of a letter that he had sent to the secretary of the Armed Forces, which should by no means show up again in the hands of other officials except the president himself, or its direct addressee.

He commented: "The publication of this letter by an undisclosed source in the National Palace was a mistake, in our opinion, because that letter should never have left the files of the Armed Forces, for the precise purpose of preventing even a remote trace of truth from being attached to the statement previously made by the president of the Chamber of Deputies concerning certain features that he reportedly attributed, incorrectly in our view, to the effort for institutionalization that President Guzman has carried out with the Armed Forces."

And he stressed: "Therefore, the Armed Forces must be kept dissociated from any conflicts, present or future, that may occur between the branches of government; because such conflicts are normal events in the democratic system, and only the absence of true democracy makes them appear to be unusual situations in our eyes."

Pena Gomez revealed that Hatuey Decamps sent him a letter subjecting President Guzman to the PRD's Board of Discipline.

The PRD leader suggested: "We request Hatuey Decamps publicly to nullify this subjection, and to confine himself to stating his complaints against the president if he is brought before the Board of Discipline."

And he added: "It is a fact that the president of the republic is a member of the party governed by our statutes, but owing to the dignity of his office, we cannot treat him in the manner sought by those fellow deputies."

The letter sent to Pena Gomez by Decamps was also signed by four other deputies.

INTERIOR, POLICE SECRETARIAT REAFFIRMS POLITICAL FREEDOM

Santo Domingo LISTIN DIARIO in Spanish 17 Oct 80 pp 1, 13

[Text] Yesterday, the Secretariat of Interior and Police gave an absolute guarantee to the opposition political parties that their activities would not be interfered with by the police authorities, nor by members of the Dominican Revolutionary Party [PRD].

In statements made to this newspaper, Dr Rosa Julia de la Cruz de Ortiz said that the police had been instructed to protect the political activities of the opposition groups.

The official declared: "We respect freedom of movement and freedom of assembly."

She said that she had no knowledge of interference by police officers in a convoy from the Democratic Quisqueyan Party which toured the community of Valverde, Mao, remarking: "I have not read the press, and I have no information about that incident."

She noted that PRD had requested a permit from the Secretary of Interior and Police to hold the political function last Sunday, at which the new district headquarters of the organization was opened.

She commented: "PRD had permission, and the demonstration was held outside, because the people did not fit in the headquarters."

She explained that the political parties must notify the Secretariat of Interior and Police when they are going to hold mass functions, so that they may be given the necessary protection.

Last Sunday, a PQD convoy was intercepted by the police, and it was claimed that several members and leaders of that organization, who were holding a political function in Mao, were arrested.

The president of PQD, Gen (ret) Elias Wessin y Wessin, has complained on constant occasions that the authorities have interfered with his party's political activities.

The Reformist Party has also voiced complaints that its recruiting efforts have met with obstacles in the interior section of the country.

Dr De la Cruz de Ortiz claimed that the present authorities respect the activities which the parties carry out within a legal framework.

She stressed the fact that the parties must notify her secretariat when they intend to hold political functions, so that the police may be instructed to offer them protection.

The official was interviewed at the headquarters of the Dominican Revolutionary Party, which she visited as a member of President Antonio Guzman's movement, to attend a press conference at which it was announced that the president of the Chamber of Deputies, Hatuey de Camps, was to be subjected to a board of discipline.

FOREIGN MINISTER CASTILLO VALDEZ' UN SPEECH PRAISED

Guatemala City EL IMPARCIAL in Spanish 8 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] In a speech by its foreign relations minister at the United Nations (the timing of which was, moreover, excellent because the official addresses of the increasingly numerous delegations are listened to more attentively at the start of the General Assembly) Guatemala furnished information on and explained the principles of its domestic and international relations. This was an important step because many new countries are joining the organization that have been influenced by a slanderous campaign that unspeakable political interests have launched or engineered to tarnish our nation's image, even though some of the loudest-voiced nations live in glass houses and were not too sure about throwing the first stone.

Many of the recent UN members know that the five separate countries of Central America signed the Charter of San Francisco and took part in the discussions on its wording, which put the aspirations of the founding nations in the form of principles and standards. They are unaware, however, of the major role that Central America, with dogged determination, played in the creation of the Organization of American States, the predecessor and even the model for the League of Nations and, after its collapse, the United Nations, on the basis of acknowledging continental solidarity and the need for ongoing, intensive cooperation among nations.

Guatemala, bound by tradition and its large territory and population, has always faithfully kept its international commitments. It is true that, like all nations, it has suffered the hardships involved in political and socio-economic development, but the efforts of its people and the enlightenment of its leaders have succeeded in establishing and consolidating a modern, functional institutional structure marked by the ambitions, direction and guidelines of a democratic system. In addition, it can be proud of its cultural traditions and its contributions to culture.

Foreign Minister Castillo Valdes correctly pointed out that our country has advocated peace, public freedoms, justice and social progress within the democratic system as basic values for domestic life and international relations. It is precisely this political climate that has allowed underground groups to be "instigated, supported and financed from abroad," groups that have chosen the path of violence and committed terrorist acts under the pretext of defending ideologies and ambitions for power that they have been able to channel through political parties and the other legitimate avenues that citizens have access to.

We know that this troublesome situation exists all over the world, paving the way for crime and resulting in violent attacks on the security of individuals and property. Even though the purpose is often to rescue or liberate, realities are being overlooked or distorted in such a way that they unconsciously cause suffering and impoverishment for the very people whom they are trying to help. Therefore, it is unfair and reprehensible for self-interested critics to single out our country, and it is sad that some Guatemalans have contributed to the slander. As we said, outsiders encouraging violence and violating the standards of social interplay and international relations are surreptitiously joining the chorus and even singing solos to the refrain of human rights, which could become the password for meddling and intervention.

He could not but mention the problem of Belize because Guatemala's territorial claim against Great Britain has now been brought before the United Nations and politicized, to the detriment of a legal settlement. The UN, in fact, is not even the proper forum for settling this kind of a disagreement. What is worse, the details of the problem have been twisted in favor of British neocolonialism, and offensive allegations have even been leveled at Guatemala to the effect that it harbors colonialist designs because it is defending what belongs to it or opposes the breakup of its territory, because Great Britain's shaky title deed has always been protested by our country. Furthermore, unfortunately, there has been a desire to deal with this major issue through politically influenced or pledged votes (without the indispensable prior analysis), secured through cronyism or some sort of diplomatic compensation in the form of support in the debate or vote on other issues.

Guatemala is not unaware of the interests and ambitions of the people of Belize, many of whom are Guatemalans from the Quekchi, Mopan and mestizo groups, with nearby relations. We therefore realize that this cultural and ethnic group must have its own personality acknowledged within our society, and thus perhaps it will yield some of its rights, to whatever extent is appropriate and possible. The colonialism comes from the other side, the Commonwealth.

That is why Foreign Minister Castillo Valdez emphatically reasserted that Belize is part of our national territory and that Guatemala does not accept and would not recognize unilateral independence for this territory, which would be an encroachment on ours. In this connection, bilateral negotiations are going to be resumed with the government of her majesty the queen.

ECONOMY MINISTER DISCUSSES LEFTIST THREAT, OTHER PROBLEMS

[Text] "The government, private enterprise, workers and peasant farmers should join together to defend ourselves against the threats posed by leftists, who rather then wanting to see our country living in peace, would like to bring violence to it, as is happening in other Central American countries," Economy and Commerce Minister Ruben Mondragon said at last night's meeting with business leaders at the Chamber of Commerce and Industries of Cortes.

The minister met with northern businessmen to hold a frank dialog and take a look at all of the problems currently facing businessmen.

With regard to inflation, Mondragon said that the only effective way to fight it is through production, which cannot be boosted if there is no investment. To continue this chain of reasoning, investors cannot be expected to initiate projects if security and incentives do not exist. "Fortunately, that kind of calm exists in our country, and international organizations have a great deal of trust in us," the minister said.

He then mentioned that workers, peasants, students and teachers are currently posing a series of demands, which can be met only if the state takes in more money, which it can do only through taxes. Taxes are paid only by the companies and individuals who make enough money, "but in point of fact, to be fair, it is important for everyone to pay taxes."

With regard to the studies by writer and analyst Luis Pazos, Mondragon said that many of his suggestions are applicable and realistic, but not his recommendation that equal treatment should be accorded domestic and foreign businessmen and that foreign companies should be put on an equal footing with domestic ones. "This is an absurd notion that would bankrupt all of our industrialists if it were implemented in Honduras."

PAZ GARCIA SPEECH HONORS CIVIL SERVANTS

Tegucigalpa EL CRONISTA in Spanish 16 Oct 80 pp 1, 5

[Speech by President Policarpo Paz Garcia honoring ANDEPH [National Association of Civil Servants of Honduras]; date and place not given]

[Text] Esteemed Fellow Workers:

I call you fellow workers because that is what civil servants are: people who share concerns and responsibilities with those of us who perform the delicate function of running the country.

In this regard, I must express to you my deepest and most heartfelt gratitude for the homage that you are kindly paying me. Your intention is without doubt to clearly reveal your gratitude for everything that the government has done for public servants economically and socially. I want to tell you, however, that the debt of gratitude is mutual. The measures that we have taken in government to give incentives to civil servants have always been based on the view that they deserve such incentives, which are often smaller than those secured by other workers in the private sector or even in a number of branches of the government.

As a public official, I always keep in mind that public service is an honorable duty, a duty that under some circumstances becomes a right when government service is viewed in a partisan political light. In this regard, we have been lucky that as military officers we have not felt the need for partisan discrimination, and therefore the measures that we have taken to benefit civil servants have never had any special political objective. We see all public servants as Hondurans who are interested in seeing their country move forward and in contributing their physical and mental energies every day so that the government's programs, goals and objectives are properly carried out.

Just as a nation's army does not consist solely of superior officers but has many ranks the most numerous of which is made up of enlisted men, we recognize that in government service responsibilities do not belong exclusively to top-level executives but rather are shared with thousands of employees performing various tasks, all of which are important no matter how humble.

I accept this homage on behalf of you, my fellow workers, and on behalf of my family, because of the lofty honor accorded it by this show of affection and sympathy, expressed collectively and by the decision of a prestigious association. I accept it with emotion, with gratitude and with affection for all of you.

I would ask you to convey my most cordial and sincere greetings to all Honduran public servants through the Honorable Board of Directors of your association.

May God give us all the necessary strength and wisdom to continue working for the good of our country, and so that the Civil Service Act, which is the basis for the stability, security and rights of state workers, continues to be enforced in strict compliance with its content and goals.

Thank you very much.

EDUCATION MINISTRY DENIES IT FOLLOWS CUBAN MODEL

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 25 Sep 80 pp 1, 9

[Text] Yesterday evening we received the following communique:

On Wednesday, 24 September 1980, LA PRENSA, with a great deal of publicity, published in four columns on page one an article entitled "Cuban Copy in an Educational Program." Its contents and structure are absolutely false, ill-intentioned and slanderous; it was designed to denigrate and discredit the prestige of our institution and therefore of the Sandinist Popular Revolution itself. For that reason, the Ministry of Education of the Natonal Reconstructon Government finds it appropriate to turn to our heroic people, and especially to the national education community, in order to disprove the lies and distortions of which this article is full.

1. The document to which the LA PRENSA writer refers deals with reading material that was used in the development of the second workshop seminar for middle-level educators that was held in the city of Managua on 18 and 19 September of this year; it is not a plan or curriculum for children and youth of Nicaragua developed by the ministry of education.

2. LA PRENSA intentionally took only one of the documents out of the ten that were used as study materials in this workshop seminar.

3. Nine of the ten documents of the workshop seminar were developed by the staff and specialists of the ministry of education, and only the document discussed is of foreign origin.

4. The bibliography used for curriculum planning for both the primary and middle levels, for vocational training and job orientation, includes, among others, some of the following authors and materials:

A.H. Pagel and M.H. Carroll. How To Attract and Guide the Child in School. Buenos Aires, Argentina. Kapelusz, 1977.

Fingermann, Gregorio. Psychotechnology and Job Orientation. Buenos Aires, Argentina. El Ateneo, 1975.

Hacth and Costar. Guidance Activities in Primary School. Mexico, Limusa, 1974.

Sandinist Power. Training New Technicians To Develop the Productive Structure. Managua, Nicaragua. 31 January 1980.

A. A. Smirnow, A. N. Leontiev, and others. Psychology. Mexico. Grijalvo Editions, 1960.

Rhodes, James A. Vocational Education and Guidance. Buenos Aires, Argentina. Paidos, 1975.

Blanc, Marcelo. Group Dynamics. San Jose, Costa Rica. EDUCA, 1976.

Villaverde, Cirigliano. Group Dynamics and Education. Buenos Aires. Humanitas Editorial, 1966.

Petrowsky, A. V. Educational Psychology and Age Groups. Havana, Cuba. People and Education Editions, 1978.

Kirsten, Rainer E., Muller Schwarz, Joach. Group Training. Bilbao, Spain. Mensajero Editions, 1976.

5. The commentator, in his eagerness to confuse our people, even though in many parts of his article he mentioned that the document was drafted at the Ministry of Education in Cuba, said: "For the Marxist-Leninist ideologues who produced the document at the Ministry of Education in Nicaragua, education is an eternal category." And in closing, he states:

"The document concludes with the Ministry of Education 4th national seminar bibliography, etc., etc." But in reality, the document concludes with the following expression: "Taken from the Ministry of Education 4th national seminar, etc., etc." The intent is clear; it is trying to misinform, by saying that the document was drafted in the Ministry of Education in Nicaragua and not in the Ministry of Education of the republic of Cuba.

6. The vocational training and job orientation programs, both on the primary and middle levels, to be used in the present school year, are at this time being studied by 480 educators of the nation who are now attending workshop seminars given in the following national institutes: Elvis Diaz and Maestro Gabriel, and at the National University.

7. The campaign being waged by LA PRENSA for some days against the new education in our country also includes a systematic opposition to the connection between study and work, even though this relationship is supported by all the international organizations that deal with education and pedagogic methods now used throughout the world.

8. Because of all these points, we repeat to the people of Nicaragua our conviction that this article is part of the ideological diversion and calumny campaign that LA PRENSA, along with the most reactionary and backward sectors of our society, is now promoting against the education and productive labor program which our institution has planned to carry out as part of its education plans for the 1980-1981 school year.

PROPAGANDA DEPARTMENT ASKS FOR MORE ECONOMIC REPORTING

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 20 Oct 80 p 9

[Text] "The mass media should be concerned today about reporting to and guiding the people in connection with the revolution's basic economic problems," said Carlos Gallo, a member of the Department of Propaganda and Political Education of the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front], in exclusive statements to EL NUEVO DIARIO, just minutes after speaking on "The Role of Propaganda in the Management of the Economy" before newsmen belonging to the UPN [Union of Nicaraguan Journalists] at the Journalists Club.

Referring to the role of newsmen in economic propaganda, he said that they "must widely publicize the principles of our Sandinist economy and explain the main tasks involved in producing, distributing and using consumer goods."

Economic Awareness

"We have to develop an economic awareness among the people," he went on to say, "to create ties between them and the revolution's economic tasks. We must educate them about the economy and mobilize them to carry out our economic programs because one of the principles of our revolution is that without grass roots involvement there can be no economy of the people." He also said that state publicity workers must devote more attention to economic propaganda.

"The tasks of revolutionary journalists are to publicize the leading experiences of our economic performance, to explain exhaustively to the people the measures that the revolution is taking to benefit them and to inform them as to our economic limitations," he pointed out. He also said that a few newsmen are working to corrupt the essence of the Sandinist economy.

Appeal to Newsmen

He also appealed to the mass media to show more interest in economic problems, inasmuch as "not much effort has been made to broach the main facets of our economic problems. At times we are more concerned about publicizing a ministry than the accomplishments of the revolution," he said in reference to state publicists. He noted that we must publicize the involvement of the workers in the economy.

"Newsmen must help to spur the Sandinist economic process and underscore the moral incentives in the various enterprises owned by the people," Gallo emphasized, "because they are a vital factor in achieving our economic goals, which are for the people's benefit." Differentiating between publicizing our economic efforts and commercial advertising, he said that the latter has different aims.

Advertising Is Something Different

He said that commercial advertising serves the interests of capitalists, who are interested only in selling their products, whereas the object of publicizing the economy is to develop a political awareness among our people regarding the problems and successes of our economy. This propaganda "must square with the truth, with the realities of our economy and with the problems of our people," Gallo said.

"The most effective economic propaganda is disseminated among the rank-and-file, at each production unit or center, and this propaganda can be developed only by mass organizations and unions. Our goal should be to develop deep-seated convictions among our people regarding our economic tasks and limitations," Carlos Gallo said in conclusion.

COUNCIL OF STATE RECOMMENDS BAN ON CDS LETTERS

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 16 Oct 80 pp 1, 12

[Text] The Council of State's Defense and Interior Committee, headed by Father Alvaro Arguello and Commander Hugo Torres and Jorge Rojas Mendoza of the CST [Sandinist Workers Federation], has rejected as inadmissble the bill submitted by Laime Montealegre, the INDE's representative to the Council of State. The bill aimed at abolishing the usual practice at some state agencies of requesting CDS [Sandinist Defense Committee] and ATC [Agricultural Workers Association] letters for government formalities and at banning mandatory membership in any political, social or union organization.

Nevertheless, at the request of Council of State Chairman Commander Carlos Nunez, the council approved sending a note to the JGRN calling on it to end the abuses involved when certain government agencies and officials demand papers from mass organizations such as the CDS and ATC.

In other words, although Montealegre's bill was not passed, it was decided that the National Reconstruction Government Junta should instruct all government agencies and officials not to ask for CDS papers, which are practically recommendations or requirements for getting a driver's license or for negotiating a bank loan.

In this regard, Jaime Montealegre said that the decision by Commander Carlos Nunez, by invoking a spirit of brotherhood and national unity, represents a victory for the Nicaraguan people because it guarantees the exercise of uncurtailed democratic rights. It also means that no longer will some organizations be above others because the state has singled them out and permitted them to issue citizens letters of recommendation, such as those of the CDS and ATC.

Montealegre went on to say that this demonstrated the complete illegality of this practice. The purpose of the bill was to guarantee that the Nicaraguan people could take care of all their formalities with state agencies without having to submit vouchers from political, not state organizations.

He added that private businessmen had never been against the existence of the CDS's; rather, these committees have every right to exist, and hopefully they can perform truly social, community and humanitarian tasks in our country that will benefit our people. However, just as the CDS's have a right to exist, so does any other organization that citizens form in this country, with none being above any other.

Thus, the practice of requiring letters, which in effect placed some organizations above others, is ending. The chairman of the Council of State, Commander Carlos Nunez, acknowledged the problem that has been posed by mass organizations such as the CDS and ATC, recognizing that it was illegal for government officials to ask for these papers because this violated the Fundamental Statute and the Statute of the Rights and Guarantees of Citizens.

Commander Nunez felt that it was not necessary to issue another decree-law to end this illegal practice; instead, a communication ought to be sent to the Government Junta asking it to issue instructions to all state agencies and officials to the effect that they immediately stop requesting these letters because they are in violation of our country's laws, Jaime Montealegre concluded.

FINANCE MINISTRY SETS AUSTERITY GOALS FOR 1981

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 21 Oct 80 pp 1, 10

[Text] In addition to reporting that the current expenditures budget would be frozen at this year's level as a true austerity measure, Finance Minister Joaquin Cuadra Chamorro told EL NUEVO DIARIO yesterday that next year the ministry would undertake a tax collection offensive unprecedented in the country's fiscal history.

The minister pointed out that the tax revenue goal for 1981 is 6 billion cordobas, 2 billion more than this year.

He conceded, however, that this will unquestionably be quite difficult to achieve, adding that everything humanly and technically possible would be done, nevertheless, to approach it.

The minister indicated that treasury revenue would be boosted without creating new taxes or increasing existing ones, because the government realizes the problems and the high cost of living faced by our people as a result of the war of liberation and the inflationary spiral around the world that affects us as a developing nation.

He said that instead of imposing new tax burdens on citizens, the government would strive to be efficient in tax collection and to expand the tax base; in other words, everyone must pay his just share of taxes.

He added that the central government is right now taking steps to tightly control public spending, so as to avoid and combat waste and extravagance, especially those completely unnecessary luxury expenditures.

Instructions will have to be faithfully observed, in the sense that no ministry or decentralized agency should spend more money than it needs for its actual administrative expenses.

In addition, he added, there will be tight control on spending connected with the performance of government jobs, and state personnel will be assigned to posts commensurate with their abilities, which will eliminate superfluous staff.

In conclusion, Comrade Cuadra stated that another major measure that will be implemented next year is to do away with the practice of "holding get-togethers," in other words, the sessions that government workers are used to holding and that basically result in administrative work delays.

PPSC CALLS FOR UNION SOLIDARITY, MORE ECONOMIC OUTPUT

[Text] The Christian Social People's Party (PPSC), a member of the Patriotic Front of the Revolution (FPR), considers that the message from the National Reconstruction Government Junta in which it courageously and prudently proposes a series of guidelines for basic action in our current domestic situation, is of far-reaching importance for the defense and consolidation of the Sandinist People's Revolution. The PPSC, the political organ of revolutionary Christians in Nicaragua, endorses and supports all of the ideas voiced by our junta and calls on Nicaraguans to close ranks with it and support these realistic, consistent provisions. Our call goes especially to all urban and rural workers and to all those who realize that we must develop an organized people's government.

The PPSC, like the Government Junta, is aware that the basic goal of this stage of the revolution is to quantitatively and qualitatively boost production. This is because the near- and medium-term future of the revolution hinges on a real increase in output, which must cease to be just a slogan and become the concern and concrete aim of all the country's economic sectors. In this regard, we realize that Nicaraguan companies require security, stability, work discipline and respect for lines of administrative authority, which does not, however, mean ignoring the dignity of the workers.

Moreover, however, production urgently needs the unity of the workers, the unity of their labor organizations. The working class is a single unit, and in general the workers have the same interests; thus, they must gradually develop a unified course of action. Worker and peasant farmer rank-and-files have to have increasingly coordinated and unified leadership. Differences often occur just among leaders, who then carry over such disagreements to their union rank-and-file.

The PPSC feels that we have to develop a mature and flexible attitude to promote true labor unity. If national unity has been possible among sectors that have clear class differences, how can national unity not be possible among the members of the same class? If union unity was possible in the past, contributing to the struggle against Somozism and imperialism, how can unity not be possible today, to lift up the economy, boost production and rebuild Nicaragua?

It is reasonable for each worker federation to want to grow and bring people into its fold.

But at this juncture it is not reasonable for some sectors and even some leaders to attack other workers in the same way that they attack class enemies, just because they belong to another union. It is not reasonable for a given union to grow weak and unstable just because there are two factions in it that belong to different federations and wage guerrilla war on each other. It is not reasonable for energies to be wasted on interunion disputes when there are tasks and goals of prime importance facing us. We admire and praise those mature leaders who know how to perform their tasks skillfully and flexibly aware of the delicate work that they are performing and with true fraternal affection for all of their class brothers.

The PPSC wishes to draw attention to this problem, which is also a production-related factor, and issues a fraternal appeal for union unity, a union unity around goals such as boosting output and specific tasks in keeping with the interests of the workers. We are not talking about a single federation. We are talking about union unity in connection with coordinated actions that might gradually lead us towards an organization for wideranging cooperation in the medium and long term as a result of the converging will of the workers.

We hope that all union federations can grasp the concern that we members of the PPSC have as a party affiliated with the FPR and that our message initiates a process of reflection and rapprochement among federations in particular and workers in general.

Let us boost production. Union unity also means production. Let us further union unity.

JGRN MEMBER LISTS MEASURES TO REVIVE CATTLE-RAISING INDUSTRY

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 8 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Rafael Cordova Rivas, member of the JGRN (National Reconstruction Government Junta)]

[Text] We need to revive our traditional cattle-raising industry, which has been one of the factors that has maintained the economy of this nation and the profit level of our exports, in which only a small amount of imported raw materials is invested.

No one can fail to be aware that our livestock industry is in a state of crisis because of a number of factors, and that it is urgent to recover from this crisis, for this industry is a valuable source of currency earnings.

Here I want to offer, not a magic formula, but a way to move this agroindustry forward. I do believe that with my ideas I can help to make some positive contribution.

1. Cattle rustling must be countered intensively and effectively, because this is the start of the destruction of our livestock; it is our endemic disease that causes the greatest losses.

I believe that all the authorities will have to pay attention to this when in its message the National Reconstruction Government Junta stated that it will not tolerate "the theft of cattle and any form of rustling; this will be prosecuted energetically and without any hesitation." Until this first problem is solved, nothing can be done.

2. To establish a fund coming from international sources of sufficient magnitude so that loans can be made to livestock breeders for all the investments needed of both capital and labor, and the acquisition of herds, with a 20-year term and a 4-year grace period with no interest.

3. As the Junta said in its statement, "takeovers of land, farms, or ranches, and any stoppage of production therein will not be tolerated in any way." This provision will help to encourage and inspire confidence in livestock raisers.

4. The restitution of all agricultural and livestock breeding properties belonging to persons who are not included in decree 3 and 38 now affected by decree 329.

5. Readjustment in the price of raw milk.

6. Practical and scientific training should be given to middle-level administrators and managers.

If these measures are applied, I believe that we can revive our cattle-raising industry, restore the productivity of our farms, and again become a nation that is a strong producer of meat and milk cattle, as we have traditionally been.

IMPORTANCE OF NEW SCHOOL YEAR RECOGNIZED

Tunnerman Addresses Students

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 6 Oct 80 p 3

[Message from Education Minister Carlos Tunnermann Bernheim to Nicaraguan students; date not specified]

[Text] Today, Monday 6 October, is a very important day for education in our country, because in addition to being the start of a new school year, you, teachers and students, educators and pupils alike, will be in direct charge of this entire system as far as discipline is concerned. Education has found its own supervisors in you, who have already received the finest classes in methodology and social behavior over a 5-month period of living together with our peasant farmers in the mountains.

We have already derived many strategies and objectives from this learning experience and we must apply them right now to certain subjects. Therefore, you will delve more resolutely into certain fields of knowledge that were previously avoided or prohibited by the programmers who were afraid of liberation.

A new teaching system could come about only through the lengthy experience of all of the sectors committed to our Sandinist People's Revolution, because it was here, in this enormous rural school, that all of us, without exception, learned the finest lessons of patriotism by visiting the sanctuaries of our heroes and martyrs who fell during the struggle. We learned economics by working together with farmers; geography by fording rivers and visiting districts that do not yet appear on maps; botany by collecting specimens, and most importantly, we learned that there is no more lofty learning element than that which emanates from the people who are involved as real promoters.

I wish that I could have been with you today, shoulder to shoulder, to tell you that at every meeting, seminar and crowded rally I have received real incentives to do my everyday work better.

Nevertheless, here in Belgrade at the UNESCO General Assembly, in addition to the joy with which the delegates are hailing our Sandinist People's Revolution, I can convey to you, with the pride of a Nicaraguan, that the most valuable thing that we can offer the education ministers gathered here from all over the world is the lengthy testimony of our National Literacy Crusade, in which every word has been written not by me but by thousands upon thousands of hands that first sundered the bonds of ignominy and then in freedom performed this feat of the spirit that has cost us tears, sleepness nights and even a bit of generous and brotherly blood.

My wish for all of you is that Sandinist solidarity, which was put to the test yesterday, can be practiced now in the classroom among all, teachers and students, former combatants, brothers and sisters.

It is my wish that we never see the discord, ill-will or friction that Commander of the Revolution Carlos Nunez Tellez prudently warned us against at the opening of the Second National Literacy Congress.

Some must always teach others, because levels of political learning can never be identical, and we must be more consistent and generous with the hesitant so that they join in our revolution.

If we demonstrated our revolutionary convictions yesterday by enthusiastically joining the crusade, let us today reaffirm that conviction by returning to the classroom to be number one in studies, number one in discipline, number one in the fulfillment of duty.

Work-Study Program Discussed

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 11 Oct 80 pp 1, 5

[Excerpts] All of the regulations relating to the new school year were discussed and clarified during the "Face the People" Program held last night at the Colegio Centroamerica and attended by heads of family and members of the Government Junta.

Among the most important regulations are the instructions given to school principals not to leave a single student unregistered; the price controls on books and study materials so that family budgets can afford them; and the use and sale of the single uniform for all schools.

Work-Study Program

One of the most controversial issues was the work-study program that our government is trying to implement in the national education system.

In this regard, Commander Daniel Ortega was very broadminded in his answer, noting that we must not judge heads of family too harshly for their opinions, twisted though they may be, concerning work-study. It stands to reason that parents, used to living in a repressive climate, are frightened by the risks that young boys ran before the victory just because they were youths. Nevertheless, we must convince them of the benefits that their children will gain from the self-confidence that they will acquire through schooling in an atmosphere of work and study.

We must also bear in mind that reactionaries are taking advantage of the religious sentiments of our people by claiming that the revolution is trying to prevent children from spending Christmas with their parents, which is completely untrue, because work programs will not be pursued during the Christmas season.

In this regard, Commander Ortega drew a comparison between LA PRENSA and NOVEDADES in terms of the unhealthy anticommunism that it engages in in its editorials.

The minister of education, Comrade Carlos Tunnerman, pointed out that all countries are developing work-study programs, because the latest teaching methods have found that work has heretofore undiscovered educational benefits. UNESCO has worked out an entire research program on the positive effects of work-study and is providing loans to governments that implement such experiments, upon their request.

Parents Association

During the program the Parents Association showed itself to be a grass roots organization that is totally recognized by the vanguard and the Government Junta. Thus, it will be represented on the National Educational Advisory Council.

The vanguard thus recognizes the right of parents to make decisions regarding the education of their children.

Religious Education

Parents also brought up the issue of religious education at public schools. The response was clear: if Catholic education were provided, then a Protestant or Moravian parent would also be entitled to demand that his children also be educated in the basic elements of his religion. However, if parents find a religion teacher, of any faith, and are willing to pay him out of their own pocket, the government would have nothing against it if classes in religion, any religion, were given outside of class hours.

Present at this meeting were Commander Daniel Ortega Saavedra; Comrades Sergio Ramirez and Moises Hassan, members of the Government Junta; and the minister and deputy minister of education, Comrades Carlos Turnerman and Francisco Guzman.

JGRN'S POLICY TOWARD MINORITIES, BLUEFIELDS CASE EXPLAINED

[Editorial: "Diversity Within National Unity, A Legitimate Aspiration"]

[Text] We would like to talk about a letter that appeared in the NUEVO DIARIO on 15 October. It was entitled "Brothers on the Coast Ask for Understanding" and signed by several comrades from the Department of Zelaya. Our comrades ask not to be accused of racism, explaining that Somozism used those arguments to keep our Atlantic and Pacific coasts divided.

We think that the appeal by our brothers in Zelaya is completely just and ought to be taken into account by all. We also feel, however, that it is incomplete and that it projects a false image of the National Reconstruction Government's stand on ethnic minorities, those in Zelaya in particular.

The FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] understands the full dimension of the tragedy of Miskitos, Sumos, Ramas and Criollos. The backwardness, ignorance and poverty that they share with the rest of our nation was compounded by the fact that American and Somizist domination aimed at crushing their cultural identity and historic values to facilitate their exploitation in mining, fishing and lumbering enclaves. Many years ago the FSLN stated in its platform that integrating the Atlantic coast must be one of priorities of the victorious revolution. We have now realized that such integration will be the result not only of developing better channels of communication; rather and above all, it must be a social and cultural process based, on the one hand, on respect for the traditions and characteristics of the various ethnic groups and, on the other, on the conviction that only a revolutionary government that bears in mind the legitimate aspirations of all Nicaraguans can guarantee diversity within national unity.

We can understand why the ethnic minorities' historic conditions of oppression and disenfranchisement give rise to naive desires for independence among them. The range of freedoms that the revolutionary government has guaranteed has enabled some of these desires to express themselves organizationally, and some have even gone so far as to undertake efforts in this direction in Central American countries.

It stands to reason that the many ethnic groups on Nicaragua's Atlantic coast are not in a position to determine what the most appropriate paths are, given the complex circumstances in which we live, to emerge from the unjust situation in which they have remained for centuries. Likewise, the Nicaraguan masses are not in a position to determine the best economic policies for the country at present. In both instances our leaders bear an enormous responsibility and they are the ones who have to guide the activities and courses of conduct of the rank-and-file.

The Bluefields movement was objectively counterrevolutionary, because it subverted the revolutionary order, physically attacked comrades, assaulted state-run enterprises and threatened to storm the Sandinist Police barracks. This does not mean that all of the people involved in the movement were counter-revolutionaries or that there were not some reasons for what went on. Thus, almost all of the people arrested have been released (only 13 are still in jail), and a member of our National Directorate went to speak directly with our brothers in Bluefields to gain in-depth knowledge of the problems there.

We are convinced that only dialog and the understanding of all parties will enable us to gradually eliminate the causes of this movement. If the government had to resort to force, it was because others had already employed violence to breach the revolutionary order and endanger the lives of many. Furthermore, we cannot forget that in connection with this entire problem there have been elements that have consciously manipulated the naive sentiments of the people to monopolize the counterrevolution for their own benefit. Hernan Savery, a university graduate and ringleader of the disturbances in Bluefields, openly and publicly declared his separatist intensions, in addition to revealing his contacts with former Gen Bernardino Larios, who was heading up a counter-revolutionary group. It was not we Sandinists who invented these charges; the ringleaders themselves admitted their true designs.

The National Reconstruction Government has taken extraordinarily important steps to incorporate ethnic minorities into our nation. Independent organizations of minorities have been given complete freedom; they are represented on the Council of State by a delegate from Misurasata; a literacy campaign in native languages has been pushed; their rights of ownership of the communal lands that they have historically occupied have been acknowledged, and loans and technical assistance have been granted to those remote regions on an unprecedented scale.

Much has been done in such a short time, but there is even more yet to be done. The minority leaders who are revolutionaries can contribute enormously to hastening the process of integration and understanding, of national unity amid cultural and ethnic diversity. The just aspirations of ethnic minorities can be resolved only under a revolutionary regime. The leaders who are proposing false separatist solutions to them are leading them along a mistaken path of greater suffering. These leaders, who are seeking notoriety and fame rather than the welfare of their people, must be rejected.

ECONOMIC, HEALTH, EDUCATIONAL PROJECTS IN BLUEFIELDS NOTED

Municipal Junta Describes Progress

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 21 Oct 80 p 7

[Text] Bluefields--One year into its administration, the Bluefields Municipal Junta has been tackling a most difficult task: bringing progress to a region that has been out of touch with the rest of the country for decades.

When the members of the junta took over, they found a staff of 29 office and blue-collar workers earning a monthly salary of 19,134 cordobas under the budget. At present, there are 132 workers earning 175,098 cordobas a month under the budget, and thus more comrades have been brought into productive activities. The Ivan Dixon People's Cultural Center has been alloted 5,070 cordobas as well; 123 new jobs have been created, and 155,964 cordobas that the Somozists used to make off with is now received by the people in the form of new jobs.

Public Sanitation the Main Problem

One of the main problems inherited from the previous city government is public sanitation, an area in which a considerable amount of money has been spent, especially in maintaining the road leading to the refuse dump, on the refuse dump itself and on maintaining the unit providing the service.

For the time being, refuse is tossed onto the road leading to the pool, some 50 meters from the shore. This is not a proper site, but no other location was possible.

This problem has not been resolved totally because not all citizens have been cooperating, though some are. The previous administration had placed the dump near the outlying houses in the San Mateo district, thus demonstrating how little the health of the people there mattered to it.

Much To Do but a Beginning Has Been Made

The work to be done in this city is enormous, but it is gradually getting done. As far as construction is concerned, municipal funds have been used to place 56,000 paving stones over 2,830 square meters, including the road to the airport and the downtown streets.

The El Velero restaurant has also been overhauled. The initial idea was to set up a people's mess hall, but since there was an opportunity to purchase all of the restaurant equipment and the appropriate installations at a quite good price, this was taken advantage of with an outlay of 90,000 cordobas, and 15,000 more cordobas were invested in working capital. To date, net sales total 602,622.70, and total expenditures 581,896.63, including a 41,514 cordoba amortization on investment. Accounts receivable total 8,976, and accounts payable 78,143.04, including the pending amortization on the initial investment.

The first Divino Pastor College was rebuilt to preserve the infrastructure of three dormitories, one of three floors and two of two floors.

Investments in this project totaled 178,534.34 cordobas, which will hopefully be reimbursed through the Nicaraguan Tourism Institute, which offered to take complete responsibility for the building and turn it into a hotel that all Nicaraguans can make use of.

In light of the importance of city forestation and beautification, a tree nursery was built with more than 8,000 plants, including lumber, ornamental and fruit trees. The junta decided to sell the saplings to the public to finance the project, but due to the population's economic status, the desired success was not achieved. Nevertheless, the trees have been used in parks, along avenues and streets and in other public places.

Health Care Sector

At the request of the regional health care director for southern Zelaya, Comrade Marta Medina, a budget of 19,272 cordobas was approved for this important sector, which requires a large medical staff. The money has been used to repair two wells, to plaster a 14-foot deep water tank and to overhaul the piping system at San Pablo Hospital, with an eye towards improving the supply services there.

Coordination With Sandinist Defense Committees Leads to Community Improvements

Efforts have also been coordinated with the members of the neighborhood Sandinist Defense Committees (CDS), and a number of problems have been taken care of, especially in the construction of sidewalks.

San Mateo is one of the districts that has done the most to bring progress to its community. Some 200 meters of sidewalk and 2 bridges have been built here, thus resolving the problem of access to this area, which was hardest in winter.

Some 60 meters of sidewalk and a bridge were built in the Canal district, thus resolving part of the access problem; the junta contributed 55 bags of cement.

Two other districts that have been taken care of are Old Bank, where a sidewalk was built, for which the junta contributed 60 bags of cement, and the Fatima district, where the CDS's built 70 meters of sidewalk, with the junta providing 55 bags of cement. In addition, they did considerable repair work on the streets in the neighborhood with their own funds.

Other Responsibilities Assumed by the Junta

One of the major responsibilities that the junta took on was administering 95 houses that were confiscated from Somozists. They have brought in 125,798 cordobas in rent, and 112,313.73 has been invested to repair 37 of them and to buy 5 septic tanks. The accounts receivable portfolio totals 194,090 cordobas.

It contributed 210,084.43 to the National Literacy Campaign, including aid to the Education Ministry, to feed and mobilize the internationalist comrades who also taught our peasant farmers how to read and write.

Small Food Industry Revamping Program

The small industry revamping program deserves a special section, because its aim is to promote small businessmen, who used to be pitilessly exploited by money-lenders.

The program is being promoted by INPRHU, the Ministry of Industry and Commerce and the BND. It began last November with initial capital of 250 cordobas. By 31 August of this year, 304,400 cordobas had been loaned out to 77 families for the following purposes: 70,500 to 15 persons for diners [comiderias]; 34,000 to 6 persons for a butcher shop; 73,900 to 28 persons for fried foods stands; 35,000 to 9 persons for ovens; 31,000 to 5 persons for a refreshment stand. Loan repayments so far total 127,217.29, and 46,837.59 cordobas are overdue.

The project encountered some difficulties at first, as shortages of flour, hogs, oil, etc greatly affected the people participating in the program, but it has again become effective over the last 3 months, approaching a normal situation in economic terms.

The administrative delegates of the organizations financing the project noted during their visit that the program is doing fine in comparison to other departments in the country since it has made it quite easy to acquire additional capital, and as trends indicate over the last few days, the small industry market will be needing further investment.

Projects for 1981

The municipal market is scheduled for construction next year, and a budget of 1.2 million cordobas has already been approved for this purpose. The Nicaraguan Institute of the Atlantic Coast is also providing financing to build a children's park in Bluff Port. Municipal funds will continue to be earmarked for street paving, for the new refuse dump and Reyes Park and quite probably for a new public meat market.

Incoming Aid

Comrade William Ramirez, guerrilla commander and minister of development for the Atlantic Coast, donated on behalf of the Nicaraguan Confederation of Religious Orders the sum of 121,450 cordobas for the construction of three production cooperatives: cabinet-making, sewing and masonry.

The sewing cooperative was named Neysi Rios in honor of the combatant who met her death in June 1979. Thirty-five new work posts were opened in this cooperative, which operates under the Social Welfare Ministry.

Some 41,000 cordobas were earmarked for the cabinet-making project, which bears the name of Camilo Ortega, a Sandinist combatant and the apostle of unity, and 12 new jobs were created. It is under the control of the directors of the SCAAS.

With regard to the masonry project, there were a great many problems acquiring the built-in production equipment, and thus an agreement was reached with the SCAAS comrades to begin making paving stones. Twelve comrades currently work there, and 40,950 cordobas were earmarked for this program.

The information in this report is from the report by the Bluefields Municipal Junta, which completed its first year on 27 August. It is made up of Ruben Lopez (coordinator), Loyd Rorbes, Vickes Miller, Martha Medina and Francisco Lopez.

Cuban Teachers Return

[Text] Bluefields--At about 1100 hours on Saturday, comrades from Kukra Hill, carrying welcoming placards and accompanied by representatives of various local mass organizations, showed up at the dock to offer a warm welcome to returning Cuban teachers.

The Cuban teachers arrived from Bluefields after a 2-month vacation outside Nicaragua. They returned with the same enthusiasm with which they left, with the same spirit of internationalist solidarity that goes beyond the borders of their country, to back the Sandinist cause in the field of education.

On arriving, the teachers showed their enthusiasm for the welcome extended them and reaffirmed their unswerving duty to teach the ignorant. They also introduced three new comrades who will be teaching in previously uncovered areas.

Speeches were made by a man from the town, the representative of the Sandinist National Liberation Front and representatives of mass organizations. Revolitionary rallying cries and testimonial songs were then heard as the group marched toward the center of town, where the Cubans were given housing.

A party was organized that night with music and dancing, turning into a very lively get-together marked by discretion and friendship.

Each teacher was scheduled to move on to his battlefield on Sunday the 12th. The individuals happiest over the return of the teachers are unquestionably the heads of family, whose children have an opportunity for schooling for the first time.

They came from every community to Kukra Hill to gather up their instructors, who together with our peasant farmers marched into the countryside to fulfill their wonderful commitment, marked by an unshakable solidarity with our people, who suffer from a serious shortage of teachers.

These teachers opened the doors of the schools in this community without asking for any privileges, with a willingness to live in the same conditions as our peasant farmer brothers.

Sugar Cane Harvest Started

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 21 Oct 80 p 14

[Text] The sugar cane harvest at the Camilo Ortega Sugar Plantation in Kukra Hill began quite successfully yesterday, Monday, as a total of 550 tons of cane were cut, which will yield 850 to 900 quintals of sugar.

The pressing of the cane was begun today, Tuesday, and the first sugar packaging will begin the day after tomorrow. The Camilo Ortega plantation will produce 120,000 quintals of sugar for consumption on the Atlantic coast; last year's output was 72,930 quintals.

The total acreage is 1,504 manzanas [1 manzana=about 1¾ acres], and the expected average yield is 47.8 tons per manzana. Initial AGROINRA [Agro-industries of the Agrarian Reform] estimates are that an average of 350 tons of cane will be pressed a day, eventually reaching a total of 71,910 tons over the 205 days that the harvest will last, that is, until 15 May.

In addition to sugar, an output of 401,977 gallons of molasses is expected, with a yield of 66.92 quintals per manzana.

At present, 450 farm workers are cutting cane in the fields, and 132 are at the plant. The workers are housed at two rural settlements in El Cacao and El Salto, in six-person dwellings with baths and toilets that meet sanitation standards.

Two doctors doing social service care for the health of the workers, who in emergencies are taken to Bluefields Hospital or to Managua.

Wages are in keeping with the regulations issued by the Labor Ministry for these cases, and a Regional Supply Center (CAR) has been opened to bolster the workers' wages.

MISURASATA REPRESENTATIVE DISCUSSES SITUATION ON ATLANTIC COAST

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 19 Oct 80 pp 1, 5, 7

[Interview with Stedman Fagoth, representative of Misurasata to the State Council; date and place not given]

[Text] In an interview granted to EL NUEVO DIARIO, Stedman Fagoth, Misurasata's representative to the State Council, specified the reason for the complete identification of these Indian communities with the policy of the revolution, based on historical factors, and stressed the proletarian and peasant nature of the members of Misurasata.

He mentioned the importance of this identification on behalf of the con olidation of the process.

He also discussed the recent Bluefields problem, noting that this section of the Atlantic Coast feels no animosity toward the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front], but that certain government officials have not acted properly. Finally, he criticized the fact that the matter was not handled correctly at the outset. He admitted that there were demands made in Bluefields, and said that what is needed is to bring about a clarification through fraternal dialog.

Better still, here are the questions and answers.

[Question] How would you describe the Misurasata organization under the current circumstances?

[Answer] Under the current circumstances, the Misurasata organization is the revolutionary unity of the Miskito, Sumo and Rama Indian peoples. It is aimed at backing and consolidating the conquests made by the popular movement as a whole.

[Answer] We would say that it is on the Atlantic Coast as a whole, except for the Bluefields region, because that is inhabited mainly by people of European origin.

[Answer] I would say that it was in North Zelaya, which is circumscribed by the geographical boundaries of the triangle, one of whose sides is the Coco River, in the direction of the Pacific, at Santa Isabel, as far as Laguna de Perlas, and toward the Honduran border, at Sandy Bay. Misurasata has its sphere of influence in that triangle; there are about 190 communities, which comprise its bases of support.

[Answer] From our individual point of view, the existence of the Indian people is of essential significance to the future of the revolution. The Indian people are on the Atlantic Coast of Nicaragua which, with half of the border with Honduras, comprises the most uncultivated and mountainous region. It is where the Miskito people live, and it also extends toward the Caribbean.

From the geopolitical standpoint, the importance of Misurasata is very great, for the defense and consolidation of the process.

[Question] What does the Sandinist revolution mean to the Indian people?

[Answer] If one gives a slight glance at the devastated plains and the devastated savannahs of the Atlantic Coast, he will realize that the foreign companies destroyed the forests, causing soil erosion, and left only poverty. They felled the woods, plundered the ocean with fishing, exterminated the turtle and, in the mines, have now left 60 percent of our miners ill with silicosis and tuberculosis. To be more clear, for example, the Sumo people were exterminated by the mines in Siuna, Bonanza and Rosita, and were reduced to 12,000. The Miskito people were saved, because they lived on the banks of the Coco River. That legacy of exploitation describes the meaning of the Sandinist revolution to the Miskito, Sumo and Rama peoples; in other words, it is within the context of the Sandinist revolution that the semiproletarian Indian majorities can achieve their true cultural, racial and political identity.

[Question] What does the Misurasata organization expect from the Sandinist National Liberation Front insofar as the unity of the popular movement is concerned?

[Answer] We said previously that the Indian peoples occupied half the territory of Nicaragua, with approximately 300,000 persons, of whom 50,000 were over 14 years of age. In other words, the Indian peoples are an integral part of the popular movement, and Misurasata expected from the Sandinist Front a profound, unified position, with a consistent classist plan that will allow for a powerful organization of the popular movement to resist the onslaughts of the Central American counterrevolution, which is trying to surround and annihilate the nascent revolution that is the hope of the oppressed.

[Answer] From a classist standpoint, the Indian movement is a proletarian and semiproletarian movement: proletarian, because the development of the agricultural-fishing-mining companies allowed for the development of the most powerful enclaves of the national proletariat. For example, in the accursed Cerro Dorado, Bonanza and Siuna mines there are approximately 1,700 pit miners; in the sea, there are about 4,000 divers;and in the lumber cutting there are some 800 woodsmen associated with the capitalist economy. In other words, there is a sizable group of mining-forestry-seagoing proletariat, but that is combined with 200 communities holding communal land, which is not private land, but that of the Indian communities which are semi-proletarian in nature. That is to say, they have communal ownership of the land; they provide their own food, with their rice, bean, yucca and cohune palm crops; and they sell part of those products to the market. Thus, from the classist standpoint, the Indian movement has no structural differences from the popular movement; because there is no bourgeoisie on the Atlantic Coast.

[Answer] The Sandinist plan has been established as a people's democracy of workers and peasants. Misurasata obviously subscribes to the Sandinist plan of the worker-peasant people's democracy, because its population consists of workers and peasants.

[Question] Insofar as we know, there has been friction between Misurasata and the Sandinist National Liberation Front. What is its source?

[Answer] It is difficult to describe the various sources of friction, but as a first approach, we would say that there has been lack of understanding about the essential features of the classist movement in Puerto Cabezas and in other sections on the Atlantic, and there has also been disregard for state employees whom we do not consider representatives of the Sandinist movement, but rather people employed there who have committed serious arbitrary acts of a political and administrative nature, who have annoyed the populace and who produced a spiral of nonconformity and resentment that has created friction which does not lead anywhere. They have been threatening to damage the deepseated unity which the popular movement should have.

[Answer] Basically, we think that, since Misurasata is an integral part of the fundamental mainstays of the popular movement on the Atlantic Coast, the friction inside the popular movement must necessarily be cured in an atmosphere of strict brotherhood and fraternity. In other words, we consider it necessary to reestablish, from the standpoint of the interests of the proletariat, the peasantry and the semi-proletariat, a program of joint activities between Misurasata and the Sandinist Front, which will make it possible to intensify the unity that will afford a strong defense against the ambushes of the counterrevolution. Obviously, the population on the Atlantic Coast of Nicaragua has special ideological features which must be taken into account in this unifying process that will have to take place. In other words, we expect the greatest understanding in the unifying tasks shared by the Sandinist Front and Misurasata.

[Answer] We think that they were not handled properly, that they were not handled in the best way, and degenerated into a spiral of violence wherein, obviously, the only thing losing is the popular movement as a whole, because an unsuitable intervention such as occurred in Bluefields on the part of the government threatens to create severe friction within the popular movement. We expect greater understanding on the part of the Sandinist national leadership, so that it will know how to decide which the essential problems are.

[Question] How should this affair with the Bluefields population have been handled?

[Answer] We think that the only possible way is to recognize that there have been certain demands in Bluefields, and to sit down at a negotiating table and find out how important those claims are to the people of Bluefields, and then resolve them in an atmosphere of brotherhood.

[Question] What is the economic situation on the Atlantic Coast, and what are the prospects for the next 4 months?

[Answer] The economic situation on the Atlantic Coast is of the following dimensions: The majority of the population lives on its crops of rice, beans and yucca, and on hunting for certain animals and fishing, for food. In the first harvest, a harvest which proved to be very good, the prices were very low, so the communities had to sell that harvest in order to buy the essentials: matches, salt, kerosene and a few clothes. And the communities were left without supplies or money, and thought that they would recover in the last harvest. However, with storms, and with water escaping from the riverbed of the Princapolka and the Coco, which destroyed the crops on the Coco River, in the regions of Bonanza, Musawuas, Espanolina, and Fruta de Pan, and the regions of Kligna, Lapan, Layasita and Kasata, near Puerto Cabezas, we were put in a truly alarming situation. The communities will have dreadful difficulties which can only be resolved with the unity of the people around Misurasata and the Sandinist National Liberation Front.

PLANNING MINISTRY DIRECTOR DISCUSSES EL SALVADOR, ECONOMIC GAINS

Hernani (Guipuzcoa, Spain) EGIN in Spanish 10 Oct 80 p 14

[Text] Bilbao (EGIN)--"When a government can give people weapons, when it can distribute large numbers of rifles during the daytime for target practice and then collect them at night, and when the people do not use the weapons against the government, it shows that there is more democracy and grassroots support for that government than just giving someone a piece of paper to put in a ballot box." This was the reply given by the director general of the Nicaraguan Planning Ministry, Javier Gorostiaga, at a press conference yesterday in Bilbao, to the criticism of the Nicaraguan Government's decision to postpone elections until 1985.

The Sandinist People's Militias, which link the army with the people, represent one of the peculiar features of the Nicaraguan Revolution, which is about to complete its 15th month since the triumphant mass uprising and the flight of Somoza. The army consists of some 10,000 persons. "The idea is for it to be kept small, streamlined and technical, as well as inexpensive, because otherwise the economy would not be able to maintain it," Javier Gorostiaga explained.

Nevertheless, the army is inadequate for the needs of a country "that is in the middle of a regional war throughout Central America. In order to stave off heavy military outlays and because our defenses are organized in the form of these people's militias, we have begun a major campaign among the masses, with military training ranging from ministries to factories and fields. There might be more than 100,000 persons in the Sandinist People's Militias at present," Gorostiaga said.

"The feeling among the people," Javier Gorostiaga added, "regarding these charges of totalitarianism is that we have just staged elections where we voted with 50,000 fatalities and 100,000 wounded individuals. This is obviously not a formal election; it is another kind, which meant much suffering, and the people are saying that we should at least have 5 years with this government that we voted for with our lives."

Tragic Situation in Central America

Javier Gorostiaga, who was visiting Bilbao for family-related reasons, stressed the importance to Nicaragua of the tragic situation in Central America. More than 9,000 people have been killed in El Salvador so far this year, mostly by the Armed Forces and the police, in complicity with the Christian Democrats.

"The repression in that country is unbelievable. We could spend hours talking about the crimes against teachers, peasant farmers...and I am frightened, not by the poor and scant information that gets to Europe, but by the decision not to report on one of the most important developments in the world today."

In spite of the fierce repression, the Government of El Salvador and imperialism are not succeeding in halting the resistance movement, and the grassroots organizations, following the Sandinist example and surmounting ideological differences, have joined together in a single front. "We feel that this situation can't last longer than a year, by which time the forces of the people will have taken power."

As far as the attitude that the United States, which currently supports the junta, might take in the conflict, the Sandinists fear above all that if Reagan wins the election, there could be an invasion of El Salvador, and in the event that American military forces invaded its territory, there could be a Vietnamization throughout Central America. "It is tremendously surprising to us that some European countries are completely unaware of these developments," Javier said.

For the moment, the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] has pursued non-intervention in El Salvador and, according to Javier Gorostiaga, has been forced to prevent volunteers from going there because that would be a justification for the United States to intervene. "The forces of the people can resolve the problem themselves, but if the United States intervenes, the front declares that Nicaragua cannot remain passive."

"A few months ago," he added, "it was thought that the invasion could come from Guatemala, but today Guatemala would have a hard time invading El Salvador because it is faced with an internal conflict as serious as the one there. The forces of the people have also united there and are even in control of entire areas of the country. The repression is also extremely harsh, as more than 20,000 people have been killed, according to Amnesty International."

National Reconstruction

With regard to the policy of national reconstruction, Javier Gorostiaga analyzed the disastrous Somozist heritage with 40 percent of the production system in ruins. "We have a nationalized financial system, but we have only $3.5 million in reserves. Our groundwork for rebuilding the economy was a country with $1.6 billion in foreign indebtedness, in short, a ruined, debt-ridden country without financing, and a victorious people with great expectations that was not at the standard of living that even Somoza gave them. This was the initial tragedy of the revolution."

The country decided to negotiate its foreign debts with banks, governments and international organizations because a moratorium would have entailed a boycott against Nicaraguan exports. "We are going to pay them off as we generate economic capacity and we are having success. Another important decision was to rule out further debts and rebuild the production system with our own resources.

International aid through the solidarity campaign brought in some $100 million last year, a few small sum. Despite this, the bottom line on the first year of the revolution has been very positive. We expect that economic growth in terms of the gross domestic product will be around 16 percent by year end, and we are convinced that in 1981 we will surpass the 1977 level, which was the highest in Nicaragua's economic history."

"Nicaragua's consolidation is based on restructuring its economy and on fundamental changes in income distribution. This year, for example, there has been an appreciable rise in the living standard of peasant farmers, the most oppressed segment of society under Somoza. All banking, foreign trade and Somoza-owned assets have been nationalized, which means that publicly owned assets account for 40 percent of the GDP. Some 80 percent of agriculture is in private hands, and 75 percent of industry, but half of this private sector is small- and medium-size capital. "In Nicaragua today we are dealing realistically and flexibly with the economic issue, and this approach to rebuilding the country requires private enterprise and a bolstered mixed economy."

Push by Grassroots Organizations

The opposition policy of the main bourgeois party, the Nicaraguan Democratic Movement, is offset by the people's massive support for the government's measures (a government in which the Sandinist Front is in the majority) and, in addition, by the great push being given by the grassroots organizations, which play an active role in the country's political and economic life.

All political parties participate on the Council of State (the ones that defend the revolution have set up a patriotic front), representing grassroots organizations to guarantee that the interests of working class strata will be defended. Thus, the Sandinist Workers Federation, the Agricultural Workers Association, the Luisa Amanda Espinosa Women's Association, the neighborhood Sandinist Defense Committees and the 19 July Sandinist Youth are involved in political tasks.

'BARRICADA' IN FRENCH--The friends of the Sandinist Revolution abroad have been working for a long time to uphold solidarity with our people and to combat the campaign of slander being spread by the multinationals and by imperialism. A concrete reflection of both of these tasks is the work done by the Nicaraguan Solidarity Committees in France which have published a summary of BARRICADA in French. The publication was distributed at the recent festival sponsored by L'HUMANITE and was warmly received by the fraternal European people. For those of us at BARRICADA who are creating a vanguard journalism for the Nicaraguan people, it is good to see the message of our vanguard published in other languages, and we hope that other Solidarity Committees will reproduce this noble initiative. VIVAS TERAN SUPPORTS RAFAEL CALDERA CANDIDACY

Caracas BOHEMIA in Spanish 13-19 Oct 80 pp 44-47

[Interview with Social Christian Party (COPEI) leader Abdon Vivas Teran, by Jesus Seguias, at his office in Caracas; date not given]

> [Text] Politics certainly has its ups and downs. Today we could be down and tomorrow we could be up, and the day after perhaps the situation could change, and we would be back where we started.
> This is at least what comes to mind when Abdon Vivas Teran, COPEI's "ultraleftist," announces his support of "ultra-conservative" Rafael Caldera, especially if we recall that the "albino" was persecuted in 1967, when he was COPEI secretary general, by the old caudillo. Can we say today that Abdon and the man who replaced him as the youth secretary in those days, Oswaldo Alvarez Paz, are marching shoulder to shoulder in furthering Rafael Caldera as a COPEI presidential hopeful?
> We ascended to the 19th floor of "La Previsora" Tower to erase this question mark. At the entrance to a large office, taking up almost one-fourth of the floor, were the words: "Vivas Teran and Associates." Our blond host was waiting for us, and without wasting time on formalities, we began interviewing him:

Caldera and Pedro Pablo: 'Untimely Action'

[Question] What does Abdon Vivas think about the intensive internal campaign that a number of COPEI factions have engineered to take control of the national leadership at the upcoming National Convention?

[Answer] I think that the worst thing that COPEI could do is get involved in another conflict over replacing its national, regional, district and municipal authorities. More specifically, I do not want to get involved in a conflict over replacing our authorities. I think that some of our comrades are bringing up this issue, which they have a right to do, at the wrong time and under the wrong circumstances. I think that the approach by certain comrades who are bent on quickening the pace of dealing with the party's political problem is like trying to have lunch before breakfast, to quote Minister Rafael Andres Montes de Oca. The country is calling on us to behave differently.

[Question] Are you referring specifically to the campaign that Pedro Pablo Aguilar has begun all over the country?

[Answer] I am referring to any comrade who feels that way and takes that tack. I am not questioning their right to do so, but I am questioning their timing and the political motives for such an approach.

The COPEI Consensus

[Question] Dr Vivas, there are those who think that your stand coincides quite nicely with the Caldera faction, which is interested in keeping the current authorities on the National Committee because they are on their side....

[Answer] You should remember that I have not said that the party's current authorities ought to continue in power after their terms are over, in accordance with the party's bylaws. I have said only that if COPEI really reflects the political maturity that the country ascribes to it, it ought to avoid resolving the problem of replacing its authorities through conflicts. I am not in favor of extending the mandate of the present authorities, which would be the other way set forth in the bylaws to surmount the problem.

[Question] What are you proposing then?

[Answer] I am proposing a general agreement, an appeal for a consensus, which, from my modest standpoint, is the call emerging from the COPEI rank-and-file. The people in COPEI are weary of internal elections...

[Question] I seems that Dr Caldera has actively begun his campaign for his party's presidential nomination. Could your criticism regarding the replacement of authorities also be applied to Dr Caldera?

[Answer] If I assert that a discussion about authorities is untimely, I have to be consistent and state that a discussion of presidential candidates is even more out of place and untimely. My call for a consensus also has to do with COPEI's presidential candidate....

[Question] Would you say then that Rafael Caldera is taking untimely action?

[Answer] I think that any discussion of a presidential candidate is out of place and untimely.

Caldera: The 'Natural Candidate'

[Question] Are you in agreement with Rafael Caldera's candidacy?

[Answer] I think that former President Rafael Caldera is a natural candidate for the party. I feel that he represents one of our best chances for retaining power....

Did Abdon Back Down?

[Question] What might be going through the minds of the people in that large youth faction, and party faction in general, who loyally followed Abdon Vivas Teran when he was national youth secretary and then fired from the post by Rafael Caldera (some say that he was ridden roughshod over), when they hear him say that Caldera is COPEI's natural candidate?

[Answer] I do not think that former President Caldera is our only option in COPEI. There are other comrades with a thousand qualifications who could run in 1983. I have just said that Dr Caldera is the party's natural candidate. I think that there is a wide range of agreement on that in COPEI, beginning with the minister of the interior himself, Rafael Andres Montes de Oca. So I think that this is not just my opinion; rather, it represents the view of a major contingent in COPEI.

Furthermore, I think that things and ideas have evolved in the Social Christian Party. Under the current circumstances, it would not be at all strange for me to back the views, as such, of a comrade, regardless of how bitter and hard-fought the struggle might have been in the party in years past. This is not the first time that I have disagreed with a number of party comrades. On the contrary, I think that as developments unfold, there could be much broader common ground. President Caldera is a party comrade like any other person. You cannot ask me to disagree permanently with anybody, much less with former President Caldera, just as you cannot ask me to agree constantly with someone.

Good-By to the Community Society?

[Question] In light of these changes, could we say that Dr Rafael Caldera has become acceptable to the "left wing" in COPEI or that, on the contrary, Abdon Vivas has renounced his original ideas and become aceptable to the "right wing"?

[Answer] The party's political and ideological dynamics are moving forward. COPEI is trying to bring itself up to date. And if former President Caldera, President Luis Herrera, the entire party, moves towards the idea of a "community society" and worker self-management, I will be the first one to voice my happiness over that approach, because when all is said and done, those have been my main banners over the 20 years, ever since my youth, that I have been a member of Venezuelan Christian Democracy.

[Answer] Right now, the party's attention is not focused on political and ideological discussion. I do not agree with this. I have to acknowledge, of course, that the party is faced with situations that it has to take care of right away. According to many people, it has to first take care of replacing its authorities and choosing its presidential candidate.

Caldera Is the Man

[Question] Dr Vivas, what essential requirement must a COPEI leader meet to seek the presidential nomination?

[Answer] The ability to lead us to victory in the next presidential election....

[Question] Who, for example?

[Answer] I think that aside from being a natural candidate for the party, as Minister Rafael Andres Montes de Oca said last year in Barquisimeto, Dr Rafael Caldera is obviously a man who could really insure our victory over Democratic Action.

Is Abdon an Opportunist?

[Question] By taking this stand aren't you running the risk of having people call you an opportunist?

[Answer] I don't think so. I don't have a position in the government; I don't have ties with the country's economic and political oligarchy, nor do I seek the support of those oligarchies....

[Question] What about Dr Caldera?

[Answer continued] ...I am in the midst of a struggle commensurate with my qualifications and potential. I think that the party's basic commitment, under Caldera, Herrera Campins, Montes de Oca, Eduardo Fernandez or whoever, will have to gradually draw closer to the interests of the nation's working classes.

Excuse Me...?

[Question] Is it true that the Caldera faction proposed that you head up the COPEI legislative bloc?

[Answer] Could you repeat that question; you caught me by surprise.

(Knowing that this was done just for effect, I did not mind repeating what I had said with crystal clarity, a deliberate redundancy.)

[Answer] That is a complete surprise to me.

'Pepi' Is Fine, But...

[Question] What do you think of "Pepi" Montes de Oca as a COPEI presidential hopeful?

[Answer] I have a very high opinion of Minister Montes de Oca; I think that he has stupendous qualifications for a presidential candidate. I think that he is the minister who has lent the most influence to Luis Herrera Campins's administration....

[Answer] I have no direct or indirect information from Minister Montes de Oca to the effect that he is seeking the party's nomination. But I realize that there are many possible candidates in COPEI, one of them being former President Caldera, who is a natural candidate for the party, as Montes de Oca himself asserted some time ago. So...I think that we should stress not so much a comparison of individuals as the need for us to select the best man, so that he can lead us to victory.

EARNINGS BELOW SUBSISTENCE LEVEL REPORTED

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 19 Oct 80 p D-20

[Excerpts] Some 49.3 percent of Venezuelan families have earnings below the minimum subsistence level, according to a study presented by Councilman Felix Lopez on behalf of the Socialist League. The study concerns the unequal distribution of income, the erosion of real wages, the rise in unemployment, the high cost of living and the consequences of the current economic policy.

"It is not hard to convince any Venezuelan citizen of the contrasts that exist in our country. In our cities we see all kinds of buildings and mansions right next to thousands of huts housing more than one-third of our population and lacking basic services like water, electricity, garbage collection, etc.," Felix Lopez pointed out.

He illustrated the situation with the following table:

Monthly Income of Venezuelan Families

Income Level (bolivars)	Number of Homes	Percent of Total	Cumulative Percent of Homes by Income Level	Family Income
Total	2,259,962	100.00	100.00	2,897
Up to 300	36,324	1.61	1.61	216
301-450	51,823	2.29	3.90	402
451-700	139,173	6.16	10.06	595
701-1,000	227,209	10.05	20.11	891
1,001-1,500	325,793	14.42	34.53	1,290
1,501-2,000	333,740	14.77	49.30	1,799
2,001-3,000	413,795	18.31	67.61	2,579
3,001-4,000	266,620	11.80	79.41	3,612
4,001-5,000	160,104	7.08	86.49	4,675
5,001 and above	301,173	13.34	99.82	8,081
Unspecified	4,128	0.18	100.00	--

The table indicates that 49.3 percent of Venezuelan families earn less than 1,799 bolivars on the average. A study was conducted in Venezuela in 1975 that concluded that a minimum family subsistence income totaled 1,556 bolivars a month; by June 1980 the figure stood at 2,029.18 bolivars a month.

Pointing out further contrasts, we can say that 13.33 percent of Venezuelan families (those earning 5,001 bolivars a month and more) account for 37.17 percent of the total income earned by Venezuelans, while 67.61 percent of the families account for just 36.69 percent.

The councilman asserted that if we add up the number of Venezuelans who live on family income of between zero and 2,000 bolivars a month, we reach the conclusion that 5,701,953 of our fellow countrymen cannot meet their minimum needs.

Income Level	Number of Homes (1)	Average Family Size (2)	Total (1x2)
Under 300	36,324	4.1	148,928
301-450	51,823	4.6	238,386
451-700	139,173	4.5	626,279
701-1,000	227,209	5.1	1,158,766
1,001-1,500	325,793	5.2	1,694,124
1,501-2,000	333,740	5.5	1,835,570

On top of this regrettable situation, we have the problem of increases in the cost of living, which have worsened with "price decontrol." In just 1 year, this policy has led to a 32 percent increase in the price of necessary items such as foodstuffs, thus causing a continued erosion of already precarious Venezuelan wages to unprecedentedly low levels. The councilman pointed out that the purchasing power of 1 bolivar in August 1979 had dropped to 75 cents by August 1980.

COUNTRY'S POPULATION PROJECTED FOR 1981, 1985

Caracas RESUMEN in Spanish 19 Oct 80 pp 72-73

[Text] From 1971 to 1980 the population of Venezuela has increased by 4,223,000, from 12,335,177 to 16,458,502. According to a projection by the Central Office of Statistics and Information Science (OCEI), Venezuela will have 16,988,291 inhabitants in 1981, an increase of about 540,000.

According to another OCEI projection, Venezuela's population will reach 22,170,000 by 1990.

These projections of population increases in the coming years are very valuable in developing an idea of the country's future needs in goods and services.

If the increase in population is not accompanied by a corresponding increase in goods and services, problems and discontent arise. Thus, our country, which lacks a great many products, sees demand mount each year, and if goods are not produced to meet this demand, we will have to continue resorting (as we have so far) to imports, which represent a continual drain on foreign exchange and hinder the creation of our own job sources. Due to a lack of foresight, this has been happening in services such as water, social aid centers, schooling, transportation, mail, law enforcement, housing, etc. In other words, demographic statistics must be taken very much into account in planning to meet the requirements of a growing population, at least to the extent of its increase.

Though we now realize that there is a shortage of about 1 million housing units in the country, we should also plan to build between 100,000 and 150,000 additional units a year just to meet the ongoing demand from the natural increase in population.

Now then, since we also have to make up the shortage of one million housing units, we should give some thought to the enormous resources needed to undertake the vast effort of meeting the demand for housing in this country.

The housing shortfall that we have highlighted is a major inflationary factor. In order to meet such wideranging requirements, large tracts of land are also obviously needed, and such lands are available in the metropolitan area and in the Sucre District only at overinflated prices because of the prevailing speculation, a situation that does not lend itself to the building of low-cost housing.

Our most heavily populated cities will have to have areas that can unclog them by means of frequent, quick and efficient transportation services. These areas, which have come to be known as "satellite cities," can be built only by the state, because there are no private enterprises in our country with enough funds to undertake urban developments and investments of this magnitude. Think about how many services an urban area with 100,000 to 150,000 inhabitants has to have (water, electricity, telephone, schools, law enforcement, social aid services, supplies of all sorts of goods, etc), and you will see that this is a major task that only the state can undertake.

The fact is that population growth creates pressures, and we have to begin immediately the major tasks that it entails.

The following is the OCEI's projection of the population for 1980-81 and 1985, by states:

PROSPECTS FOR PETROCHEMICALS INDUSTRY DISCUSSED

Caracas RESUMEN in Spanish 19 Oct 80 pp 28-29

"This is what we have been saying ever since petrochemicals were first talked about in our country, but we have not progressed as much as we could and should have, because some people have been determined to settle this matter on a merely political level," people connected with the industry assert.

They indicate that it is true that "because of the structure of mounting domestic demand, characterized by excessive dependence on hydrocarbons, we must urgently make more efficient use of our energy resources and incorporate as much value added as possible into them. Nevertheless," these circles add, "what have we been waiting for since the 1950's, when millions and millions of bolivars began to be invested in this industry? More than 25 years have passed, and we still do not have an aromatics or olefins complex of the size that Venezuela ought to."

The Office of Coordination and Planning (CORDIPLAN) document then says that "in keeping with this principle and based on the national objective of developing a less dependent economy, the petrochemicals industry is a means for making comprehensive use of and getting the utmost from our hydrocarbons and, therefore, from the energy consumed," adding that "the demand for petrochemicals and fertilizers in major domestic sectors, together with the failure to carry out petrochemicals programs, has contributed significantly to higher imports. Of course, when nothing is done," these circles assert, "this has to happen: imports continue to increase (as with metal equipment items, etc, etc), and oil dollars are spent on imports."

It's always the same old song: "Since the country has sovereign use of its hydrocarbons resources, it has the opportunity to formulate a development policy that by assessing previous efforts and incorporating new developments, can provide industry with harmoniously integrated programs that are feasible in the medium run. This is exactly what was said initially during the era of the 'new ideal' and the 'integrated petrochemicals industry,' which ended up like soap bubbles, with several hundred million bolivars wasted or unaccounted for."

Prospects for 1980-1985

With regard to "prospects for the 1980-1985 period," the current administration says the following in the preliminary version of its 5-year program, the Sixth Plan of the Nation:

"The high rate of growth in the domestic petrochemicals market over the last few years has generated quite a bit of demand for plastics and fertilizers especially.

"Moreover, the long-term growth trend in the domestic market indicates that by the end of this decade there will be a substantial shortfall in local supplies, especially of fertilizers, the demand for which is expected to grow during the 1980's at a year-to-year rate of more than seven percent. This means that consumption will total around 1.3 million tons by the close of the decade, which if not satisfied by domestic output through the development of new programs, will have to be met by continued recourse to imports, which are estimated to hit more than 470,000 metric tons by 1990. In addition, the domestic aromatics market is expected to grow to some 130,000 metric tons by that same year, which means that we will have to build a BTX aromatics complex. These domestic market expectations are also a groundwork for developing new petrochemicals programs to add to our existing plants.

"There are also possibilities for marketing products in Andean Group countries and in third party countries. This would complement the Venezuelan market and enhance the flexibility and economic yield of our operations."

Investment Program

The preliminary version of the Sixth Plan of the Nation says at another point that "at present the Petrochemical Enterprise of Venezuela, S.A. and PETROVEN are engaged in analyzing and deciding what kind of petrochemical plants will be built, pursuant to the guidelines set down by the Executive Branch. As far as olefins and plastics are concerned, a decision has been made to build the following plants: vinyl polychloride; high-density polyethylene; low-density polyethylene; dichlorine ethane; caustic soda and polypropylene."

"As far as fertilizers and aromatics are concerned, they are awaiting the pertinent studies before making a decision on what plants construction will begin over the next few years."

The citizenry is highly skeptical about petrochemicals. Thus, when talk gets around to these things, it is not at all strange to hear people say: "Is all of this going to wind up like 'El Tablazo,' where hundreds and hundreds of millions of bolivars were invested after so many promises were made? Or will all of this fine talk become another drain on the Treasury?"

PETROVEN PRESIDENTS' SALARIES DENOUNCED

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 19 Oct 80 p D-16

[Text] "Energy and Mines Minister Humberto Calderon Berti could not deny at the meeting of Zulia legislators from 16 to 18 October that the presidents of PETROVEN [Venezuelan Petroleum, Inc] subsidiaries have had their base salaries boosted exorbitantly to 120,000 bolivars a month."

This statement came from Radames Larrazabal, a national leader of the PCV [Venezuelan Communist Party], who added that if the salaries of these managers were boosted to 120,000 bolivars a month, we would assume that the same was done with the pay of the oil company's executives.

"In any case, these salaries are almost six times higher than the nominal salary of the president of the republic."

No one, according to Larrazabal, can deny the responsibilities of these high-level managers, nor their policies as technicians nor the time that they have served in the oil industry, including prior to the nationalization, when some of them held very prominent posts.

"What we can see in this case, however, is a somewhat abusive practice that clashes with the notions of austerity and job loyalty that the current administration is advocating. Some body, the National Congress for example, ought to be consulted in connection with such a delicate matter. Minister Humberto Calderon Berti promised at the aforementioned meeting to send Congress a list of the most important oil industry managers and the salaries they receive. But we must come up with ways to control this situation."

The Communist leader said that according to figures compiled by the Presidential Commission on Petroleum Reversion in 1974, a number of the directors of the concessionary companies earned 46,000 bolivars a month. Just 6 years later, however, this figure had increased threefold.

"There are also oil workers who have been working for the companies for 20 or 30 years and are not even close to enjoying the benefits, proportionally speaking, of course, that the upper levels of management receive; in fact, the companies are too cheap to improve their living and working conditions," he pointed out.

NEW RECOVERY METHODS FOR RESIDUAL REFINED OIL ANNOUNCED

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 19 Oct 80 p D-18

[Article by Fermin Luque]

[Text] Los Teques, 18 Oct (Special)--New technologies for making maximum use of the residues from crude oil processing were unveiled at the first international seminar on new trends in oil refining, which was held at the research and development headquarters of Venezuelan Petroleum, Inc. (PETROVEN) in Los Teques.

The four new technologies have been developed by companies from the United States, France, Canada and Venezuela.

It was explained at the seminar that once the crude has been cracked in an atmospheric fractionating tower, the heaviest part is subjected to a vacuum distillation process, which yields liquids and a nondistillable residue. The aim of the new processes discussed today is to enhance the vacuum residue to obtain a higher yield of intermediate distillates such as gasolines, naphthas, gas oil, etc.

Little use was made of residues previously, but now, with the high cost of liquid products, these technologies have become extremely attractive from an economic standpoint, inasmuch as the residues of high metal content crude can be quite profitable when properly treated.

The French System

The representative of the French Petroleum Institute (IFP), Dr Antoine Billon, said in his address that "over the last 10 years the IFP has devoted major efforts to the treatment of atmospheric and vacuum residues using a process of deasphalting with heavy solvents."

"At present," he pointed out, "we can demonstrate a new processing system for converting deasphalted crude." The system consists of a hydrocracking, followed by a hydrotreatment of the cracked products using specially designed catalysts resistant to metal contamination.

Dr Billon said that tests have been conducted with various loads of heavy crudes and that in all cases there have been high levels of conversion into intermediate distillates, which are characterized by an intermediate diesel index and a low sulfur index. The residues represent a good charge for catalytic cracking because of their low sulfur, carbon and metal content and intermediate hydrogen content.

The Canadian Process

The Canadian process was explained by Dr Barry Pruden, who is attending the seminar on behalf of Petrocanada.

Dr Pruden explained that the advantages offered by the hydrocracking process using smelted salts (a high yield of light distillates and the system's resistance to contamination by metals and other substances) led them to investigate this technique for enhancing heavy crudes.

According to his report, the hydrocracking of heavy crudes with smelted salts is the only petroleum enhancement process using smelted zinc chloride instead of the conventional alumina support for heterogeneous catalysts.

According to Dr Pruden, this process, which is being developed by the Conoco Coal Development Company, could generate a good yield of high quality distillates from coal.

The Venezuelan System

The technology that our research center INTEVEP [Venezuelan Institute of Petroleum Technology] is developing was discussed by Dr Julio Krasuk, one of the researchers at the PETROVEN affiliate.

Dr Krasuk pointed out that the process of enhancing heavy crudes consists first of deasphalting, followed by hydrometalization and catalytic desulfurization of the deasphalted heavy crude.

A deasphalting study on 10 Venezuelan heavy crude oils yielded information on certain quality-related aspects (metal concentration, carbon content, etc) of these oils, as a function of the yields from the deasphalting process.

To illustrate these yields, Dr Krasuk disclosed the results achieved by deasphalting Jobo crude (14 degrees API), which has a high vanadium and sulfurr content. This charge was fed into a reactor using hydrometalization and hydrodesulfurization catalysts, which yielded a crude oil with very fine properties (low vanadium and sulfur content), plus a vacuum residue equivalent to 10 percent of the product volume.

The American System

Dr Richard Eccles, from the American company Hydrocarbon Research Incorporated, discussed the "H-Oil Process for High Conversion of Venezuelan Residues" in his lecture.

High oil prices furnish a big incentive for mixing vacuum residues with hydrogen to achieve a maximum yield of distillable products, he explained.

H-Oil is a commercially tested process that has been used for 12 years in Kuwait and other countries, and based on experimental laboratory results, 90 percent conversion can be secured by recycling vacuum residues.

The H-Oil system is of great interest to Venezuela, inasmuch as according to Dr Eccles's explanations, it could be used on our heavy crude oils with a demetalizing catalyst as a initial processing stage.

ENERGY MINISTRY BUDGET SUBMITTED TO CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish17 Oct 80 p D-20

[Text] Energy Minister Humberto Calderon Berti yesterday submitted his ministry's 204 million bolivar budget to the Finance Committee of the Chamber of Deputies.

This year's Energy and Mines Ministry budget calls for 204 million in its own outlays, plus 50 million for the International Institute of Advanced Studies for the Countries of OPEC and the Third World, and 12.1 million for FONINVES [Petroleum Research Fund] (hydrocarbons research and the training of scientific and technical personnel) and FUNVISIS (seismological research). These three items consist of contributions that will be included in this year's Energy and Mines Ministry budget, in addition to other basically social and service outlays that used to be included in the Finance Ministry's budget.

Taking into account all of its expenditures, the budget for the Energy and Mines Ministry next year totals 272 million bolivars, an 84 million bolivar increase over the 1980 budget of 187 million.

At the submission of the ministry's draft budget, deputies from various parties discussed both it and the overall federal budget. Deputy Cristobal Hernandez said that we had to rework the forecasts for revenue in the 1981 budget in light of higher anticipated oil prices. The minister pointed out that such a situation could not be anticipated because we have to wait for developments to happen. Anselmo Natale, from MAS [Movement for Socialism], made a series of observations, asked for an explanation of the Energy and Mines Ministry personnel cuts and pointed out that although OPEC has kept prices steady, it has not cut output, as it had agreed to do at the Vienna meeting. The minister clarified that the pricing decision was a resolution (which are unanimous and binding in OPEC), while this was not the case with the production move, which was a gentlemen's agreement among a group, not all, of the members.

Deputy Fernando Alvarez Paz, the secretary general of the People's Electoral Movement in Zulia, noted that the major outlays scheduled for the Orinoco Belt could affect other priority programs, such as the Guayana and Zulia iron, steel and coal programs.

BRIEFS

NATURAL GAS DISCOVERY--Punto Fijo, 10 Oct (Special)--Lagoven has made another natural gas discovery at its Los Testigos well northwest of Los Testigos Island. This confirms the existence of gas reserves on Venezuela's continental shelf. Tests on the well yielded positive results, with an output of about 480,000 cubic meters a day of natural gas (almost 18 million cubic feet). The gas can be used as a fuel and in other petrochemical industry processes, as well as the hydrogenation of heavy crudes. This is the northern well that Lagoven drilled in its offshore program. It utilized the ship "Wodeco IX," which had been operating north of the Paria Peninsula. Lagoven is also using a self-lifting platform, the Rowan Odessa, in the Gulf of Paria in its offshore program. The zone assigned to Lagoven for its offshore program includes the entire continental shelf off the Orinoco delta, the Gulf of Paria and the entire coast from the Paria Peninsula to the north, across the eastern part of Margarita Island and as far as Aves Island, the northernmost point of Venezuela's territory. The Los Testigos I well is located some 100 kilometers north of the coast of Sucre State and a bit more than 20 kilometers northwest of the islands of the same name. We should emphasize that this is the first discovery in the northern basin, since the others have been located closer to the Paria Peninsula: Mejillones I, containing gas and very light liquid hydrocarbons, and the Pajaro I and Dragon I wells, which contain solely gas. ENAF FACED WITH NEED TO CONVERT TO LIQUID GAS

La Paz PRESENCIA in Spanish 10 Oct 80 p 8

/Text/ ENAF /National Smelting Enterprise/ decided to speed up plans for modification of the fuel system at the Vinto tin and antimony foundries. It appears likely that this complex will convert from fuel oil to liquid gas by the second quarter of next year, according to general manager Eduardo Quiroga.

Quiroga said that the studies are being done according to preestablished programs and that fuel conversion is one of the major concerns of the current administrators of the nation's foundries.

He explained that aside from the technical difficulties in obtaining fuel oil for the foundries, ENAF is facing problems from the rising cost of fuel oil which adversely affects the production costs of tin and antimony.

If the timetable is met, the Vinto foundries will begin to use liquid gas instead of fuel oil within a year, more or less.

Thus the foundries will be the first industry to convert to liquid gas on a large scale as a prior step to the use of natural gas. At present preliminary work is also being done on the construction of a gas pipeline between La Paz and the Viacha cement plant for the same reason.

ENAF annually spends $8 million on fuel oil. The cost could drop considerably when liquid gas or natural gas is used, according to preliminary studies prepared by experts at ENAF. At the same time, the measure will bring relief to YPFB /Bolivian Government Oil Deposits/ which is encountering growing difficulties in the production of heavy liquid fuels such as fuel oil.

Other official reports show that several international companies, including the supplier of equipment to the tin foundries (Klockner of Germany), offered to prepare the studies, execute and finance the conversion.

The studies should outline the technology required to make the conversion at the foundries and install the new equipment, include pricing, financing and other details. Also, a study will be prepared on how the nation's producers will supply the liquid gas.

With this project nearly all of the metalurgical industry will employ the same technical information for using liquid gas that will be used at the La Palca volatization plant which will go into operation soon. The future volatization plant at Machacamarca will use only liquid gas. The Karachipampa lead and silver plant will use liquid gas during the first stage of construction.

In the meantime, industries located on the Bolivian high plateau can use only liquid gas that can be transported in container trucks and safely stored at the plants. To use natural gas, which is cheaper and can be transported only by pipeline, it will be necessary to open the Santa Cruz-Cochabamba-Oruro-La Paz pipeline. Financing for this pipeline is being sought from international organizations.

For this reason it is likely that the system to be put in place at the Vinto plant will be suitable for the use of either liquid or natural gas.

CAMPAIGN TO DIVERSIFY FOREIGN OIL SOURCES LAUNCHED

BRASPETRO Submits Proposals

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 14 Oct 80 p 30

[Text] Rio de Janeiro--A campaign to increase the number of oil exploration contracts in producer countries is being pursued by BRASPETRO [PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation] International, Inc] with a view to strengthening the Brazilian supply structure and increasingly diversifying foreign sources, the vice president of that enterprise, Joel Mendes Renno, said yesterday.

The main goal in intensifying BRASPETRO's exploratory activity is to encourage some producer countries, such as Libya, Algeria, Angola and the People's Republic of China, to increase their productive potential, and thus to establish the foundations so that Brazil too can benefit from the BRASPETRO discoveries, similar to what has happened in connection with Iraq.

Renno explained that a number of oil-producing countries are seeking technical support from state enterprises to increase the rate of exploratory work in their territory. Implicitly, this has been one of the conditions which could contribute to an increase of supplies for Brazil from the countries located outside the Persian Gulf area, and thus less subject to political turbulence likely to affect the normal oil-supply flow to their countries abroad.

New Proposals

BRASPETRO has submitted a proposal to the government of the People's Republic of China concerning the exploration of areas located in sedimentary basins on land. In China, the PETROBRAS subsidiary undertook a seismic survey of exploratory blocks located on the continental shelf to the north of the Yellow Sea, and is expected to submit the results of its first assessment of the potential of the area in November.

Another proposal was presented to the government of Trinidad and Tobago, offering technical aid in the exploration work. Areas located in the land basins of Abu Dhabi and Indonesia have also aroused the interest of PETROBRAS, which is now awaiting responses to the proposals already submitted to the governments of those two countries. Vice President Joel Mendes Renno said that "if it cannot enter all of these areas alone, BRASPETRO will participate in a group," as is the case in connection with maritime prospecting in China.

He announced further that the enterprise is awaiting results of tests at the pilot well it drilled in the land area of Guatemala, jointly with ELF [Gasoline and Lubricants Company of France] Aquitaine and Hispanoil, which companies are partners in risk contracts in Brazil.

Interest in China

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 18 Oct 80 p 22

[Text] Rio de Janeiro--BRASPETRO wants to participate in exploring for oil in the sedimentary land basins in the People's Republic of China, which have a potential, according to estimates by international experts, of about 50 billion barrels, the equivalent of 50 times the current volume of Brazilian reserves.

Conditions for the submission of a proposal are being analyzed by the officers of BRASPETRO, as a result of the trip the vice president of the enterprise, Joel Mendes Renno, made to China, where he held meetings with the officers of the China National Oil and Gas Exploration and Development Company, in charge of all the oil exploration and production activities.

Currently, China is producing 2.2 million barrels of oil per day, exclusively from its land basins. However, the Chinese government is interested in increasing this volume substantially, above all to meet the needs deriving from the economic growth of the country and also to bring in foreign exchange from exports of the product. China is exporting about 18,000 barrels of oil per day to Brazil, according to a supply contract which was recently renewed for the year 1981.

Renno, vice president of BRASPETRO, stressed the importance of the affiliation of this PETROBRAS subsidiary with countries, like China, which need technical aid from companies with experience in exploring for oil. He feels that to the extent that BRASPETRO increases its role in that activity on Chinese territory, the conditions enabling China to increase its supplies of oil to Brazil as well will be eased, thus contributing, although on a small scale, to the diversification of our country's foreign sources of supply.

Competition

Early in November the BRASPETRO report on the seismic survey made by ELF-Aquitaine in an oil exploration block located to the north of the Yellow Sea on the continental shelf of the People's Republic of China should be completed.

This analysis will be checked against other works interpreting the seismic phenomena in the area made by various foreign oil companies. "The project which seems best suited for recommending drilling in the maritime block will be chosen." The vice president of PETROBRAS explained that, in accordance with its risk contract policy, the competitive technical projects system is the norm followed by China National Oil.

BRASPETRO is investing about $5 million in this seismic interpretation project. There is another block in the Yellow Sea the seismic survey of which is also being undertaken by BRASPETRO. It should be completed early in 1981. Similar provisions are being adopted with regard to five other blocks located in the South China Sea.

Risk Contract

The trust made up of the Hispanoil, Huddy Oil and Deminex enterprises will undertake exploration for oil in a block 2,500 square kilometers in area located about 150 kilometers to the northwest of Sao Luis do Maranhao.

A risk contract to this effect was signed by PETROBRAS yesterday, being the sixth in a series for prospecting off the coast of Maranhao.

CONSUMPTION, PRODUCTION DATA ON PETROLEUM, OTHER FUELS REPORTED

No Gas Rationing

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 15 Oct 80 p 24

[Text] Rio de Janeiro--The possibility of rationing of gasoline and other fuels has been "entirely set aside," Minister of Mines and Energy Cesar Cals said yesterday, justifying his optimism on the basis of the most recent import contract signed by PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation], which will guarantee a supply of 200,000 barrels per day to compensate for the suspension of Iranian oil deliveries.

Cals also said that negotiations in progress may increase the supply of oil from Venezuela from 60,000 to 100,000 barrels per day before the end of the year, in exchange for 200,000 tons of Brazilian sugar. He also stressed the gradual reduction of Brazil's dependence on oil imports from the Middle East, which came to 80 percent at the beginning of the Figueiredo government, and which may be down to only 40 percent by next year, as a result of the increase in purchases from other areas.

The minister met yesterday afternoon with the PETROBRAS board of directors and earlier, in the morning, he met with leaders of diesel engine manufacturing enterprises, who indicated interest in gaining access to experiments pursued by research centers on the use of vegetable oil in a mixture with diesel fuel. At PETROBRAS, Cals ascertained that the provisional Garoupa production system in the Campos Basin, which produced 39,000 barrels of oil per day, will be reactivated in January, making it possible to increase domestic production to 230,000 barrels per day.

Goal

The oil import goal for 1981 will be 800,000 barrels per day at a maximum, Minister Cals said. He stressed that it is quite probable the goal will be achieved, above all because oil consumption thus far this year has revealed practically zero growth, while domestic production has been increasing.

To illustrate the achievement of the goal of reducing dependence on imported oil supplies, the minister of mines and energy recalled that when the Figueiredo government took office, the country was importing about a million barrels of oil per day, and consumption was increasing at a rate of about 9 percent per year. Now, in addition to the zero increase in domestic fuel consumption, imports are down to less than 900,000 barrels of oil per day.

According to Minister Cals, it will not be necessary to return to the volume of 400,000 barrels of oil per day which were being imported from Iraq. Of this total, the country will now need only 200,000 barrels, which have already been negotiated with various countries for supplies until the end of the year, and which will make up the quota of 800,000 barrels the country plans to import in 1981 to supplement domestic production.

Domestic Production Increasing

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 16 Oct 80 p 22

[Text] PETROBRAS announced yesterday that domestic oil production increased by 14.15 percent between January and September of this year in comparison to the same period in 1979.

Production reached 52 million barrels, with a daily average of 192,000, falling below the 200,000-barrel-per-day level due to the accident which occurred with the Garoupa provisional system, which had been producing 39,000 barrels per day.

The greater part of the production came from land-based wells--30.5 million barrels as compared to 21.5 million from maritime wells. The main producer continues to be Bahia, which produced 20.7 million barrels from land wells and 2.6 million barrels offshore. The state of Sergipe ranks second with much lower production--7.8 million barrels from land wells and 4.9 million offshore. The state of Rio de Janeiro, which has only maritime wells, produced 8.8 million barrels during this period.

Maritime oil production was up 50.25 percent over the production for the same period (January-September) last year. On the contrary, production from land wells dropped by 2.3 percent. This was due basically to the exhaustion of some wells in the Bahia Basin.

According to PETROBRAS estimates, daily production should increase to an average of 210,000 barrels per day as of the end of December, when the Garoupa provisional system is in full operation again.

Garoupa to Function by January

[Text] Minister of Mines and Energy Cesar Cals met with the president and other officials of PETROBRAS yesterday to discuss the repair of the Garoupa provisional system, which suffered an accident a little more than a month ago which shut down its production of 39,000 barrels of oil per day. PETROBRAS promised the minister the system will be in operation by the end of December or, at the latest, the beginning of January.

According to representatives of the enterprise, with the resumption of operations at Garoupa and the additional oil purchase agreements being negotiated with the Venezuelan government, the effects of the war between Iran and Iraq should be substantially reduced, since the consumption of oil from strategic reserves will drop below 50 percent.

Merger

The minister also agreed with PETROBRAS that the enterprises affiliated with PETROFERTIL for the production of phosphate products, Valefertil, Valep and Fosfertil, will be merged in a single enterprise which will have its administrative and financial headquarters in Uberaba, Minas Gerais.

Valefertil is located in Uberaba, Valep in Rio de Janeiro, and Fosfertil in Patos de Minas.

Diesel Fuel Consumption

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 15 Oct 80 p 19

[Text] Diesel oil consumption was up 14.3 percent in the month of September in comparison to the same month the preceding year. Consumption came to 1.7 billion liters. Consumption between January and February totaled 13.8 billion liters, showing an increase of 8.7 percent in comparison to consumption in the same period of 1979.

According to PETROBRAS reports, domestic consumption of oil products showed an increase of 2.1 percent in the month of September of this year in comparison to the same month last year, and an increase of 3.4 percent over the preceding month (August).

Consumption

The product showing the greatest increase in consumption from January to September was airplane fuel, with an increase of 13.8 percent over last year. Petroleum gas ranked second, with an increase in consumption of about 12.9 percent, followed by diesel oil, with an increase in consumption of 8.7 percent over January-September 1979.

Of the products showing a decrease in consumption, ordinary gasoline was notable with a reduction of 14 percent in comparison to January-September 1979. Gasoline and alcohol fuel showed a decline of 10.1 percent in consumption and the various types of fuel oils showed a decline of 4.8 percent.

In the past 12 months, diesel oil accounted for 28.3 percent of the overall oil consumption, fuel 27.6 percent, and ordinary gasoline, 11.1 percent. GLP [liquefied petroleum gas] accounted for 7.6 percent of each barrel consumed.

Exports

Although the country is a heavy oil importer, exports between January and July included 1.5 million barrels of gasoline, 1.2 million barrels of aviation fuel, 1.8 million barrels of diesel oil and 2.9 million barrels of fuel oil.

In the month of August, PETROBRAS exported 132,000 barrels of gasoline, 484,000 barrels of aviation fuel, 264,000 barrels of diesel oil and 780,000 barrels of fuel oil.

Oil Consumption Down

Sao Paulo FOLHA DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 17 Oct 80 p 13

[Text] Brasilia--Oil consumption in the country (both imported and domestic) has dropped from 1.13 million barrels per day at the time the Figueiredo government took office to 928,000 barrels per day at present, representing a decline of 21 percent. As domestic production comes to about 173,000 barrels per day, consumption of imported oil also declined, from 960,000 barrels per day last year to 750,000 barrels per day, a drop of 26 percent.

This information was provided yesterday by Minister of Mines and Energy Cesar Cals, in a statement made at a joint meeting of the economic and mines and energy committees of the Senate on the oil supply situation in the country with regard to the conflict between Iraq and Iran. The minister said that the decline in consumption was a result of the rationalization measures adopted.
Senator Roberto Saturnino disagreed with this statement, since in his view, "the maintenance of stocks at high levels and the drop in consumption were the results of a policy of raising the prices of the products, with effects on inflationary indices, rather than the rationalization measures."

In the view of Roberto Saturnino, "if these rationalization measures are important, they should have been adopted 4 or 5 years ago. If they are not, then the nation is being deceived." According to Saturnino, there has been "an irresponsible energy policy for 5 years."

Cesar Cals answered that as oil was cheap, the entire Brazilian economy was structured on the basis of this product, to the neglect of others. He added further that the 1973 crisis affected all countries and that, when the Figueiredo government took office, "we were aware that hydroelectric power did not have unlimited horizons and that we were not justified in thinking of self-sufficiency in oil, as had been thought during the government of President Geisel."

Concerning the present situation resulting from the conflict between Iraq and Iran, Cals said that the actual oil deficit comes to 200,000 barrels per day, since there has already been a reduction in consumption of about that same amount, equivalent to $2.5 million U.S. According to Cals, the new contracts which have now been signed with Ecuador, Indonesia, Gabon, Saudi Arabia, Angola, Russia and Peru practically guarantee the 200,000 barrels which Iraq has ceased to export, for which reason the domestic stocks of oil remain stable at the levels existing prior to the war.

Agreement with Venezuela

With the import of another 35,000 barrels per day from Venezuela--which added to the present 53,000 barrels makes a total of 88,000 barrels of oil--PETROBRAS has practically achieved the level set by the government to cover the deficit created by the cutoff of Iraqi supply, with the replacement of 198,800 barrels per day until the end of the year achieved.

Shigeaki Ueki, the president of PETROBRAS, said on his return from Caracas that the state is paying an average price of $31.60 per imported barrel, on the basis of the new contracts.

Beginning on 1 January, Venezuela will increase its supplies to 100,000 barrels per day, according to the agreement signed in Caracas. As a counterpart, Brazil is to supply that country with 200,000 tons of sugar, under better conditions than those prevailing on the international market, the Venezuelan minister of energy, Humberto Calderon Berti, announced in Caracas yesterday. He also added that his country is interested in the delivery of 380,000 tons of Brazilian soybeans, in which connection a negotiation is to be completed in the next few days.

Price Increase

Abu Dhabi, from which PETROBRAS imports 20,000 barrels per day, increased its price per barrel of oil by $2 yesterday. The price charged by that emirate now stands at $34 U.S. U.S. oil market analysts are fearful that the decision in Abu Dhabi may be the first indication of a new round of price increases by the OPEC, if that cartel decides to exploit the deficit of 3.5 million barrels per day in world exports resulting from the war between Iraq and Iran.

Reserves for 100 Days

[Text] The president of PETROBRAS, Shigeaki Ueki, said yesterday that strategic oil reserves in the country are still more than sufficient for 100 days. He also said that to date the reserves on land (excluding those in tanker vessels) have not been reduced, and that this will only begin next week.

"The war between Iran and Iraq began about 25 days ago, and this is the time it takes for a trip from the Middle East to Brazil. Therefore, to date vessels bringing oil from Iraq have been continuing to arrive."

Ueki said that oil imports this year should fall below $10 billion U.S., whereas the initial estimate of the government was $12 billion.

The president of PETROBRAS returned from Venezuela yesterday, where he completed negotiations increasing oil import quotas from 53,000 to 88,000 barrels per day beginning on 1 October (retroactive effect) and to 100,000 barrels beginning on 1 January. He announced that the average price to be paid for the product will be $31.60 U.S. Next month, Ueki is to return to Venezuela to negotiate the purchase of fuel oil, which he says is being sold at lower prices than crude oil.

Stocks

Ueki admitted that there will be a small reduction in the oil stocks in the country by the end of the year, but "this reduction will depend on the level of consumption of oil products until the year's end." He noted that PETROBRAS succeeded in reaching the supplementary import level of 200,000 barrels per day established by the National Energy Council to compensate for a part of the 400,000 barrels Iraq would supply. He said that this supplement and the more effective reduction in the consumption level are the factors allowing the stocks to be maintained at acceptable levels.

Concerning a report that authorities in Iran say that country is still in a position today to sell oil, the president of PETROBRAS said the following:

"Buying from Iran today is not a very easy decision because of the war. It involves a large risk for an enterprise. In addition to this, ships' commanders are not very happy about navigating in the Persian Gulf, and in view of the risks, they refuse to dock at ports in Iran or Iraq."

He made it clear that were it not for the war, there is no reason PETROBRAS would not buy oil from Iran.

The president of PETROBRAS expressed his concern about the consumption levels for diesel oil and cooking gas, for which reason he has decided that the enterprise will launch a campaign throughout the country, beginning next Saturday, to educate users concerning the rational use of these products.

Concerning the possibility of rationing, Ueki was categorical:

"I am not in a position to say that such a measure is 100 percent impossible, but it is however a very remote hypothesis."

He said that the average daily imports of oil this month will be 800,000 barrels, with a drop to 700,000 in the last 2 months of the year expected. Beginning in January, on the recommendation of the federal government, the imports will go to about 800,000 barrels per day.

Idle Refining Capacity

[Excerpt] Curitiba--"Brazil has an idle oil refining capacity estimated at 300,000 barrels per day. It could perfectly well use this potential, refining oil for other countries, including Iraq," the president of the National Petroleum Council (CNP), Gen Oziel de Almeida, said yesterday. He said that this alternative has not yet been formally discussed, but this may happen if the conflict in the Middle East continues.

"The low price of oil enslaved humanity, and we do not have alternative sources to replace it. Although the price of oil has gone up 12 times since 1973, it continues to be the cheapest and most widely used energy source. Therefore we must prepare to live with shortage, with difficulty in obtaining it, and with ever-higher costs for oil," the president of the CNP said. He does not believe in the development of an alternative energy source in the next 10 or 15 years.

PETROBRAS Profits

[Text] Rio de Janeiro--The net profit of PETROBRAS between January and September came to 23.8 billion cruzeiros, as compared to 13 billion for the same period last year. This result provided stockholders in the state enterprise with earnings of 63 centavos per share.

On announcing the financial results for the period ending last 30 September yesterday, PETROBRAS revealed that a profit on sales of 5.6 percent was earned and that the value of the shares reached 7.71 cruzeiros.

The investments in the first 9 months of this year totaled 69.054 billion cruzeiros, 110.6 percent more than those made in the comparable period in 1979 (32.7 billion cruzeiros). Exploration and production development activities absorbed 42.5 billion cruzieros, showing an increase of 137.1 percent over the amount for the same period the preceding year, when the total was 17.9 billion cruzeiros.

Gross invoices were up 160.8 percent, bringing an income of 584.5 billion cruzeiros, as compared to 224.1 billion from January to September of 1979. With sales costs deducted, net invoicing came to 429.4 billion cruzeiros, showing an increase of 200.2 percent.

The net assets of PETROBRAS, totaling 290.7 billion cruzeiros, included the asset equivalents of the financial investment in subsidiaries and affiliates (14.3 billion cruzeiros), including the profit obtained from negotiations with Iraq concerning the Majnoon and Nahr Umr oil fields. In its financial statement, PETROBRAS took into account the effects of Decree Law 1807, calling for a provision fund for prospecting and oil production expenditures in the country in the amount of 98.7 billion cruzeiros. An amount of 14.4 billion cruzeiros was amortized against this fund for expenditures made in the period from June to September.

PROSPECTIVE USES OF ALCOHOL PRODUCTION DISCUSSED

Rio de Janeiro MANCHETE in Portuguese 25 Oct 80 pp 106-112

[Article by Salomao Schvartzman and Mascarenhas de Quiroz: "Alcohol, the Real Brazilian Miracle"]

[Text] If alcohol offered a solution prior to the war between Iraq and Iran, it can be said now that it is essential to Brazil as a substitute for oil products. The history of revolutionary assemblies in all eras shows that fanatics have not yet discovered a means of persuasion other than the systematic slaughter of their adversaries. Far from the theater of war, but already feeling the effects of the oil blackmail, Brazil is imposing a price policy, in the very short run, with the consecutive increases in gas prices, as the most efficient means of dealing with the energy crisis. This makes the statement by Shigeaki Ueki, former minister of mines and energy, to the effect that "the patriotism of the Brazilian citizen is only aroused when his pocketbook is affected" even more understandable. But it is in the PROALCOOL [National Alcohol Program] that the medium-range solution lies, and on this there can be no doubt: the response of Brazil to the war is so speedy as to surprise many disbelievers.

The war between the peoples of Iraq and Iran will hasten the implementation of PROALCOOL, and certainly the goal of producing 10.7 billion liters in 1985 will be surpassed. Exports of alcohol, which were given further impetus recently, will be shelved until the certainty exists that the domestic supply is guaranteed. The use of alcohol as a fuel for operating automobiles is beginning to be questioned. These, in synthesis, are the immediate consequences of a war which took everyone in general, and the Brazilian government in particular, by surprise, leading it to believe that it is not very safe now to depend on a few suppliers of oil, characterized in addition by fanatic or orthodox feelings, which make agreements fragile and dangerous. In the view of Voltaire, fanaticism is to superstition what delirium is to fever, and rabies to cholera.

If on the one hand the additional cost of this war will lead to a greater and more profound lack of stability in the national economy, it may on the other confirm that, in relation to the other nations, developed or developing, Brazil is the country which now has the best alternative--alcohol. And the Latin American nations which, like Brazil, have fertile land, sun enough and areas for planting are persuaded of this. Their interest in alcohol will certainly provide good prospects for Brazilian producers, who already have advanced technology and an industrial capacity in a position to plan and built distillery equipment. The national automotive industry, which pioneered the development of alcohol engines, can now glimpse a promising market in the coming years. These are the consequences of the war in the Orient from a positive point of view. The final results of this conflict will depend on its length and extent. But if it is a fact that Brazil will have difficulties in overcoming the obstacles in the short run, its prospects in the medium and longer range are excellent.

The Brazilian authorities know this, for which reason, even to the surprise of some, Brazilian alcohol already constitutes the answer to the war.

"In one way or another, these restrictions (imposed by the oil crisis) affect society as a whole. They determine market prices. They reduce the purchasing power of the public. They limit the efforts of the nations to create wealth. It is to overcome these hindrances that Brazilians have decided to face up to the question of developing alternative sources. We have to our credit notable practical achievements. Visible, but not the only, results are seen in the use of alcohol made from sugarcane as a fuel for automotive vehicles" (President Joao Figueiredo).

In the automobile industry, no one any longer doubts that gasoline-fueled vehicles will be outmoded by the end of the decade. The Ministry of Industry and Commerce asserts that by 1985, PROALCOOL will be able to supply the market with 10.7 billion liters, and some businessmen believe that this goal should be revised up to 14 billion liters (the war between Iraq and Iran, threatening the West's supply of oil, may speed up the alcohol program and the 14 billion liters initially planned for 1987 may be available 2 years earlier).

A total of 298 distillery projects in operation or in the construction phase, with a capacity of supplying 5.7 billion liters per year, have been approved. Before PROALCOOL was established, the distilleries, which have existed for 5 years now, produced a billion liters annually. The program calls for new investments in production in 1981 of about 55 billion cruzeiros.

The choice of alchol is irreversible. Without it, Brazil would reach the end of the decade with consumption totaling triple the oil products it is using currently, committing half of its gross national product to foreign indebtedness. By 1990, according to calculations in business circles, the country can produce 80 billion liters of alcohol, replacing all of the gasoline and diesel oil consumed today--about 30 billion liters. Minister of Agriculture Amaury Stabile noted recently, however, that the replacement of diesel fuel still remains to be worked out and that the replacement of fuel oil in industry is still minor and out of step with the advance in the gasoline substitution sector.

Thus, according to the minister, "it is evident that even assuming the adequate development of exports, the demand oil imports make on our import capacity make the country extremely vulnerable in the final analysis to inflationary pressures of external origin. This situation, beyond our national control, will continue to create a permanent imbalance, being reflected in the foreign indebtedness, which has today reached a figure in excess of $50 billion U.S."

But there are other situations and responsibilities resulting from Brazil's pioneering role which require acknowledgement.

"Brazil is the leading country in the world in studies of the alternative energy sources for the cycle which will follow that of oil, and it has an additional responsibility in addition to meeting its own needs: to export technology from the area to other countries, mainly the non-industrialized countries in the Third World."

This assessment, made by engineer Eric Zausner, former undersecretary of energy in the Gerald Ford government, who recently visited Brazil, was supplemented by a comment which is extremely pertinent: alcohol will provide our country with the calm to make use of oil with the economy and moderation required by its high price. It will not be possible, in a wave of a magic wand, to replace fuel oil and diesel fuel, but there will be time to find Brazilian oil and to make the utilization of schist viable.

Thus we have predictions, expectations and fears on the part of all those involved in the great alcohol program, which depends on some basic provisions to strengthen the hopes placed in it.

Between the government provisions and the desires of the businessmen, however, lies the capacity of the country to establish an adequate infrastructure for developing new cane-growing zones and producing alcohol on a large scale, without threatening the production of foodstuffs for the domestic market. In this regard, Amaury Stabile warns that "what is expected of agriculture today and more particularly in the future is much more than the production of foodstuffs, industrial materials and foreign exchange. To it falls the basic role of constituting the active factor in creating jobs and income compatible with the government's goals of establishing equilibrium in the foreign payments balance and redistributing income in order to consolidate society."

The opening of new agricultural frontiers will be the first natural consequence of PROALCOOL. The trend is toward the extraction of 3 to 5,000 liters of alcohol per hectare. And there is no shortage of new frontiers with land suitable for cane cultivation. In the Sao Francisco River valley alone there are 4 million idle hectares, with a temperature range of between 18 and 32° and about 3,000 hours of sunshine per year.

The idea of the secretary of agriculture of Sao Paulo, Guilherme Afif Domingos, that a part of the pastureland currently occupied by cattle should be devoted to sugarcane may not even be enough. Some businessmen calculate that in order for PROALCOOL to play its role, 4.5 billion liters more than Sao Paulo is already producing will be needed by 1985--and this volume can be achieved by the planting of sugarcane on an additional 1.3 million hectares. Such expansion, they say, will not affect Sao Paulo's production of foodstuffs. This growth would be equivalent to 5 percent of the whole of the territory of the state, the area in pastureland and minor crops being 12.6 percent, or 8.2 percent of the best-quality land.

And the entire stunted woodland region in central Brazil is still available for sugarcane. Condemned in the past, this type of soil has been disproving preconceptions and demonstrating its viability for intensive agriculture, and even for sugarcane. Even in the eastern and northern parts of Sao Paulo, sugarcane cultivation is developing in the stunted woodlands prevailing in that area.

According to the minister of agriculture, in view of the expansion of the frontier seen in the past 10 years of about 4 percent per year, it can be seen that there has been an annual expansion of 1.5 million hectares. In order to plant 2 million hectares of sugarcane, "we would need an increase of 400,000 hectares per year, the equivalent of 30 percent of the average annual rate of expansion for the agricultural frontier."

Another medium-range consequence it is hoped PROALCOOL will have is the effective settlement of the interior and the establishment of communities in this region, which will at the same time halt the exodus toward the urban centers and the saturation of the labor market in the metropolitan regions.

Today, sugarcane cultivation accounts for about 700,000 direct jobs and 300,000 indirect ones--a dependent population estimated at about 5 million persons. If the estimates for 1990 are borne out (production of 80 billion liters of alcohol), there will be 4.5 million direct jobs, 1.8 million indirect ones, and 6.4 million dependent persons involved.

At the end of the last harvest, the farmworker was earning about 250 to 300 cruzeiros per day in more than half of the planted areas of the country, where medical aid and schools are available. PROALCOOL, implemented on a business level, must inevitably improve this situation and resolve a part of another serious social problem: the brown-bagger, the itinerant worker without social security, whose situation should be regularized. With irrigation, such workers, now unemployed between harvests, will be guaranteed at least 10 continuous months of work (between the harvest and milling). With more than a month of vacation, their employment will be systematized.

In the course of this process of interior settlement, the national industries serving and equipping the sector will be strengthened--practically 100-percent Brazilian technology for cultivation, harvest, industrial processing of raw material, storage, distribution, transportation and commerce.

This support will attract the banking network, providing credit opportunities for the productive areas, encouraging trade, expanding public income and strengthening the municipalities.

Another factor facilitating the rapid expansion of PROALCOOL is the fact that it has already been debureaucratized in order to advance financing projects limited to 160 days at a maximum, from the norm establishment analysis to economic viability.

The cost of the agricultural stage of the project has 100-percent financing, with fixed charges of 10 to 15 percent, varying according to the size of the undertaking. For the industrial phase, the financing conditions are based on 80 to 90 percent fixed investments, with 12 years' amortization and a 3-year grace period, financial charges of 2 to 6 percent per year, plus a 40-percent annual variation for the ORTNs.

Parallel with this, PROALCOOL is making it possible for the ministries of industry and commerce, transportation and mines and energy and business organizations such as the National Association of Automotive Vehicle Manufacturers and the Distillers' Association to reach an agreement promoting the delivery of 250,000 additional alcohol-fueled vehicles in 1981 and 350,000 in 1982, apart from the other 281,000 currently operating on gasoline, which will have converted engines.

"Brazilinvest proposes a solution to resolve the difficulties created by the National Alcohol Program, through the building and development of alcohol centers with the capacity to produce 200 million liters per year and the potential for doubling that production. Each center will include 10 autonomous distilleries and will account for the equivalent of an oil well yielding 1,045,000 barrels per year."

In the view of Mario Garnero, president of Brazilinvest, the organizational concept, which "has already been approved by the Brazilian government," calls for the concentration of business groups at the centers, where each will own an autonomous distillery producing 120,000 liters per day (equivalent to an oil well yielding 104,500 barrels per year), with production scheduled to begin within 30 months.

"The Brazilinvest energy center," he stresses, "is a developing concept. The first center to be established will have sugarcane as its raw material. This will be followed by others, using ethanol, and then, who knows, cassava, quince, African oil and other palm materials."

Pointing to the state of Bahia as a certain choice for the development of energy poles, Mario Garnero described to the businessmen another pertinent factor in their participation in the plan: the interest shown by local governments, which will certainly contribute to the success of the undertaking by granting incentives.

"Support on the state and municipal levels will be more difficult to obtain if applications are made for isolated projects, the socioeconomic benefits to the region of which would be lesser."

About 80 percent of the productive capacity of Brazilian sugar mills is provided by equipment manufactured by Dedini, a powerful industrial complex which is now expanding into the metallurgical, petrochemical, chemical, paper and cellulose, mining and cement sectors as well.

Today the name Dedini stands for 19 constantly-expanding enterprises, operated by 9,251 persons and invoicing net sales of $259.8 million U.S. (1979 figures).

The National Alcohol Program thus depends in large part on the experience acquired by this organization, founded in 1920, when two brothers, Armando and Mario Dedini, established a small mechanical and carpentry workshop in Piracicaba in the state of Sao Paulo. Dedini Workshops, as the firm was then known, manufactured and repaired small mills, boilers and other equipment used in the plants and distilleries of Sao Paulo, whose increasing production was beginning to vie with the productive regions in the Center and Northeast of the country.

Sugarcane growing, an important factor in the Brazilian economy, then sought within our own frontiers the means to industrially process its production.

It was thanks to the will and the energetic spirit of Mario Dedini (his brother died in 1931) and his team of collaborators that Dedini Workshops became a group whose industrial and technological capacity proved equal to the manufacture of the machinery and equipment which played a decisive role in the development of the sugar and alcohol-producing industries in the country. And, today as yesterday, the certainty of the efficiency and durability of this equipment continues, providing a foundation for the new alcohol era into which Brazil has passed.

Even those who have always been skeptical about the national projects agree today that, except for the hindrances already known and certain to be overcome, the National Alcohol Program should achieve its goals "and even surpass them," in the opinion of the most optimistic. It is this certainty which justified discussion of a new theme: to what point is it of interest to the country to export alcohol produced domestically, in areas not in conflict with the PROALCOOL plans, using foreign capital?

It was without a doubt Minister of Mines and Energy Cesar Cals who provoked the discussion when he made certain estimates and concluded that the addition of 20 percent alcohol to the gasoline consumed in the United States would provide a possible market of 1.4 million barrels per day. He linked these prospects with the interest already shown to the government by foreign investors, who suggested the investment of several million dollars in Brazil for the production of alcohol for export. The idea of Minister Cesar Cals--and it is still just an idea, although it has been analyzed in detail by the government--calls for the creation of binational enterprises, with grants of land for limited periods for the production of alcohol in areas where no conflict would occur with those used for the production of alcohol for domestic consumption.

"The future acceptance of foreign investment proposals in the sector should however be preceded by the establishment of the strategic political conditions which would guarantee, above all, non-interference with the activities and goals of PROALCOOL, which has absolute priority," Minister Delfim Netto said in a document sent to Cesar Cals.

The export of alcohol, Delfim Netto recognizes, although it would not reduce Brazilian dependence on imported fuels, "would lead to generating resources in strong currency which could be used in the purchase of oil and oil products."

The positive aspect of foreign capital investment in alcohol production for export, according to Delfim Netto, includes the creation of jobs in the rural sector, the retention of manpower in the rural sector and an increase in rural income, thus decreasing the increasing population pressure in the large urban centers.

In addition to this, the domestic capital goods industry would be able to raise its employment level and a strong international alcohol market could be developed as an alternative source of fuel. This would open up new prospects for the Brazilian automobile industry, which pioneered the production of alcohol-burning engines.

However, Delfim Netto does not minimize his reservations. According to him there should be "a clear" separation between PROALCOOL and the programs for export, with different norms applicable in each case. The production of alcohol for export must not interfere under any circumstances with the efforts made to achieve the PROALCOOL goals, and in the settlement of new lands, the priority of projects designed to ensure domestic self-sufficiency in the production of foodstuffs must be taken into account. The choice of areas for the production of raw material for alcohol manufacture for export, Delfim explains, must involve geographic distance from the areas allocated to PROALCOOL. The minister of planning further stresses that the government should define a complex of norms making foreign investment attractive. And he warns that the government must guarantee that a substantial part of the production will be destined for export, with the Brazilian government reserving the right to retain the remainder to supplement domestic supply, when it deems this necessary.

Businessman and lawyer Aldo Raia, director of the State of Sao Paulo Industries Center, is one of the individuals most enthusiastic about the possibility that foreign capital can "contribute to the reversal by Brazil of its role on the international scene such as to begin exporting fuel." To imagine that Brazil could do without foreign capital, in the view of Aldo Raia, is "pure utopianism," since in his view "the country is faced with a great challenge for the future and Brazil seems to be in a hurry to achieve economic and social development more rapidly." This, in the view of this businessman, demands a great leap, which would be difficult to achieve without the contribution of foreign savings. Foreign capital should cease to be viewed as "a dangerous lion," according to Aldo Raia. In his view, with PROALCOOL consolidated, Brazil can, with foreign resources, launch a bold export project. "I see no reason to waste time discussing the viability of a foreign capital contribution to the Brazilian economy. In addition to the capital invested on a risk basis in the major export projects, Brazil can certainly manage to bring in strong currency resources with foreign sales of alcohol. The repercussions of these binational projects on the domestic equipment industry, the automobile industry and the settlement of manpower seem obvious," he concludes.

Despite his conviction that "the existing fear of foreign capital is unjustified," Aldo Raia believes that Brazil is in a position clearly to establish the rules of the game it wants to play. It can choose among those with capital wishing to invest capital in Brazil in the alcohol export projects, it can direct them toward the purchase of domestic equipment, and it can even provide incentives, through credit and fiscal mechanisms, for example, for the reinvestment of their profits in the country again, this businessman says. In the view of Aldo Raia, however, we should not "expect charity from foreign capital," because, he adds, the government should establish the rules and prior to this, consider the position of the investor, such as to avoid asking for what it is known will not be given. The balance between national interests and those of foreign capital investors "can be achieved, with good sense on both sides."

Aldo Raia believes that instead of waiting for applications from Brazilian investors, the government should immediately initiate studies on the special alcohol-for-export projects. "With this done and the areas and the rules of the game defined, and the separate and priority nature of PROALCOOL guaranteed, the country should set out to sell its product. It should put it on the market and offer the opportunity to produce alcohol in Brazil for export to anyone interested. With its technology, manpower, equipment and mainly its good land, Brazilians need have no fear for their security or their national interests. What the country must not do is wait for time to reverse its status as a fuel importer. It must seek the opportunity to reverse it safely."

EL CERREJON COAL DEVELOPMENT PROJECT DISCUSSED

Government: No Contract Renegotiation

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 16 Oct 80 pp 1-A, 9-A

[Article by Jaime Horta]

[Text] The government declared last night that it does not consider it necessary to renegotiate the El Cerrejon contract, noting, however, that "it is open to improvement."

Finance Minister Jaime Garcia Parra stated emphatically that there was no indiscretion in the signing of the contract between CARBOCOL [Colombian Coal Company, Inc] and Intercor, an Exxon affiliate, for the development of part of the El Cerrejon coal deposit on the La Guajira Peninsula.

Garcia Parra, who began the government's side of the argument on the controversial contract, spoke after Senators Guillermo Gaviria Echeverry, Luis Carlos Galan Sarmiento and Enrique Pardo Parra.

Taking the floor after the finance minister were his colleagues at Development and Mines, Andres Restrepo Londono and Humberto Avila Mora, who also defended the contract signed with Intercor.

Garcia made the following categorical assertions, among others:

--The government received no better proposal than the one submitted by Intercor;

--At no time was an initial development of 5 million tons agreed upon, as the senators sponsoring the debate indicated;

--The government was not indiscreet; "it was, rather, careful and foresighted";

--It is irresponsible to assert that the government handed our coal over to a single company;

--The Carbocol-Intercor contract is excellent and represents a guarantee for Colombia.

The finance minister indicated that a slipup in mechanics occurred only in transferring the deposit from ECOPETROL [Colombian Petroleum Enterprise] to CARBOCOL, although both are state-run enterprises and there was nothing illegal involved.

Garcia Parra said that the government abided by the law at all times in negotiating the El Cerrejon contract.

He underscored that it was a good thing for Colombia that the contract was signed with the largest company in the world (Exxon) because the government is thus guaranteed compliance and good marketing.

"The marketing angle is nothing to sneeze at either," Garcia Parra stated to point out that it is important that the other party have assets to lose in this country and abroad.

Best Proposal

Garcia Parra emphasized that the Intercor offer was the best that the government received and stressed that no equal or more advantageous one was submitted.

He said that Intercor offered royalties of 15 percent, which were not bettered by any other company, even though French, German and other American companies initially showed interest in the project.

With regard to the negotiating process, he indicated that there was no opposition to the contract on the Council of Ministers and that it was finally approved after the National Social and Economic Policy Council spent two sessions debating it.

"Since then and until now, the country has not had a single offer," the finance minister stressed.

Garcia Parra signed the partnership contract between Carbocol and Intercor in 1976 when he headed up the Mines Ministry under Alfonso Lopez Michelsen's administration.

No Indiscretion

Garcia Parra rejected as irresponsible the assertions that Colombia handed over all of its coal; he was apparently referring to Senator Gaviria Echeverry.

He said that if it had been true that the government was hasty in signing the partnership contract with Intercor, other proposals from interested companies would have come to light.

"If it's that bad, these international companies must be pretty foolish," the minister stressed.

He then pointed out that opponents of the contract wanted to give the impression that Colombia has been left without coal and that it does not even have anything "to light the stove with."

He indicated that the contract provides for the development of only Area B in El Cerrejon and that the government reserved another major section of the deposit for subsequent bargaining after it sees how things are developing.

Separately, Garcia Parra gave his word of honor that no decision was ever made regarding a 5 million ton development, as Senators Gaviria Echeverry and Galan Sarmiento asserted. He indicated that the decision was for 15 million tons, because a smaller volume would not have been feasible.

No Renegotiation

After noting that everything is open to improvement, the minister pointed out that business is not done alone and that the other party must be taken into account.

"As of now, I do not think that the contract has to be renegotiated," the finance minister said.

He said that this would have become obvious earlier, observing then that "it could be open to improvement.

"It's like in marriage; you have to make truces with your wife every day."

Garcia Parra said that we cannot assume that the officials and employees of foreign firms or the Colombians working with them are crooks.

In connection with the El Cerrejon contract, he stated that better terms could exist "but so far no one has offered them."

Terms

The minister gave the following explanation of CARBOCOL's share in output from the El Cerrejon deposit:

--Fifteen percent of the total is taken out as royalties for Colombia;

--Of the remaining 85 percent, half is for CARBOCOL, and half is for Intercor;

--Thus, Colombia's total share is 57.5 percent, and Intercor's 42.5 percent.

With regard to a clause in the contract under which Intercor can have at its disposal Colombia's half share of the coal, the minister explained that Colombia can have Intercor's half at its disposal too.

This is a two-party contract, and both have the possibility of marketing the coal, depending on who gets the better offer.

Development Minister Speaks

Development Minister Andres Restrepo Londono said that the contract with Intercor was one of the best coal development pacts in the world.

Restrepo Londono, who was applauded at the close of his address by most of the senators present at the debate, said that the country has a good contract in its hands, as well as an opportunity that it has never before had on the international scene.

He pointed out that the government took all views into account and denied that it had not listened to the recommendations of the technicians who were involved in drawing up the contract.

He said that it was untrue that Intercor was going to develop the best reserves in El Cerrejon, pointing out that the government reserved another section of the deposit for itself, part of which was forfeited in the wake of Pabody's decision.

He also defended the projects for building a port on Portetes Bay and for constructing the railway.

With regard to the latter, he noted that a decision has not yet been made as to whether it will be diesel or a combined diesel-electric unit. Gaviria Echeverry had criticized a diesel railway.

Restrepo Londono said that so far Colombia has received the following coal purchasing offers: 1.8 million tons from Italy; 2 million tons from Spain; 1 million tons from Sweden and 1 million tons from France, among others.

In conclusion, he called on the Congress to let the country develop its untapped coal and to avoid dealing with partners as thieves.

Mines Minister Supports Contract

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 16 Oct 80 p 9-A [Text] The minister of mines and energy, Humberto Avila Mora, last night defended the contract for the development of El Cerrejon on La Guajira and merely described as "interesting" the objections raised by Senator Luis Carlos Galan Sarmiento to this international pact.

Speaking at the plenary session of Congress, Avila Mora explained the background to the marketing contract signed on 1 September and said that this move "was taken after 3½ years of studies by Intercor," which proved the existence of deposits that could yield marketable amounts of quality coal.

The minister clarified that under the terms of the contract "CARBOCOL must pay to the municipalities and to the department their share of the royalties under Law 61 of 1979...."

With regard to the 3 billion tons in the northern section of El Cerrejon, he said that "the understanding is that 345 million tons are involved in this contract, 155 million of which are for Intercor. This amount may or may not be exported, depending on the country's needs, inasmuch as the government can restrict exports." He noted that each party can directly sell its share of the coal.

With regard to the concerned proposals for amending the contract, which were submitted by Senator Galan, Minister Avila Mora indicated that "some of them are interesting ideas that could apply at some point over the contract's long life."

He added that CARBOCOL would have to pay municipalities and the department their share of the royalities under Law 61 of 1979. These royalties are on total output except for the coal used to generate electric power, to produce synthetic fuels and to replace hydrocarbons, as provided for in the law.

The minister of mines proposed that since Law 61 of 1979 stipulates that the production tax be distributed among the National Coal Fund, the departments and muncipalities, this contract could entail identical obligations and benefit the treasuries of departments and muncipalities by stipulating a comparable distribution of the royalties that Intercor has to pay to the state.

He contended that there was no reason for concern about whether the coal in El Cerrejon can be coked; if this is the case, the country will command the best possible prices, as provided for in the contract.

In conclusion, he said that "fortunately, work began on the contract 4 years ago, and this means in 6 years, and not much more, we can begin developing our coal through this project, by virtue of which Colombia will undoubtedly learn how to harness, sell and process coal in amounts that will represent a definite breakthrough in Colombian mining."

Galan: Price Too Low

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 16 Oct 80 p 9-A

[Text] Senator Luis Carlos Galan Sarmiento stated in the Senate that under the contract with Intercor for the development of coal in El Cerrejon, Colombia would receive just $5 per ton of extracted coal.

Galan Sarmiento, who is promoting wideranging Senate debate on the contract between Intercor and the government for the development and marketing of La Guajira coal, said that it has been proven that the coal there is of the highest quality and that it has major advantages in international competition.

He calculated that Intercor would pay the country royalties of $5.446 billion over the 23 years of the project. At present day currency values, the country would thus be getting just $0.90 per ton.

"If in addition to the royalties we figure in other revenue for the country (sales and reserves taxes, and profits from investment), Colombia will receive $47.9 billion, which is equivalent to $1.7 billion in constant dollars; this represents the $5 a ton that I mentioned previously," Galan Sarmiento said.

He criticized as incomplete the parallel that Exxon, the parent company of Intercor, has made between its own total earnings and Colombia's total revenue, since "everything boils down to calculating the rate of return on its investment."

He explained that the profit-sharing is an additional alleged royalty and that the table for determining it is confusing, which is why most of the excess profits go to Intercor.

"The logical thing would be to establish that half of the excess profits go to CARBOCOL and the other half to Intercor." Galan said.

He had the following to say about a number of the technical aspects:

1. It has still not been definitely ruled out that the coal in El Cerrejon can be coked. Studies by German technicians in 1957 indicated that it was, and there are positive indications from other tests conducted in the country. Intercor has remained completely silent in this regard. This is fundamental for determining El Cerrejon's true value. If Colombia exports its coking coal as just ordinary coal, it will have sizable losses.

2. Exploration must be done at depths of more than 300 meters to determine the real extent of the reserves.

3. Intercor has reduced the technical information on coal quality to a few superficial statistics. CARBOCOL ought to demand complete reports that would enable it to establish definitively the coking capacity of these deposits.

4. CARBOCOL must urgently monitor the mining system to guarantee that the reserves are protected. If the mining system does not insure the extraction of the lowest strata in the stratigraphic section, there is a danger of losing the coal below the subsurface level.

5. The contract does not guarantee the training of manpower to assimilate coal technology. The problem is all the more serious if we bear in mind that only 10 mining engineers a year graduate from the Sogamoso and Medellin departments of engineering.

PEACE TREATY BETWEEN EL SALVADOR, HONDURAS WELCOMED

Majano Addresses Honduran Reporters

San Salvador LA PRENSA GRAFICA in Spanish 23 Oct 80 p 22

[Text] The best guarantee of the Peace Treaty to be signed with our brother republic of Honduras lies in the hearts and feelings of our peoples, said Col Arnoldo Majano Ramos, member of the Revolutionary Government Junta, yesterday at a reception for the Honduran press at the Hotel Presidente.

When the Armed Forces of our country decided to begin profound changes on 15 October 1979, included was the solution to our problems with neighboring Honduras. The desire to achieve peace with our Honduran brothers, indicated Col Majana, lies in the fact that we are two neighboring countries; we have the same blood. It is difficult to find here in our country a person who has no family ties with our Honduran brothers, stressed the government leader.

"As I said earlier," he stated, "the best guarantee lies in the hearts and feelings of our peoples; proof of that is the interest aroused by the news of the signing of the Peace Treaty. Everyone is asking questions; everyone wants to know the details of the treaty; everyone wants to know when they can go visit relatives in Honduras, when we can visit that country."

Process of Change

Col Majana took this opportunity to inform the Honduran press of the details of the process of change begun by the Junta, especially concerning agrarian reform, the nationalization of banking and foreign trade.

Col Majano stated that the Junta is giving priority to the poor, peasants, workers, and the middle classes, since they have been neglected in the past.

"We are complementing socioeconomic changes with political changes of far-reaching implications, based on absolute respect for ideas. That is important in this process, since we are trying to establish a pluralism of ideas."

Finally, Col Majano wished the entire delegation of Honduran journalists accompanying their country's foreign minister a pleasant stay in our land. "We shall soon meet again in Honduras," he said, which was received with warm applause and cheering by all those present.

Journalists Speak

Among the Salvadorans who spoke at the reception was Sigfrido Munes, secretary of information of the Junta. He was answered by Honduran journalist Herman Allen Padgett.

Visiting journalist Gerardo Alfredo Medrano also addressed the Salvadoran press.

Finally, all present were offered a special banquet at the Telerico facilities, whence they left once again for the Ilopango International Airport to fly home to Honduras.

Bishops Exchange Notes

San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 23 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] Bishops from El Salvador and Honduras will celebrate masses together in Tegucigalpa and San Miguel on days which will be announced with sufficient advance notice, in order to celebrate the conclusion of the Peace Treaty between the two nations, reported Monsignor Marco Rene Revelo yesterday afternoon. The monsignor is a member of the Episcopal Conference of El Salvador (CEDES).

The joint masses, added the prelate, were agreed upon after an exchange of notes between CEDES and the Honduran Episcopal Conference (CEH).

Monsignor Revelo stated that initially Monsignor Pedro Arnoldo Aparicio y Quintanilla, vice president of that episcopal organization, sent a telegram to Monsignor Hector Enrique Santos, president of the CEH. In the note, he said the following: "Excellency: On the eve of the signing of the treaty for the long-awaited peace, the episcopacy, clergy and Catholic population of El Salvador send brotherly greetings, the kiss of peace, to the dear people of Honduras. We feel that the ties of blood and friendship have been strengthened; 11 years of unpleasantness and detrimental interests could not weaken them, but on the contrary reinforced them further, with God's help, to make them unbreakable. The Salvadoran bishops would like to go en masse to the Basilica of Suyapa to celebrate a joint mass to offer thanks, and we invite that episcopacy to hold a mass at the Basilica of the Virgin of Peace in San Miguel. We invite all parishes and clergy of both nations to celebrate the Eucharist to give thanks to God."

For his part, Monsignor Santos responded as follows: "Monsignor Aparicio: Catholic Honduras also sends its warmest greetings to the Catholic hierarchy and people of El Salvador on the occasion of the conclusion of the Peace Treaty. We thank the Divine Savior, the Prince of Peace and His Holy Mother for the brotherly consolidation of both nations. With open hearts and arms, we will welcome our dear brothers to the celebration in Suyapa; we will also accept your kind invitation to San Miguel. We shall set a date. 'Blessed be the builders of Peace, for they shall be called the children of God.' With warmth and affection, Hector Enrique Santos, President, CEH."

STUDY OF NUTRITION IN L.A. UNVEILS 'ALARMING' STATISTICS

Buenos Aires LA OPINION in Spanish 24 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] Rio de Janeiro (EFE)--Nutrition is responsible for 6.4 percent of all deaths in Spanish America, and of that total, more than half are children under 5 years of age.

In spite of the fact that in the 1970's the malnourished children's index dropped in Brazil, Colombia and Venezuela, a visible increase was registered in Chile during recent years.

These are some of the data contained in the report presented by Brazilian specialists Jose Eduardo Dutra de Oliveira, Nelson de Souza, Hector Arteaga Pacheco and Luiz Carlos Giarola, professors from various medical faculties in the state of Sao Paolo, to the Congress on Nutrition in the Western Hemisphere, to be held this month in Los Angeles, United States.

According to Professor Dutra de Oliveira, head of nutrition and director of the School of Medicine in Ribeirao Preto, the greatest food problems on the continent involve calorie, protein, iodine and some vitamin deficiencies. "In some Latin American countries," he emphasized, "between 20 and 30 percent of the children still die before they are 5, chiefly from malnutrition." The specialists expressed their concern over the "alarming" indexes, since according to data compiled in 1976, the population of South America was 224 million inhabitants, representing one of the greatest population growths in the world in a single year.

According to the document, the country showing the greatest increase was Ecuador, with an index of 43 percent, and the smallest increase was in Uruguay, with 12 percent.

In Brazil, whose population is greater than that of all the other nations combined, the increase was 37 percent.

Professor Dutra de Oliveira said that this research is very important, "since nearly 40 percent of the people of Latin America are under 14 years of age." The report also revealed that food production has not kept pace with population growth in many countries of the continent, such as Chile, Peru and Colombia.

However, according to the specialists, "Increased production does not always mean that all the people are receiving good nutrition."

In Brazil, for example, in spite of having substantially increased the production of soybeans, to date little of the cereal is used in nutrition, since more than 60 percent of the harvest is exported.

By comparing the 1960's and 1970's, one can verify that the state of nutrition of children under 5 years of age improved considerably in some countries.

In the 1960's, 37 percent of the child population in Brazil at that nutritional level were normal and nearly 68.3 percent were malnourished.

Later, in the 1970's, the index for "normal" Brazilian children increased to 54 percent and that for undernourished children fell to 46 percent.

In Colombia, the index of malnourished children under 5 years of age decreased from 66.6 percent in the last decade to 62 percent in the present. In Venezuela this same index dropped between the two periods from 55 percent to 48.9 percent.

The "only exception" is Chile, which in the last decade registered a malnutrition index among its child population of 13.4 percent, and this has now increased to 17.8 percent.

"The fact is that we have more children with malnutrition problems in some countries in Latin America at present than in the last decade," Professor Dutra de Oliveira stated.

"Therefore," he concluded, "if we do not adopt urgent measures to solve this problem, we run the risk of seeing a large part of the population suffer from hunger and even die for lack of food in the next decade."

DENIALS, MEETINGS ON PILCOMAYO ISSUE

Unilateral Utilization Denied

PY101836 Buenos Aires TELAM in Spanish 1400 GMT 9 Nov 80

[Text] Buenos Aires, 9 Nov (TELAM)--The Argentine Government has denied the unilateral utilization of the water of the portion of Pilcomayo River it shares with Paraguay, and explained that the geological formation of the area and the sediment carried by the river has caused drainage of water into the territories of both nations.

The following communique has been released by the Foreign Ministry in response to repeated news media reports on an alleged unilateral utilization of the river, reports which have confused the people and helped create false impressions of the manner in which this issue of interest to both countries has been treated:

"In view of repeated news media reports of an alleged unilateral utilization by Argentina of the waters of the portion of the Pilcomayo River which Argentina shares with Paraguay, thus confusing public opinion and giving rise to false impressions of the manner in which this issue of interest to both countries has been treated, the Foreign Ministry states:

"1. That the portion of the Pilcomayo River shared with Paraguay is currently changing course as a result of the very special geological formation of the area and the sediment carried by the river. As a result of this, the waters have drained into Argentine and Paraguayan territories at three different points along the course.

"2. The above-mentioned changes in the natural course of the river--duly checked by the Argentine-Paraguayan joint commission charged with the administration and control of the Pilcomayo River, and also repeatedly checked in the course of several on-site inspections by officials of the two governments--are located 10 and 12 kilometers downstream from Puerto Irigoyen on the Argentine side where water has drained partially into Argentine territory, and 20 kms upstream from the location called Ex-Sombrero Negro, where the course of the river has been diverted entirely into Paraguayan territory.

"3. This situation has been duly studied by the Argentine and Paraguayan Governments and agreement has been reached to implement the appropriate measures designed to dam up the above-mentioned drainage so the waters can return to their normal course as soon as possible.

"4. In connection with the two points of drainage toward Argentine territory, tasks carried out by the national border police and personnel of the provincial government of Formosa with the cooperation and aid of Paraguayan personnel have resulted in one of these points of drainage being dammed up, and the work is practically finished on the other one as well. Permanent exchange of information has been maintained between the two countries on the progress and status of the work.

"5. It is worth pointing out that seeking to attain an effective and equitable utilization of the waters of the Pilcomayo River, the Argentine, Bolivian and Paraguayan Governments are conducting joint studies with the cooperation of the OAS within the framework of a project for multiple utilization of the Pilcomayo River watershed. The positive development of this project evidences the interest which the three countries have in implementing mechanisms aimed at favoring the development of national and regional projects of great significance for the area of influence of this watershed."

Argentine, Paraguayan Officials Meet

PY121807 Buenos Aires NOTICIAS ARGENTINAS in Spanish 1630 GMT 11 Nov 80

[Text] Buenos Aires, 11 Nov (NA)--Officials of the Foreign Ministry expect to hold personal contacts "as soon as possible" with Paraguayan officials to clear up aspects of the utilization of the Pilcomayo River, a border between the two nations, according to a statement made today by a San Martin palace spokesman.

The spokesman was consulted on the contents of a declaration by the Paraguayan Foreign Ministry--published here last night by an international news agency--stating that a letter sent by the Paraguayan Foreign Ministry to the Argentine Government on the Pilcomayo River issue has not been answered.

In this regard, the spokesman stated that "the Foreign Ministry does not respond to journalistic rumors," and that the position of the Argentine Government "was established in the communique released last Saturday."

He added that "personal contacts are expected to be held as soon as possible to clear up the situation and to avoid comments which would only serve to aggravate the situation."

The Paraguayan Foreign Ministry communique, released today through various journalistic publications, indicated also that troops of the Paraguayan engineering command were proceeding to close the channel which was opened on the Argentine side to create an artificial lake.

According to the journalistic report, the Paraguayan note stated that Argentina "has proceeded, without consulting the Asuncion Government, to divert the course of the river."

The Pilcomayo River serves as a natural border between the two countries, and Paraguay accuses Argentina of opening an artificial channel, which the Buenos Aires Government calls "drainage" of the river course, it was learned here.

The Paraguayan Foreign Ministry note indicated that a note sent to the Argentine Government in July 1979 did not demand an Argentine answer. According to a news agency report released last night, in accordance with the journalistic report, technical data have been requested in the Paraguayan note on the projects which Argentina wants to carry out along the course of the Pilcomayo River.

URUGUAYAN CATTLE TO ARGENTINA--Montevideo--The Uruguayan Government officially announced that it will authorize the exportation of cattle on the hoof, primarily to Argentina, in a series of measures designed to give the agricultural sector a shot in the arm and solve its problems. The minister of agriculture, Juan Carlos Cassou, who made the announcement along with the undersecretary of economics and finance, Ernesto Rosso, explained that the sales will be authorized when it is clear that they serve everyone's interests and that prices are satisfactory. "The exporting will depend on circumstances; that is, if the situation demands, there will be no obstacles to the sales, since the export authorization has already been given," stated Cassou. The secretary of state added that because of Argentina's proximity, it is the logical buyer of livestock on the hoof from Uruguay, and will be the only market to which these animals are exported. He also indicated that mixed missions will be sent abroad to promote the sale of exportable meat surpluses to different markets. The surpluses stem from the increase in volume of sheep and cattle. The measures will take effect this week, and will also include lower interest rates for the renewal of credits and the extension of deadlines for tax payments. SELA SECRETARY WANTS UNITY--Santiago de Chile--SELA [Latin American Economic System] Secretary Carlos Alzamora has called for a united attitude and joint position among Latin American countries to deal with the policy to be adopted toward countries by the Republican government of Ronald Reagan. Alzamora said: "If we consider that the United States has had no policy toward Latin America in recent years, we should expect Reagan to adopt one. But this raises the need for Latin America to have a united position to give a joint response." [Excerpt] [P/110328 Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 10 Nov 80 p 2]

VIOLA'S NOMINATION GENERATES EXPECTATIONS, SPECULATIONS

Buenos Aires SOMOS in Spanish 10 Oct 80 pp 4-9

[Article by Tabare Areas]

[Text] What Will Change Under Viola

One week after the Military Junta indicated that it had reached a decision, the questions heard on our streets began to change. People were no longer asking themselves (or their well-informed friends) why the three commanders delayed action or whether Viola accepted with conditions. The key question now is what retired Lt Gen Roberto Eduardo Viola will do and change when he takes up residence at the Casa Rosada as president next 29 March. These expectations, which can be sensed in influential government and political circles as well, merely reflect a fact that very few Argentines doubt: that the success or failure of the process that began 54 months ago hinges largely on the ability of this 55-year old officer to pilot the government between 1981 and 1984.

Those who know Viola stress that he always advocates compromise solutions and that a major factor in his appointment was his close friendship with President Videla. To many military circles, this friendship also translates into a solidly unified approach, which is additional assurance that the basic goals of the process will not be adulterated. The transition entails a coexistence (in other words, an acting president and a president-designate), which can be carried off smoothly given the traits of the two main figures involved. For the time being, Videla and Viola have probably reached a tacit agreement on how to carry themselves over the next 6 months. Videla will act without any limitations or conditions, it is emphasized, but will brief Viola on any important decisions he makes. In the event that such decisions have repercussions beyond March, the two will talk them over to gage their effects and impact. Reliable circles say that the idea is to establish direct contact, leaving the implementation of the agreements they reach to their teams of advisers. Military (especially army) sources say that on account of their unified approach and friendship (they entered Military College together in 1942 and studied at adjoining tables), there will be no mishaps during the transition. These same sources remind us that when Videla was president and Viola commander in chief, in speaking over the phone they both insisted on being the first to pick up the receiver and wait for the other to begin talking: a formal sign of subordinate status.

think of Peronism. Last January he told a feature writer from the paper LA CAPITAL of Mar del Plata: "It cannot remain united. Only persecution, which will not take place under any circumstances, offers the possibility of monolithic unity for that political group."

A couple of months before the issue of presidential succession warmed up, Viola began to be inaccessible to newsmen seeking statements from him on current events, a stand that he did not alter after his appointment, even though reporters stood watch for long hours outside the home of his in-laws in Concordia or near his apartment on Juncal Street. Many of the questions that the newsmen had in mind dealt with potential candidates for his cabinet. In view of this strict silence, perhaps it would be useful to recall some of Viola's recent remarks on present-day issues, because they could provide concrete indications of how he will play his cards.

--Dialog: "I am very much in agreement, 90 percent, with how the political dialog has been implemented, although I think that the call, the proposal should have been made 2 years ago. That would have saved us a lot of time."

--Turnover of political figures: "I am certain that there is going to be a suitable turnover in political circles in the medium term. I want to be extraordinarily clear on this. It is not a question of getting rid of all the political figures who have been active in the country for the last 20, 30 or 40 years; rather, it is a question of a suitable turnover that retains the men that have demonstrated party representativeness that would enable them to abide changes. In other words, this is the modernization that the process is endeavoring to bring to political parties."

--Unity: "It must be made clear that the unity that we are talking about and advocating does not mean uniformity of thought or implementation, because that would be a totalitarian approach, which is very far removed from our forecasts and from the desires of our society."

--Legacy: "Someone is going to have to inherit this process. I do not know whether it will be friends or enemies, but someone will have to do it. We hope that it will be friends, I mean to say, those who are friends of the process, whatever their leanings. I would feel that we will have failed if enemies inherit it."

--Elections: "We must not hold the simplistic view that politics means elections. This is an important element in a democratic system, but not everything. If that was the way it was, it must not be in the future."

Meanwhile, people are also wondering about the working methods that Viola will adopt. According to reports, which those close to him do not deny, the future president is planning to implement a system of direct advisers in key areas (economics, politics, international relations) who would have direct access to the president; this is somewhat like the staff of advisers surrounding U.S. presidents. In this regard, however, we have to find out how the new Law of Ministries will be worded. Those close to Viola do not deny either that this idea might be tied in with Viola's intention to lessen the political weight of a number of super-ministries such as Economy and Social Welfare.

Government Palace sources stress that Videla is prepared to govern without any impediments until 29 March 1981. "And if that means taking measures that carry a high political cost," they say, "Videla will take them. He does not want to leave any loose end to get in Viola's way. As far as consultations are concerned, the mechanisms have probably already been spelled out for Viola to get all of the information about inner government workings, but without entering into decisionmaking."

What will change with Viola in power? Videla and Viola have a unified approach, but there are also the guidelines that the Government Junta issued in connection with the actions of the future government. In other words, we will see the changes provided for in these guidelines and that are the outcome of the rectifications to be made after 4 years of governing experience. Undoubtedly, all of this will have a Viola style to it, with the adjustments (or "intensification of policies," as military circles call it) to focus on the political and economic spheres.

In his statements over the past 2 years Viola broached one issue with noteworthy insistence: national unity. In his farewell address as commander-in-chief last 26 December, he said: "National unity, the result of which must be an agreement among Argentines as to a system of ideas and the institutional framework for bringing it about, means establishing an acceptable political system." Those working with him assert that Viola will guide his administration towards a convergence that will bring about a policy of national union, an approach that would have the full backing of the Military Junta. The Viola style, it is said, entails a revitalization of the political dialog. Whereas the dialog has so far focused on the doctrinal angle (establishing the desired country model and the objectives that all sectors agree on), as of March it will deal in particular with the practical side (in other words, how to build the country we want). The practical facet of the dialog involves three key elements: the political party statute, the election law and the possibility of a constitutional reform.

Long before his appointment, various circles were heard to say that Viola would be the man to open the political door. This is certainly not refuted by the fact that the former army commander held ongoing talks with most of the Argentine political spectrum, especially with leaders of FUFEPO [Popular Federalist Force] and other centrist factions, at meetings that were not always reported publicly. "I consider political parties part of a democracy," Viola said. "I cannot conceive of democracy without political parties. They must train leaders who have a calling to and are capable of leading the nation, and they must be schools of activism and national commitment. Those who do not see it this way, who do not desire this, are not thinking in terms of democracy."

In this connection, observers are speculating on the possible turn that the government's relations with Peronism could take, this being an all too nettlesome issue. Hardly had Viola been appointed when Deolindo Felipe Bittel said: "Although the working class segments of society were not involved in his appointment, it is our hope that the new president will seek a way of governing for the people," while also calling for an election timetable. What does Viola

That would not be all. There is also talk that changes might be made in the appointment of governors and that between four and eight provinces could get civilian heads. But according to reports, the three provinces that make up the traditional Argentine electoral triangle (Buenos Aires, Cordoba and Santa Fe) would retain military governors, in any case with a heavy injection of civilians at intermediate administrative levels. Many people feel that it is precisely here that FUFEPO provincial leaders would fit in, inasmuch as a selective approach (just as for the appointment of civilian governors) would require that they be representative and command a public consensus in their provinces. Viola had already outlined this approach when he retired as army commander, noting on that occasion that civilian involvement in government decision-making and functions should come about gradually, without sudden moves, until civilians take full control.

The issue of foreign relations takes up a great deal of time in Viola's talks with his group of adherents. Many of the lectures that the future president usually attends on Mondays at Belgrano University have to do with this area. Nevertheless, we should not expect major changes in relation to the policy pursued by Videla, although there is talk that a decision has already been made to assign the Foreign Ministry to a civilian, a diplomat with lengthy experience, in order to consolidate a more helpful image of Argentina overseas. He might or might not inherit the Beagle affair, a problem that depends not just on our government but on the Vatican and Chile as well. The Vatican is said to want to conclude its mediation with the current government team, whose viewpoints and working pace it is already familiar with. In any case, if the problem extends beyond next March, there will be no changes in the guidelines followed so far, which are the responsibility of the Military Junta and the Military Committee since this is a national security issue.

Circles close to Viola are also saying that he will be interested in strengthening relations with the United States. Viola's image in that country solidified over the past 2 years, and his name is not unknown in Washington power centers, which many people attribute to the smooth relations that he had with the former U.S. ambassador in Buenos Aires, Raul Castro. The Carter administration reportedly sees Viola as a man with democratic aspirations and as a defender of human rights.

Many of the most important government and military offices are quite concerned about the scant results achieved by the process in the field of education. The fact is that under three ministers (Ricardo Bruera, Juan Jose Catalan and Juan Rafael Llerena Amadeo) the ministry has still not succeeded in implementing, the argument goes, a streamlined and consistent policy for this sector, a shortcoming that Viola is reportedly serious about remedying. During his term a basic piece of legislation must be issued: the Federal Education Law, and Viola's group of advisers will reportedly introduce in-depth modifications into the draft version. As far as we can tell, his instructions will aim mainly at achieving consistency and stability in this area. Reports also indicate that Viola maintains very good relations with the presidents of private universities through Avelino Porto, the president of Belgrano University and a former head of the Council of Private University Presidents, a group that is critical of Minister Llerena Amadeo's performance.

Elsewhere on the national scene, political parties are cautiously awaiting the transition period. A quick review of the political landscape clearly indicates the subtle changes that the future president might bring about. There is a group of parties that hope to become the political lifeblood of the next stage of the process and to help develop a framework in which their heirs can be prepared. This group includes (with superficial, not substantive differences) FUFEPO, the San Juan "bloquismo," the alliance of Progressive Democrats, Democratic Socialists (Gianonni-Ghioldi) and the Christian Democratic Union (Gerardo Ancarola), and the SEA (Jaime Perriaux, with Catalan's quite critical support)

Another group comprises parties and factions whose stand could be described as one of critical support and that want to join the process but without mechanically following suit. They cover a broad spectrum, ranging from the most dialog-oriented factions of Peronism (Raul Matera, Julio Romero, the "intermediate generation"), Christian Democracy and Pablo Gonzalez Bergez's National Center Party to the MID [Integration and Development Movement]. Any keen-witted reader of political statements can readily see that this group has a unifying issue: their rejection of the economic policy piloted by Jose Alfredo Martinez de Hoz. In general, they want elections, but after a transition period and an agreement on common ground during the next stage of the process. Thus, politically speaking, they extend a vote of confidence to Viola.

Political circles are keeping a close eye on the stand that the radical movement takes. The leadership headed by Ricardo Balbin (it is said) is pursuing a strategy based on ruling out any possibility of an accord between Viola and the Federalists-Centrists, on the one hand, and with the Peronists, on the other. According to this line of reasoning, the radical movement would then loom as the only organized, cohesive party capable of offering the Armed Forces the guarantees for a return to institutional normalcy. It is on the basis of this possibility, party circles emphasize, that Balbin is cautiously marking time until the new president takes office, confident that his term will spell the end of the current power structure.

For their part, the official leaders of Peronism are maintaining their aloof posture, but there are two question marks conditioning their potential courses of action: the unpredictable stands that might be taken by Isabel Peron (in the event that she is released), Lorenzo Miguel and the labor movement in general, which at present is not disposed to committing itself to the party's political machine. The picture is rounded out by the group comprising the left (Communist Party, Intransigents, FIP, Socialist Confederation, Popular Christian Party, Unified Socialist Party) and which, according to the ground rules of the process, are left on the fringe, urgently calling for elections.

Meanwhile, Viola has already voiced a view on the great dilemma ultimately facing Argentines: how to live in a democracy: "It will not be easy to put democracy into practice," he said. "Political systems are not created or perfected from one day to the next. On the contrary, they demand persevering development, because they depend more on the consensus they secure in the hearts of citizens than on the laws and regulations issued to govern them."

Possible Changes

The word "changes" has dominated conversation since Viola was appointed. After lengthy research and private talks with men who are very close to the future president, SOMOS has put together a jigsaw puzzle that reveals some of the prospects.

For example, the first major change is the transition from a military man to a politician. Those who have dealt with Videla and Viola over the years do not hesitate to assert that whereas Videla is the personification of a military man (open, up-front, very professional, perhaps scornful of political language and attitudes), Viola is above all a political man, given to dialog, open to all possibilities (though he is very clear about what he wants) and above all, very careful in the art of thinking over, weighing and gaging each word and definition. Hence, this difference between the two men immediately entails a change in style.

Politically, perhaps many sectors in the country feel that an old-style Conservative Party will be resurrected. But many pieces of information and testimonies suggest that such a fantasy (which is how some observers describe it) is not going through Viola's mind. "He feels," circles close to him assert, "that we need a center party made up of many factions (excluding the decidedly antidemocratic ones, of course), and he would be willing to work very hard on this." There is, of course, a great deal of speculation surrounding Viola's attitude towards Peronism, so much, in fact, that there are even those who have described him as a populist general and have seen and see him as the man capable of essaying the famous army-Peronism union as a supposed panacea for all of the country's ills. "But they are wrong," Viola's partisans say. "The general is convinced that such a union would force the army to adopt at least 30 percent of Peronism's vices, and he is not prepared to adopt that 30 or 20 or 10 or even 5 percent. He does believe that Peronism must not be harassed, because such harassment could be the basis for its unity, which now seems so far off, and even for the emergence of a leader, which it has frankly not had since Peron's death." With regard to Peronism, Viola might be in accord with those who believe that its strong point today is the labor movement, but a disunited, atomized labor movement. Those who have brought up the case of Isabel with him have not, of course, been able to secure a specific reply from him, but they assume that Viola would prefer to see the former president released and out of the country than unjustifiably mythicized.

But perhaps the most important of all these speculations has to do with possible changes in the economic sphere. According to those close to him, Viola (who has reportedly been in permanent contact with Martinez de Hoz) feels that the economy minister is a man of superior intelligence, with a limitless capacity for work and who has given part of his life to the process. Nevertheless, they would go so far as to conjecture that he will not reappoint him. Why? Simply because Viola wants to create political expectations, they insist. He knows quite well that if he were to announce tomorrow that Martinez de Hoz would again be heading up the Economy Ministry, perhaps half of the country's businessmen would feel discouraged. It stands to reason, then, that a political man (which Viola is) would look for this expectation, this fresh air in another man. This does not, of course, mean that Viola does not share the economic philosophy of the process, those close to him strongly assert. "On the contrary," they say, "he shares it fully. He favors economic freedom and opening up the market to imports, and he supports all of the guidelines."

These same sources, men who have spent many hours with him, do not hesitate to spell out the points that are of the greatest concern to Viola and that he would focus on after taking over as president: 1) Divide the Economy Ministry into two or three branches. He might change his mind, they note, but for now he is convinced that this is necessary; 2) Wage a serious battle against inflation; 3) Make major cuts in the deficit, if possible, to less than half of the current level (14 billion). Even so, and this is again according to accounts from people close to him, Viola has said that he does not in any way wish to cogovern until March 1981, but he does want assurances about three things: complete information about all essential matters, input in drawing up the Ministries Law and input in formulating the budget. For example, one of the issues that most concerns him, his adherents confess, is tax evasion. "He thinks it's incredible that there is 40 or 45 percent tax evasion, especially under a military government. He does not expect tax collection to reach 100 percent under his administration (this would be almost impossible, and not just in Argentina), but he does hope to hit 80 percent, even if he has to resort to heavy-handed action."

Still on the subject of changes, those close to Viola assert that the future president does not fully share the philosophy that because of national security reasons, the role of the state should not be reduced, inasmuch as, according to him, in a national emergency the state would have available everything it might need. In this regard, they stress, he is convinced of the need to return companies to private hands, but on one, sine qua non condition: selling them off at a realistic, fair price, not selling them at a loss. They also say that he is worried about the status of the meatpacking industry, which he regards as basic because of its export potential, and about the status of the industrialists who made efforts to reoutfit themselves and to get into a competitive position. In this connection, they say, Viola could adopt a more flexible stand than the current one. He is also reportedly concerned about averting a speculative economy, and thus his administration would try to prevent excessive hikes in interest rates, thus making consistent business planning possible. To this end, national banks would function as balancing and promotion banks on the money market.

POLITICAL LEADERS COMMENT ON REAGAN'S ELECTION

Political Leaders React

PY070047 Buenos Aires HERALD in English 6 Nov 80 p 11

[Excerpts] (NA)--Outstanding local personalities and politicians yesterday received the news of Ronald Reagan's election to the Presidency of the United States with mixed feelings.

Some quarters were enthusiastic concerning future relations between Argentina and the United States, and welcomed the change from a democrat to a republican government in that country. Others feared that Reagan would apply the "big stick" policy in his dealings with Latin American countries.

Deolindo Bittel, acting president of the Justicialist Party, issued a statement saying his party has always been respectful of the right of the peoples of any country to elect their own government. The Justicialist Party is therefore pleased that the citizens of the United States have been in a position to freely elect the men who will in the future guide the destiny of the country.

On the other hand, former Radical Party deputy Luis Leon, said he hoped that Reagan would not apply the "big stick" policy in his dealing with Latin American countries, a policy which the Republican Party had exercised in the past. Leon said this policy encouraged subversion.

Leon said he was not happy at the result of the elections. "I would have preferred Carter to have been the winner, simply because in my opinion the philosophy of the Democrat Party is good for Latin America," he added.

Former economy minister Juan Carlos Pugliese said that in his opinion Reagan's victory would not mean any significant changes in the human rights policy of the United States towards Argentina. "This is a policy decided upon by the people of the United States and not something exclusively decided upon by President Jimmy Carter.

Pugliese said that Reagan may handle the human rights policy towards Argentina in a more realistic manner than President Carter. He added: "Carter laid great emphasis on us (Argentina), and less in countries where he had greater interests and where human rights were also violated."

Finally Pugliese said he also believed that the Reagan administration would help to bolster economic relations between his country and Argentina.

Oscar Alende, president of the Intransigent Party, said he did not believe the change of government would mean any modification in the present policy of the United States towards Argentina.

Victor Garcia Costa, head of the Popular Socialist Party, was very outspoken and said Reagan's victory was a veritable disaster for the people of Latin America and those of the third world countries. "It means a return to the big stick policy."

He said the most reactionary economic elements had won, and a proof of this was that George Bush, the new vice president, was a powerful oil tycoon, and former director of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).

Americo Ghioldi, president of the Socialist Democrat Party, said he trusted Ronald Reagan would improve trade, civil, military and institutional relations between the two countries. He added the United States should make a careful study of the problems besetting Latin American countries as these are completely different from those in the United States and Europe.

Former Justicialist Party foreign affairs minister Manuel Arauz Castex said Reagan's victory was a victory for the right wing in the United States. Castex, who was a member of the government toppled by the armed forces in March 1976, added that "we Argentines must not rely on solutions which come to us from abroad."

Dante Loss, leader of the intermediate generation of the Justicialist movement was rather ambiguous when he stated that "the new government headed by Ronald Reagan will be asking Argentina for everything but will give nothing in exchange." Loss had previously stated his conviction that Reagan would win the elections. He said Reagan would play down the human rights problem and relegate it to second place. He also said his government would be irked by the close relations between Argentina and the Soviet Union. With regard to trade relations, Loss said Reagan would be sure to increase custom tariffs on Argentine products, and maintain the current balance of trade which favours the United States by four to one.

Ramon Baldassini, secretary general of the post office employees, and Argentine delegate to the International Labour Organization (ILO) said Reagan's victory was part of a strange tendency which was occurring within the traditional western democracies. "Parties which up to now have been upheld by popular sectors are losing ground to those of a more conservative nature," he added.

Jose Rodriguez, former secretary general of the Auto Workers Union, and Latin American vice president of the International Federation of Metal Industry Workers, said the most outstanding feature of the election was that the people of the United States gave an example of democracy.

He pointed out that Carter had been defeated in spite of the backing of the United States labour unions (AFL-CIO).

Peronists on Viola, Reagan

PY112259 Buenos Aires HERALD in English 11 Nov 80 p 11

[Text] (NA)--Hopes that the future government of General (retired) Roberto Viola, will be one of transition towards a truly constitutional regime, were expressed yesterday by leading Justicialist Italo Luder, onetime interim president of the nation.

In a radio interview yesterday, Luder criticised the current political dialogue being led by Interior Minister Albano Harguindeguy because, he said, it did not include the number one priority of a return to a democratic form of government. Luder said that the Justicialists believed that this plan should not be delayed any longer.

He stressed that the Peronists did not avoid self-criticism and pointed out that over the past quarter of a century they had only been in government for 2 years and 10 months. "It is therefore arbitrary that the responsibility for all the problems affecting the nation should be cast on the Peronists."

Luder said that the election of Ronald Reagan would not alter US-Argentine relations. "Human rights protests might be made in a more reserved manner, and not so public as in the past," he said, but they will not change.

He then added: "It would be naive to believe that the human rights banner was a Carter invention. The human rights problem and the decision of the United States to defend it at a world level, stems from the Helsinki Accords signed by the Ford administration, and although Carter may have laid more emphasis on the matter, it is part of a global strategy.

"The Argentine government made the mistake of thinking that it was the main target of this policy. The real target of the United States human rights policy, has always been the socialist states," he added.

In Mendoza the vice president of the National Justicialist Council, Deolindo Bittel, said political activity should return to normal as soon as possible.

"Perhaps it will be necessary for several political parties to adopt a common strategy concerning the consolidation of democracy," he added.

Bittel, who is in that city with Eloy Camus, former governor of San Juan Province, who is also president of the National Justicialist Congress, said a return to normal activity by the political parties was essential, and also demanded the release of former President Isabel Martinez de Peron.

Bittel said he was in agreement with a statement made recently by radical politician Raul Alfonsin to the effect that the disunity between local political parties had weakened them and led to the various coups.

Galtieri's Remarks

PY071450 Buenos Aires NOTICIAS ARGENTINAS in Spanish 1456 GMT 7 Nov 80

[Excerpts] Buenos Aires, 7 Nov (NA)--Lt Gen Leopoldo Galtieri, commander in chief of the army, has said that Ronald Reagan's election as president of the United States brings a "reasonable and hopeful optimism that our bilateral relations will gradually reach the level they should always have had."

Galtieri made these statements today when he was interviewed at the military base of the Metropolitan Airport soon after his arrival from Concepcion Del Uruguay, a city of Entre Rios Provence where he served at his first military post in 1946 with the grade of sublieutenant and where today he visited army units based in the area.

On this occasion, when asked his opinion on the future changes of the U.S. government, Galtieri stated that "expectations are always created" since "there are two political parties which take turns," and he said that he believes that with Reagan in the White House there could be improvements in bilateral relations.

Montes' Remarks

PY111817 Buenos Aires TELAM in Spanish 1605 GMT 11 Nov 80

[Text] Buenos Aires, 11 Nov (TELAM)--Former Argentine Foreign Minister Oscar Antonio Montes said here today that he believes that the victory of Ronald Reagan means that the United States must change its foreign policy and orient it toward strengthening ties with western countries in the political, economic, and cultural areas.

In a statement made at the Jorge Newbery International Airport, Vice Admiral Montes, who was Pastor's predecessor at the foreign ministry, said that the United States must treat its allies as such and have a different view of the obligatory need of governments to achieve democracy.

Regarding Argentina, he said that the United States must take into account the principle of nonintervention and understand some critical problems, like the human rights issue. He noted particularly that it must treat Argentina as a true Western ally.

IMPASSE IN BEAGLE MEDIATION DISCUSSED

Buenos Aires SOMOS in Spanish 10 Oct 80 pp 10-11

[Article by Bruno Passarelli]

[Text] In a matter of hours, two very influential news sources revealed the same information: there are problems--very serious ones--with the Papal mediation in the Beagle case. Last Friday, IL GIORNALE NUOVO of Milan commented with great pessimism about the progress of negotiations, thus reflecting a common attitude among the closest observers of the situation. Later, the National Associated Press Agency (ANSA) issued a cable datelined Rome which stated that "well informed sources revealed that the Holy See in recent weeks formulated precise proposals to solve the controversy over the Beagle." The rest of the cable emphasized the tense atmosphere that exists between the two delegations, indicating that hopes for reaching an immediate agreement "are disappearing" (sic).

However, the terms "stagnation," "impasse" and "crisis in negotiations" do not reflect the whole truth, although it seems undeniable that there are serious problems, particularly on the central issues of the dispute. These are the same difficulties Cardinal Antonio Samore is trying to overcome with a "work plan" which he will now go over with the governments of Buenos Aires and Santiago. To observers who have spent long hours at the Vatican for many years, it is indisputable--although Samore has avoided a concrete statement with his proverbial style--that Papal mediation is not progressing with "speed and consistency" through the obstacles created by the reticent and insincere attitude with which Chile agreed to it. Meanwhile, Argentina has been very open, it insists, but the Chileans arrived without much conviction and little willingness to be understanding.

In its 28 September edition, the newspaper LA NUEVA PROVINCIA of Bahia Blanca sounded an alarm for observers by publishing three maps: two showed the positions defended by Argentina and Chile. The third had a suggestive caption: "The formula of the solution?" and showed two demarcation lines, with one of them clearly predominating (see maps). "At any rate," stated the daily, "both lines imply recognizing total or almost total Chilean sovereignty over the islands in question. That means granting Chile some 100 kilometers of that Atlantic coast, whose absolute sovereignty was explicitly granted to Argentina in the Protocol of 1893."

Chile's uncompromising position has been remarked upon also in other Vatican circles. The same observers say that as long as the Chilean Government continues to cling to an immovable "juridical concept" (within the plan drawn up for the arbitration of 1978), the essence of Papal intervention will be attenuated; obviously such mediation is intended to overcome inflexible interpretations. To back up that position, the Chileans have one fact in their favor: they went to Samore with the backing of a great consensus that went beyond political divisions, even counting on support from Christian Democratic followers of Eduardo Frei. Observers say, on the other hand, that the opinions Samore heard from the Argentines who visited him "were not always in agreement," and ranged from "radical hardliners" to "an exaggerated conciliatory spirit."

In spite of everything, Cardinal Paolo Bertoli, the Pope's envoy to the National Marian Congress, added a note of optimism in his remarks on the southern problem: "All those who are involved in the mediation are anxious to come to a successful conclusion," he said.

Meanwhile, it was certain that Guillermo Moncayo and Ricardo Etcheverry Boneo, two of the main Argentine negotiators, would come to Buenos Aires for a new round of consultations concerning the mediation situation. Piecing together the scanty information that they have managed to wrest from the tight Vatican secrecy surrounding the matter, there are some who say that if the two governments can "make palatable" the Pope's suggestions, the direct intervention of John Paul II (already postponed twice) could come about by the end of October. If not, the initiative will once again be taken by Cardinal Samore, but with an ever more limited leeway for manipulation.

AGRARIAN LEADER'S CONNECTIONS VIEWED WITH SUSPICION

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 17 Oct 80 p 9

[Article by Manfred Schonfeld]

[Text] No one would deny that a considerable portion of the Argentine agricultural sector--both the businesses engaged in agricultural exploitation and the people who depend on them for a living, as well as small and medium landowners--is undergoing a difficult time. This is due, in part, to the side effects of the federal government's economic policy. The repression of inflation by means of an undervaluation of foreign currency reserves has inevitably left its mark on agriculture, especially in the sector that produces goods for the export market. Thus, a series of proposals has already emerged from genuinely representative organizations, presenting suggestions to national authorities. And the provincial authorities of the affected regions have joined in the complaints about the pressures on their local populations, whether they be management or labor.

Given this general consideration as a premise that cannot be ignored--and without digressing on the manner in which regional needs should be harmonized with the general economic policy of the government--for some time now this issue has been exploited by groups which obviously want to make it a battle standard for purely political agitation.

Moreover, the ties that exist between those groups and others which are operating abroad and which are clearly subversive organizations; and the modus operandi of those which are operating here, smack of something more than simple, justified defense of regional, economic, social and labor interests. This appears to us to be a very suspicious campaign which could inadvertently contribute to subversion on one of the favorite grounds used by subversives: the existence of real problems that are an easy vehicle for them.

Rosario 'Convocation'

Tomorrow a relatively small number of entities--basically the Argentine Agrarian Federation--will hold a so-called "convocation of national businesses" in Rosario. As if a "convocation" were a lasting entity, they have even given the gathering its own acronym: CONAE.

The "spiritus rector" behind the movement is Mr Humberto Volando, member of the defunct General Economic Confederation (CGE) (the second stage, the one that resurfaced under the Peronist ministry of Gelbard) whose present ideology now links him with the Integration and Development Movement (MID) and Frigerism, as well as Verticalist Peronism.

The most well-known groups, some old and some new, which are defending the socio-economic interests of the Argentine rural sector (the Rural Society, the Agricultural and Livestock Intercooperative Confederation [CONINAGRO], Argentine Rural Confederations [CRA] and others), have already indicated that they will boycott the "convocation." Some, such as the Rural Society of Salta, which at first was supposed to be sending a delegation, denied that possibility in a report released yesterday.

So far , there has been no indication of any justification for the allusion we made to agitation for subversive purposes--or with subversive effects. The ingenuous reader might believe, at first glance, that as in so many other aspects of national life, this is a situation in which rival groups are pursuing more or less similar objectives but disagree as to certain details or with regard to the personal ambitions of their leaders. Concerning the refusal to attend a "convocation," as we mentioned--or the "pulling out" of a group that was originally going to participate--the reader who is no longer so naive but is well-versed in the way things are often handled in this country today, could consider official deterrents, in varying degrees of intensity or persuasiveness.

However, that is not the way to approach this question.

'Montonero' Radio Propaganda

Radio TIRLR from Costa Rica is a station that has expressed concern, somewhat surprisingly, for what is going on in faraway Argentina. Its program "La voz del campo" [The Voice of the Countryside] is devoted to topics including not only the criticism of the economic policy of our present government, but also the development of what could be termed an entire "battle plan" for Argentine agriculture: coordination of union and cooperative activities; mass mobilization of small and medium producers; and extension of the sphere of influence of a so-called "front or movement for national salvation" to other social sectors: industrial workers, industrial managers, merchants and the various religious communities.

It is truly moving to see how that Costa Rican radio station is so concerned with events in Argentina. . . .

Last May Radio TIRLR of Costa Rica engaged in some particularly intense broadcasting. During that time it announced the creation of the above-mentioned "salvation movement" and made a call for a "general mobilization."

Mr Humberto Volando, moreover, had nothing better to do than to grant an interview to that station, that "friendly wavelength," as he called it. Over its waves, he sent his greetings to Costa Rican peasants. Meanwhile, in various parts of the country--among Tucuman sugarcane workers, Cuyano vineyard workers, fruit workers of the Alto Valle, and dairy workers of Santa Fe--an intensive leaflet distributing campaign was being carried out, urging people to listen to the radio station in question.

Needless to say, it is a bastion of Argentine "Montoneros" in exile.

Transmission Technique

Although by its very nature this must not be a very powerful radio station, its transmissions "come in" perfectly. How, we might ask.

To have powerful "relay" stations, there must be costly facilities. Of course, the Montoneros are not lacking in money. If they have run out of what they stole during the peak of their activities in our country, we can imagine that they have new sources of financing in the principal world centers of transnational terrorism: Moscow, Tripoli and some others.

As for the construction of powerful retransmission facilities, that is less likely. However, it is possible that in many cases the broadcasts are prerecorded and transmitted with impunity from clandestine stations along the border or perhaps even in national territory.

The Armed Forces, in this respect, maintain that they are in complete control of all the borders. In a territory as vast as ours, and with the ever-present possibility of bribing some disloyal official, we would question the alleged perfect control; no government could achieve that.

At any rate, the concern among the population of many rural areas, which has brought together in the same struggle big landowners, small farmers and even rural peons, regardless of social and economic differences, is a reality. The possibility of political agitation--to put it bluntly, because Argentina in the last decade has lost the parsimonious inhibitions of the past and now moves rapidly to armed attacks, subversion and terrorism--is another part of that reality.

Are We Prepared?

The next question that comes to mind is whether we are prepared to come to grips with this none-too-heartening prospect, with resolve and calm, but at the same time with respect for the rule of law; or if we will let ourselves be led into the erroneous solution of dealing with any violent outburst by means of a kind of anonymous and underhanded repression that would do no more than demoralize us internally and discredit us externally, instead of proceeding with maximum, unforgiving harshness, if necessary, but always within the realm of law.

This is a question which, in view of the suspicious "convocation" of Rosario, we would like to see asked among the people attending the "great luncheon" of the highest leaders of the National Reorganization Process.

CENTRAL BANK PRESIDENT SUCCEEDS IN PROMOTING DEVALUATION POLICY

Buenos Aires ULTIMA CLAVE in Spanish in Spanish No 49, 23 Sep 80 pp 1-3

[Text] Riding on a wave of surprises, last week the economy experienced a series of far-reaching decisions. The two most important ones focused on the implementation of the table of progressive devaluations of the dollar and that of the enforcement program for the Value Added Tax. Although the latter was foreseeable, the former took even the most perspicacious by surprise, even considering that the market could have assumed some measure that would combat the disorientation as well as the myriad rumors that emerged over a short period of 20 days in a definite trend toward financial destabilization. Uncertainty is the worst business consultant.

The announcement regarding the VAT is nothing new. Perhaps it is worth cautioning that its final implementation still involves some manifest differences of opinion. The most important difference lies in the calculation that its enforcement will require some potential surprises in the treasury due to tax collection problems. In essence, the Argentine market is one of the most diversified in the world. The multitude of consumer outlets makes it practically impossible to predict what procedure will be the most suitable to ensure that tax collection has a positive result in balancing the various demands of the public sector.

One of the ideas that seem to take on the most significance in current studies is that controls and collection should be verified on a higher level than the disbursement outlet itself, and consequently that wholesalers and perhaps the plant itself should be entrusted with effecting the initial withholding. This plan smacks of laissez-faire, and has been criticized for reasons that bear no real relation to its efficiency in collecting the tax; it is objected that it separates the real taxpayer from the final effective amount of the tax, in addition to producing a distortion in the final management of prices. However, we must point out that experienced specialists are now studying in great detail the prevailing system in Italy, where the principle of a generalized VAT has yielded stupendous results.

What the experts are analyzing basically boils down to an evaluation of the potential evasion of taxes: it is estimated that nearly 40 percent of taxpayers do not meet their obligations, and that this percentage will not vary with the application of the VAT at the consumer outlet. The point is still more difficult if we consider that the small merchant already has a hard time maintaining his books correctly, and that this situation will complicate the matter.

But all this was already at the same decisionmaking stage in terms of tax reform, so that no one is surprised that the announcement was accompanied by this series of problems, which will be resolved before the system really begins to operate.

Exchange Policy

The situation of the other measure is quite different. The adoption of a devaluation table which envisions a total average increase in the price of the dollar of 3 percent between now and March, and up to 6 percent or a little more, is not significant so much for its monetary value per se, which practically does not vary, as for its considerable political value. In fact, those who have demanded the devaluation of the peso--or the revaluation of the dollar--will have to lower their sights substantially in the short term.

The adoption of the table confirms that there will be no devaluation; on the contrary, the current implementation of the program begun on 2 April 1976 has been consolidated, at least until the end of March 1981.

The measure has two distinctly different moments. The first depends on the economic cycle, and the second, being more symbolic in nature, covers a longer period of time.

From the economic point of view, it is clear that the economic team was somewhat concerned about the sudden and accelerated migration of capital. Remittances to Uruguay were on the rise during the last week. Other capital, given the uncertainty, returned to its point of origin. But at the same time, when inflationary figures were coming down considerably, interest rates were once again climbing to dangerous heights after a remarkable downturn. The correlation of these two figures was evidently a logical connection which obviates any explanation. The fluctuation of the two factors seemed to be spreading because of the uncertainty on the one hand, and the pressures and expectations based on the change of administration, on the other hand.

The decision to adopt the progressive devaluation table put up a solid front against this process. The economic cycle forced the adoption of a measure which the president of the Central Bank had been proposing futilely for at least 6 months. The chief of the economic team resisted that initiative, pointing to the principle that the flexibility of decisionmaking is more effective if there are no ties of this nature to bind it. What made him change his mind can be found in the political needs of the long term, as we pointed out above. This need derives from the very uncertainty of the economy. Such uncertainty was aggravated by the assumption that the current administration was losing its decisionmaking ability, and that it would also have to begin accounting for its activities in order to bring them into line with the decisions that may be made by the incoming administration. In this manner, uncertainty could be followed by confusion, disorder and a drastic alteration of the operative guarantees of the market.

The decision to adopt the new table, consequently, is linked to the needs of the current economic cycle, and is oriented toward the future. But it is obvious that the "salvation table" thus arranged would not work out without a strong impression characteristic of the ministry under Dr Martinez de Hoz, in which freedom of manipulation based on pragmatism was the rule. Thus, in adopting the table, taking into consideration immediate conditions and accepting Dr Diz' theory, it was decided not to close the devaluation cycle with the figure zero, but to maintain it constantly as long as possible. We say as long as possible without mentioning March, because the resolution specifies that "the months following" November will continue to have a 1 percent devaluation, which does not imply a ceiling in December, January or March, and does not contain a specific commitment. Four months ago, Dr Klein was already suggesting at a meeting of the economic cabinet that the monthly devaluation be set at something like 2 percent, following a compromise similar to the one applied on this occasion. As a result, the initiative was nothing new; it was just less. But Dr Martinez de Hoz preferred to maintain flexibility and a certain degree of uncertainty in the middle of the first quarter, thus confirming that his political presence in economic affairs will not end in October or even before next 29 March. That is the last possible date envisioned in the new table.

In fact, the economic team has used its decisions to respond to the rumors--or pressures--that predicted a short life for it after the appointment of the new president. The decision is couched in the terms of the economic facts that are understood easily by the most inexperienced people. In this manner, the flexibility achieved with the "months following" November gives it not only the freedom to manipulate on this point, but also throws devaluation expectations out of kilter; going further still, it affirms political power in the economic sphere. "Res, non verba," says the Roman proverb.

When the economic team must renew its term at the end of March, two issues will be of primary importance: inflation (which, having been "perforated" on the basis of 100, seems to be of little concern to everyone) and the possible recession. In both cases the central theme of the economic succession, like the presidential succession, comes into play. This means that the economic team will need great flexibility at that time, as well as the ability to manipulate to achieve greater ease and agility in its negotiating capacity for the future. In this sense, once again the Roman adage takes on particular importance.

INDUSTRIAL SECTOR LEADS BANKRUPTCY LIST

Buenos Aires CLARIN in Spanish 17 Oct 80 p 14

[Text] Figures

In the first 9 months of this year, commercial bankruptcies involved a total of 957.356 billion pesos, which means a 48 percent increase in real terms over the same period of 1979. At that time, liabilities reached 646.5 billion pesos (in September 1980 pesos, assuming an estimated increase of 3 percent for that month in the wholesale price index).

Compared to the same period of 1978, the increase in bankruptcies comes to 152.9 percent, since the figure was 378.6 billion pesos at that time (at values calculated for the end of September 1980).

Moreover, according to the monthly report that appears in the magazine VERITAS, in September liabilities totaled 175.426 billion pesos, compared to 77.842 billion in the same month of 1979. In constant terms, the increase amounted to 43 percent.

In the past 30 days, 68 bankruptcy proceedings have begun, as opposed to 55 in September 1979, an increase of 13.

Industry holds first place among the activities affected, followed by commerce, agricultural production, services and transportation.

The region with the most bankruptcies in September was the Federal Capital; second highest was the province of Santa Fe, and third was that of Cordoba.

Commercial bankruptcies increased by 48 percent in real terms.

DELEGATION TO WEST AFRICA--Argentine Secretary of Economic Relations Raul Cura began a series of talks at the highest level in Dakar yesterday to open new vistas for trade with this country. Raul Cura reached Senegal, the first stop in his tour of West Africa, late Monday afternoon. He was met at the Yoff International Airport by the Senegalese minister of trade, Serigne Lamine Diop. The mission, made up of six officials, industrialists and merchants from Argentina, will visit Togo, Ghana, Nigeria, Cameroon, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon and the Congo in the coming weeks. "Our first trip through West Africa, the first official visit we have made to this continent, will open new prospects for trade relations between Argentina and eight African nations. We are going to sign various cooperation agreements with them," the Argentine secretary of economic relations told the EFE news agency. The Argentine secretary also announced that his country will take part in the International Fair in Dakar, the most important bidding opportunity in West Africa, which will be held in the Senegalese capital during the last week of November. PAPER BLASTS CARTER FOREIGN POLICY

PY101936 La Paz EL DIARIO in Spanish 6 Nov 80 p 2

[Text] The presidential elections held on 4 November in the United States represented first of all the maturity of the American people to defend their lifestyle, which accepts freedom and human dignity. In the second place it rejected the reelection of Mr Carter because of the incapacity he showed during his administration and his handling of diplomatic relations with other countries. The will of the people substantially changes the course of U.S. domestic and international policy and it entrusts the president-elect with the responsibility of repairing all the excesses perpetrated by the incumbent president, who has now felt the repudiation of his fellow citizens.

Carter's fall is also the fall of an ambivalent policy having a Janus-like quality regarding its understandings with other governments, including Latin American governments. Carter felt he was the factotum of human rights, which can be respected and practiced when they are based on clear guidelines. Carter believed that human rights were to be respected and protected whenever they favored international Marxist dogmatic sectors. He never said a single word when the human rights of democrats or independents were trampled on.

For example in the open struggle in Central America Carter's attitude was to favor those who had declared an open war against the established legal regime. He was, therefore, an ally of antisociety people and antidemocrats. In Bolivia his last two ambassadors were not diplomatic representatives but activists who associated with certain party coalitions and with groups that, instead of upholding representative democracy, r[illegible]ed socialism. Groups which promoted disorder, anarchy, and chaos to obst[illegible]he economy and thus obtain their objective.

Carter's attitude in Central America, which has helped to promote the rise of the dogmatic left to perpetrate an armed struggle against the legally established regimes, has caused thousands of deaths and promoted violence. Moreover, he has helped extremists, either in a direct or indirect manner. By so doing, either consciously or unconsciously Carter has been the best ally they could have come across in their escalation of subversion. Perhaps because of this and despite the ususal insults, the eastern countries' social communication tools were not terribly hard on Carter.

The Carter administration not only criticized but strongly attacked the change of government in Bolivia "because it stopped the democratic process in Bolivia." But when a similar case took place in Turkey, Carter was completely silent. Neither did he suspend economic or technical assistance or recall his ambassador. He again enforced an ambivalent policy.

In the field of international relations, particularly, with Latin American countries, Carter assumed the role of the owner of democracy, or revolutions, institutional processes, etc. Although in his domestic policy he upheld a democratic policy, with our country he preferred to assume an implacable dictatorship. He did not recognize the Bolivian government; he instead tried to establish rapport with those groups which, despite the fact that they reached a [word indistinct] in the elections in comparison with their opponents, did not achieve a majority. It is obvious that he sympathized with those that wanted to bloc economic growth. He agreed with the criteria of the so-called amnesty international and the human rights commission. He was unable or could not lead his government in the case of the U.S. hostages in Iran.

It is possible that all this may have lead the American people to vote against Carter. The results of the 4 November elections are a categorical repudiation of the leader that has governed Americans for the past 4 years.

Bolivian Franz Tamayo used sayings to educate his fellow citizens that we think should be engraved in stone. In one of them he referred to the United States as follows: "There is no impunity in power." Carter wanted to be more powerful but he did not want to be punished. His people have returned him to reality: they have condemned him to cease being president.

SILES ZUAZO OPTIMISTIC ON REAGAN'S ELECTION

PY071618 Paris AFP in Spanish 0411 GMT 7 Nov 80

[Text] San Jose, 6 Nov (AFP)--Bolivian President-Elect Hernan Siles Zuazo pointed out here today the democratic nature of the elections which led Ronald Reagan to the U.S Presidency and voiced his optimism on the effect of Reagan's government on Latin America.

Siles, who arrived in San Jose yesterday in response to an invitation from Luis Alberto Monge, presidential candidate of the opposition National Liberation Party, of a social democratic tendency, held several meetings here with various political sectors, as well as with President Rodrigo Carazo.

It was pointed out here that Siles' statements uncover the expectation Reagan's victory has awakened in connection with the political process in Bolivia, where the current military government is isolated after having prevented Siles, who won in democratic elections last June, to take over the government.

Evidently comparing the U.S. elections with what happened in his country, Siles pointed out that we Latin Americans should expect the best from a man who has been elected by a majority of the U.S. people, who have always supported freedom and democracy.

He added that we expect from Mr Reagan an attitude of caution, of expectation [words indistinct] for an improvement or at least a comprehensive, positive relationship of the United States with the Central and South American peoples.

Siles met on Wednesday noon with President Carazo, whom he thanked for the support the Costa Rican Government has given the Bolivian underground government for national unity. These statements were published in LA NACION newspaper.

The Bolivian president-elect, who never occupied the post he was elected for but who on a previous occasion had occupied the post of president, called on Bolivians to overthrow the current military regime in Bolivia by means of peaceful resistance and civil disobedience.

Siles, however, did not dismiss the use of violence to achieve a return to democracy in his country and mentioned the possibility of a popular insurrection to fulfill his goal.

ROLE OF DIPLOMATIC CORPS IN PRESENT REGIME DISCUSSED

La Paz EL DIARIO in Spanish 20 Oct 80 p 2

/Editorial: "Foreign Service Must Be Protected"/

/Text/ In light of what we have seen in the first 3 months of the Government of National Reconstruction, we can say that the greatest obstacle to permanent consolidation lies in the area of foreign affairs.

We know that domestically the political and union organizations of the left fell like a house of cards under the tactical actions of the armed forces which did not allow any resistance thus preventing the clashes which CONADE members and the usual activists had prepared for. As a result, the armed forces controlled the nation immediately and completely without giving the left an opportunity to gain control of even an inch of territory. The overthrow was complete.

With control of the country, its territory, and with assurances to respect international agreements, it could be assumed that there also were no problems in pursuing our relations with the world community. However, it was already known that in view of the internal weakness of the extremist groups, a huge propaganda and financial machine was organized abroad to return control of the government with foreign assistance to the leftists who vowed "to fight to the end."

With the complicity of countries such as the United States, Venezuela and Ecuador and unfortunately even Peru, in addition to others who meddled in matters that did not concern them, a policy of strangulation was begun through blackmail, threats, slander, intrigue and noncooperation. At that moment the Foreign Ministry's calvary began as it was forced to use everything at its disposal, despite so many limitations and obstacles, to conduct activities fraught with difficulties which gradually began to bear fruit.

Much progress has been made on a road full of traps. Diplomatic recognition came, an explanation was made within the Andean Pact, our national dignity was defended before the OAS and the United Nations and we await, without haste, an improvement in the international situation.

But there are two important issues which must be raised immediately. The first is that the United States and the Andean Pact will continue their incomprehensible efforts to prolong the encirclement by continuing the policy of strangulation.

Second, that in a situation such as the present one, the Foreign Ministry will not be able to properly respond to the precipitous attacks on our foreign posts. The government must think carefully and with patriotism about these two issues.

Let's take a look. U.S. pressure has not ceased completely and on the contrary we can say that it has become harsher. It seems as though the Andean Pact is moving in the same direction at least politically because it has not changed its decision not to normalize relations as long as the National Government of Reconstruction does not show clear signs of being sincerely desirous of returning democracy to Bolivia. As for the EEC it is dancing to a U.S. tune while attempting to flatter the Andean nations. Therefore, nothing can be expected of them.

If a barren and difficult road lies ahead where every step is dangerous, we should make a supreme effort to avoid the difficulty.

Diplomacy will be the only way to overcome the difficulty. We have no weapons to scare anyone, nor oceans of oil underneath our soil, nor a geographic location such as Turkey's. We must value ourselves as we are and not deceive ourselves with ingenious ideas that we have many friends who will extend us a hand when we need it.

Our foreign service must plan those activities which it considers appropriate, but to do this it must have the cooperation of the best minds, make use of other capable and representative individuals and obtain the funds to carry them out. If on the contrary, the foreign service becomes, as in previous opportunities, an object of featherbedding and sinecures and if the embassies are placed under the direction of friends, uncles and nephews, then we cannot expect anything productive from our foreign policy.

Let us hope that the abuses committed by previous administrations are not repeated and that the chief executive will contain the present avalanche and not think of ambassadorships as payment for political services rendered or as gracious concessions to friends, relatives or sycophants. Our diplomatic service at this time has no room for those who would like to have good vacations paid for by the government, or for those who seek medical treatment at government expense, or those who simply want "to study" and above all save on round trip tickets.

It is up to the government then to have an efficient foreign ministry but it depends on the quality of the selection process because the individuals chosen will be responsible for the success of Bolivia's diplomacy or its failure if the foreign service is converted into a discredited den of debauchery.

PAPER COMMENTS ON SITUATION CREATED BY BEAGLE CONFLICT

[Editorial: "A Tense Climate"]

[Text] Any observer of international affairs cannot ignore the fact that Chile has only three neighbors and that its relations with all three are deteriorating. We Bolivians are familiar with the deep and insurmountable barrier which will continue to separate us as long as one of the greatest injustices on the American continent existing since the war of 1879 is not corrected. Peru has also been another victim of its southern neighbor's expansionism and recently small strides were made to restore the diplomatic missions to embassy status. As for Argentina, we all await the final outcome, not with certain anxiety, of the conflict which has come to be called "Beagle" and which a few years ago almost broke out in armed conflict.

Reports from Santiago, Buenos Aires and Vatican City indicate that representatives from both South American nations, which are fighting over some islands in the southern tip of the new world, have responded to the Holy See's recommendations for a solution to the boundary dispute. However, we were told that "mediation is still in dangerous waters." Some sources add that considerable difficulties have surfaced in the negotiations.

Several weeks ago when it appeared possible that the Vatican would come up with some guidelines, some contradictory positions, all encouraged by the Portales Palace, became evident. In one instance spies were caught in Argentine towns and in another the Chilean navy hampered the oil operations of the Argentine hydrocarbons corporation.

In any case, the Vatican's mediation efforts, which at the last minute prevented an Argentine-Chilean confrontation, do not seem to have helped find an agreement, instead the opposite is true. According to the GIORNALE NUOVO published in Milan, "the conflict seems to be moving rapidly towards a waiting period which could turn into a dead end."

While Chile reinforces and modernizes its fleet and purchases several new French Mirages for which it paid over $200 million, the Argentine armed forces announced the creation of an Army IV Corps and called up several categories of reservists "for training exercises."

It is true that to lessen the unrest between the two nations that are directly involved and among neighboring countries, Argentina officially speaks of the "vastness of its territory" and of its growing geopolitical and strategic importance. While the general on the other side of the Andes talks without pretense about Chile's sovereignty over the archipelago in the extreme southern tip of South America.

There is no question that the climate is tense again. If the two parties do not find or do not wish to find a rational method for peaceful coexistence, there will be gunfire rather than talks.

We might add that since the situation involves a harsh ruler who is imbued with notions of "imperial greatness," as Pinochet is, the problems which could arise in the near future will certainly be alarming.

LABOR MINISTRY PROMOTES NEW SOURCES OF EMPLOYMENT

[Text] The elimination of unemployment and underemployment by creating new jobs is one of the priority objectives of the Labor Ministry.

To meet this objective the Labor Ministry's Department of Sectorial Planning prepared a report which states that it is imperative to establish job security for the workers. The objective set forth by the Labor Ministry is an effort to get to the bottom of the social problems caused by unemployment.

The report goes on to state that the country's private sector plays an important role in curbing unemployment by contributing to a considerable increase in average production thereby helping to improve Bolivia's economic and social conditions.

The Department of Sectorial Planning's evaluation points out that until 18 July the Labor Ministry's functions were very limited in areas of basic activities: policy, objectives, budget and operational structure.

The fundamental policies of the labor system were weakened thus creating pools of basic programs which distorted the system and institutionalized anarchy in the labor sector. The objectives were politically oriented and resulted in misconduct which seriously hurt the nation.

The budget margin was used for subsistence expenditures which were not related to the programed objectives. The Labor Ministry's organizational structure was so seriously affected that the specific tasks it is responsible for suffered as a result.

Once the evaluation, which covered the period from July to December, identified the basic errors, corrective measures were drawn up in keeping with the policies established by the Government of National Reconstruction. These include a reorganization of its functions, an inventory of projects, rewriting the budget and a redefinition of socio-labor policy.

After 60 days of working to achieve national reconstruction, we can see changes in the labor policy, the establishment of labor system based on social policy, employment, wages, sanitation, cooperatives, workers training and social-labor research.

Social policy will work jointly with the process of national reconstruction and within it coherent and dynamic guidelines will be adopted for the Ministry of Labor whose functions are not only limited to regulating worker-employer relations through labor laws but it will also attempt to play the leading role in the nation's labor activities.

To deal with unemployment as a priority objective, the lack of investment capital and the small rate of savings in the nation, the Ministry of Labor will give a new image to the policies used to diagnose problems. The policies are in a precarious state and an effort will be made to establish policies which will guarantee the workers rights and define their obligations.

REAGAN VICTORY, MEZA COMMENTS--La Paz, 5 Nov (LATIN)--The Bolivian military government today applauded the election of Republican candidate Ronald Reagan, terming it an act of "maturity and devotion to freedom" by the people of the United States. General Garcia Meza told journalists that Reagan's election clearly shows that "the U.S. people have chosen a change." He added that it is even more significant that the election of a Republican candidate "interrupts a sequence of reelections in the northern country" and said that "a substitution in the political leadership of the United States opens the door for changes in its internal and foreign policy." Garcia Meza made these statements after an official spokesman admitted that Reagan's victory "surprised" the Bolivian Government "because of its magnitude." [Excerpts] [PY061246 Buenos Aires LATIN in Spanish 2244 GMT 5 Nov 80]

COMIBOL PRODUCTION TARGETS--COMIBOL's [Bolivia Mining Corporation] 1981 production will be increased significantly from 1980 production, especially tin production which is scheduled to increase from 18,500 tons to 21,060 tons. According to a report released by an official source, mining production targets for 1981 are as follows: silver production will be up 182.3 in 1981 from 150 FMT [fine metric tons] in 1980; lead will be up 11,476 FMT in 1981 from 10,000 in 1980; zinc will be up 35,293 FMT from 30,000 in 1980; cadmium will be up 149 FMT from 130 FMT in 1980; wolfram will be up 1,677 FMT from 1,613 in 1980; copper will be up 2,294 FMT from 1,850 in 1980 and bismuth will be up 9FMT from 0 in 1980. To achieve these targets, according to the report, the directors have instructed managers of the state companies in the mining system to take care to preserve the useful life of deposits by maintaining a 1-2 ratio between production and reserves. In other words, for every ton that is extracted there must be 2 tons in reserve. At the same time, geological studies will be conducted to help increase production, new deposits will be incorporated and expansion programs at all COMIBOL companies will begin primarily to locate new deposits and evaluate them to see if exploitation would be profitable. All plans and programs to increase production are designed to increase profits as well. General manager Col Abel Martinez said that "while meeting the planned levels of production was a challenge for the ability and will of the technicians and the workers, it should be made clear that the drive for increased production will make sense only if the minerals are efficiently used." PARTICIPATION IN IRAQI OIL, RAIL, ORDNANCE PROJECTS SURVEYED

[Text] When the Iran-Iraq war broke out 2 weeks ago, the question immediately arose in Brazil: what would happen to over 2,000 Brazilians who were working in Iraq, most of them on a railroad project of the Mendes Junior company? Having prepared a plan to remove its employees rapidly, Mendes Junior preferred to run a risk it considers "calculated," with the long-term objective of establishing itself solidly in a country rich in petroleum after the war ends. Mendes Junior has an advantage: its works project is outside the combat area. The ESUSA construction company, responsible for building a hotel in Baghdad and another in Basra, right in the center of the combat area, has had to reduce its Brazilian personnel from 55 employees to only 12. Also, BRASPETRO [PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation] International, Inc] had to withdraw its 55 engineers and their families from the Basra area, transferring them to Kuwait until the war ends. The BRASPETRO technicians are working on developing the petroleum deposit of the Majnoon field, 80 kilometers from Basra, assessed at 7 billion barrels (7 times Brazilian reserves). The company said that as soon as the Persian Gulf conflict ends it will work for the return of its employees to Basra.

Ten Thousand Workers Construct a Railway

Baghdad--To run a calculated risk in order to become definitely established in Iraq, a country rich in petroleum and with ambitious development plans. That is the philosophy of the Mendes Junior company, which is employing 10,000 persons, more than 2,000 of them Brazilians, in constructing a railway in the interior of Iraq. Mendes Junior is one of the few international companies, among the many now here, that did not repatriate its personnel and did not interrupt performance of its work. The program continues to be accomplished at its own risk, and its trucks continue to transport cement and other materials, unloaded by ships that are in the area of Basra, where the fighting is heaviest. The construction itself is entirely outside the most dangerous zone, for which reason the workers were not affected, unlike BRASPETRO, which was not in a position to keep its 180 employees in Basra, due to the many bombings, or ESUSA, which is constructing a hotel in the same city. The latter tried to go ahead with its work at the beginning of the conflict, until one day an Iranian aircraft arrived and machinegunned the building under construction.

This effort by Mendes Junior, however, has a price and the company hopes to receive compensation in the future when the war ends. Mendes Junior, according to its directors, Costa Dias and Francisco Mafra, is bidding on other provisions of the 5-Year Plan and intends to set up a large office in Baghdad to take care of the new projects, even after completing the new railway, which is expected to take 4 years.

When it is said that the company is running a calculated risk, it must be recalled that, for the present, the works are beyond the combat zone. But a plan has been established to remove the employees, should that be necessary. That would happen if the conflict were to be extended to other countries, such as Syria, for example. According to its directors in Baghdad, since the beginning this subject has been considered and, should it be necessary, no more than a few hours will be needed to transfer them to the other side of the border with Jordan. Mendes Junior has an enormous fleet of vehicles, more than 600, including buses, automobiles, utility vehicles, all of them indispensable for the work they are doing. It thus should never be necessary to resort to rented vehicles. The plan will be put into practice, if it becomes necessary, by gathering up the personnel at the various campsites located at 30, 215 and 350 kilometers from Baghdad.

More Technicians Will Depart

Belo Horizonte--Mendes Junior confirms it is completing preparations to reinitiat by the end of next week departure of Brazilians for Iraq. Initially, 37 technicians and workers who were on leave in Brazil when the Iran-Iraq conflict began will travel by way of Jordan. By February of next year, the company intends to send to the work sites about 400 more Brazilians, including some who returned to the country on leave after the conflict began.

In Iraq, Mendes Junior is constructing the railroad linking Baghdad to Al Qaim and Akashat, with a total length of 520 kilometers, in the northwest of the country, toward the border with Syria, on the right-hand side of the Euphrates River. It is a $1.3 billion project, considered to be of fundamental importance for the economy of Iraq, since it will establish the rail connection between the phosphate reserves, located in Akashat, and the processing mill being set up by a Belgian group in Al Qaim, from where the concentrate will be taken to Baghdad, by way of Hsaibah.

The work of building the railway was begun in September 1978 with the expectation of finishing it in December 1982. At the present time land-leveling works and construction of 75 bridges, mostly over temporary rivers, are being carried out. The railway will have 377 kilometers of single track, 144 kilometers of double track and 315 kilometers of sidings and branches, in a total of 980 kilometers of trackage laid.

The Iraqi railroad will have an operational speed of up to 250 kilometers per hour, much greater than that planned for the Steel Railroad, which will be the most modern in Brazil and whose top speed will be 90 kilometers per hour for loaded trains and 140 kilometers for empty trains. The minimum radii of the two railways are equal (900 meters), which means that both will have very gentle curves. But there is a difference in the maximum grade of the track: 1 percent on the Steel Railroad, compared to 0.7 percent on the Iraqi railroad (this means that in each 1,000 meters the Steel Railroad descends 100 meters [as published], which becomes 70 meters [as published] in Iraq).

Besides constructing the railway, on which it employs, together with Brazilians, technicians and workers of 24 other nationalities, Mendes Junior is already prequalified for other engineering work in Iraq: construction of a 130-kilometer stretch of an express highway that will connect the port of Basra on the Persian Gulf to the border with Syria.

Brazilian Tanks Already in Combat

Baghdad--Officially the management of ENGESA [Specialized Engineers, Inc] does not know on which of the war fronts its Cascavel and Urutu tanks are participating in combat against Iran, but it is informed that they are being used, although in a limited way. The company's director, Jose Luis Withaker Ribeiro, is now in Baghdad coordinating all technical assistance to the Iraqi military in regard to materiel of Brazilian origin. According to Mr Withaker himself, who met reporters wearing an olive-green uniform, ENGESA also furnishes the Iraqi armed forces and dozens of other international clients products such as boats, rations for troops, uniforms, etc. Above all, the ENGESA director tried to clarify reports that all the company's technicians had left the country when the war began. He asserted that only 10 instructors had left Iraq, because the courses were interrupted by the war. The others (about 20) remain and are caring for tanks returning from the various fronts, verifying the operators' satisfaction with their performance thus far. According to the company's representative in Baghdad, Farouk Mussa, a Jordanian who lived in Brazil almost 20 years, the vehicles are performing very well, judging by reports received from the operators themselves. Jose Luis Withaker explains that the limited participation by the Cascavel in the war is due to there not having been enough time to train the Iraqi soldiers. The courses began 6 months ago and at the beginning of the conflict few crews had already finished training. Moreover, this was also the explanation of Defense Minister Adnan Keralla when he gave an interview to reporters last week. Withaker does not welcome the criticism that Brazilian materiel has not been used more because it is inferior to Soviet materiel. Because it is a wheeled vehicle, the Cascavel has a top speed of 120 kilometers per hour, while the Russian caterpillar models do not go over 40 kilometers. Another argument in its favor is that the Cascavel can leave its base and be driven under its own power to the combat front, whereas the Soviet tanks are transported by semi-trailer, besides having frequent problems with desert sand infiltrating their gears. According to Withaker, under the conditions of this war the Cascavel is clearly superior to the Soviet materiel. Its equipment is also highly sophisticated, even more so than that of the tanks from Moscow. It permits frequency-modulation communication from one vehicle to another and has laser telemetry for more precise firing. Another characteristic pointed out by Withaker is the combat equipment that amplifies ambient light 50,000 times, allowing the Cascavel gunner to detect the enemy readily, even with a minimum amount of light, as from a lighted cigarette.

The theoretical course for a Cascavel operator uses the video-cassette system, with 120 half-hour tapes that the pupils study under guidance of Brazilian instructors. Jose Luis is not revealing the exact number of units now in Iraq, but there are estimated to be 250.

Soviet Armaments

The ENGESA director confirmed that his company makes parts for Soviet armaments, but explained: "It has to do with spare parts and technical manuals for certain types of tanks." About 7 years ago Russia withdrew 15,000 tanks from the Warsaw Pact defense lines and sold them at low prices to Middle East nations. Soon thereafter the problem of spare parts arose because these tanks were no longer being made, forcing the countries that bought this materiel to improvise repairs. ENGESA experts began studying the problem in detail and found solutions. Thus was begun the manufacture of parts and the conquest of a promising market. Now, in view of the success achieved, the possibility is being studied of manufacturing parts for some MIG aircraft models for the same reasons.

Jose Luis Withaker also reported the company's plans for new markets. It is now bidding on construction of air bases in Iraq. Its activities would be faciliting entry of companies from other sectors. Jose Luis cited the example of Chile, where the Brazilian Oldebrecht firm won the bidding for constructing a dam worth $700 million. In his opinion this happened only because ENGESA had been one of the few international companies not to participate in the boycott against the Pinochet regime after the fall of Allende. Its backlog amounts to about $4 billion.

Everything seems to be going well for ENGESA. But Withaker has one complaint: he doesn't think Brazilian exchange policy is very realistic. He also complains about vetos by the PNEMEM--"National Policy for Exporting Materiel of Military Use." On one occasion this agency prohibited sales to Bangladesh and on another interrupted exports to Argentina. Sales to that country were reopened recently. Finally, he denied rumors that ENGESA had been asked by Iran to sell it weapons. He said his company tries not to sell weapons to two potential enemies. On two occasions, during the previous regime in Iran, advisers of the shah were told that it would be impossible to megotiate any sale, as the company was already negotiating with Iraq.

Hotel Construction in Baghdad and Basra

Rio de Janeiro--Before the Iran-Iraq war began, ESUSA Engineering and Construction had 55 Brazilians working on two hotels that are being built in Baghdad and Basra. Because of the conflict, that number was reduced to only 12, concentrated in the Iraqi capital.

In Baghdad, ESUSA had been building a 282-room hotel with 19,000 square meters under roof, concentrating in the capital all its administrative infrastructure under the responsibility of a general manager, its only employee who lives in Iraq with his family.

According to the ESUSA financial director and manager for the international directorate, Hercules Dutra, the situation in Basra is more serious, inasmuch as Iran concentrated in this city its military operations against Iraq. The company is constructing a 152-room hotel there with 14,000 square meters under roof. At present there are only two Iraqi watchmen employed on the site.

Hercules said that 41 Brazilians were withdrawn recently who were working in Iraq, as they were near the end of the contract and there was no building material. Despite the Persian Gulf conflict, ESUSA is bidding on construction of 2,000 prefabricated concrete houses for the armed forces of the United Arab Emirates in Abu Dhabi.

Company Prefers to Withdraw Geologists

Rio de Janeiro--Although there was no danger of Iranian attack in the area of the Majnoon field, where BRASPETRO discovered a supergigantic oil field, the company decided to transfer to the capital of Kuwait 55 geologists, engineers and other technical personnel who were there to render services to INOC [Iraqi National Oil Company], Iraqi state enterprise, in developing that deposit.

According to BRASPETRO Vice President Joel Mendes Renno, the transfer occurred without any problem and the company's employees were carried by bus to the capital of Kuwait, about 2 hours from Basra, where they had been housed.

The withdrawal was adopted in agreement with INOC management in order to preserve the safety and peace of mind of the employees and their dependents, a total contingent of 180 persons. As soon as the conflict is over, BRASPETRO will seek the return of its employees to Basra, according to the company's vice president. The Majnoon field, which has petroleum reserves of 7 billion barrels (7 times Brazilian reserves), is located about 80 kilometers from the city of Basra.

How Many Stayed, How Many Left

The 2,400 Brazilians who are working to construct the railroad linking Baghdad to Al Qaim and Akashat are spread out along the 520 kilometers of its course, at several posts. There are 150 Brazilians at kilometer 30 of the railway's route, working in the administrative office; at kilometer 160, there are 180 Brazilians on a movable front for ground leveling and bridge building; the main camp is at kilometer 215, with residences, hospital, school, recreation club, restaurant and supermarket, where 1,150 Brazilians are concentrated; another 400 Brazilians work at kilometers 235 and 280; at kilometer 350 there are 500 Brazilians in a permanent camp for ground-leveling work. Finally, at kilometer 388 there are 100 Brazilians already laying track, which was begun in the middle of September. ENGESA had 30 employees in Iraq before the war and now has about 20 there, providing technical assistance for their Cascavel and Urutu vehicles. ESUSA is building two hotels, in Baghdad and in Basra, and had 55 Brazilians employed on this work before the war. This number is now reduced to 12. BRASPETRO, in turn, withdrew its 55 engineers and geologists and their families, totaling 180 persons.

POLLS SHOW MUCH PUBLIC DISINTEREST IN EXISTING PARTIES

Results of Gallup Polls

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 15 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] A large part of the public "has no preference" for any of the existing political parties, according to a report published by the Gallup Institute. The report, which analyzes several public-opinion surveys made during the entire process of abolishing the two-party system and establishing a multiparty system, also shows that, among those who expressed a preference for a given party, the popularity of the PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Mobilization Party] and the PDS [Social Democratic Party] has been growing (that of the PMDB, more rapidly), while all other parties have been losing their initial popularity.

Three nationwide surveys made in March, May and August this year show growing popular indecision about the new parties, with the total of the "none of the above" and "have no preference" answers rising from 30 percent to 35 percent and then to 39 percent. Meanwhile, PMDB levels went from 10 percent in March to 15 percent in May and on to 16 percent in August. Right behind came the PDS, which had 13 percent in March, then 16 percent in May, but fell to 15 percent in the August survey.

All the other parties had constantly falling indices, with the PTB [Brazilian Labor Party] going from 22 percent to 16 percent and finally to 12 percent in August. The PT [Workers Party] went from 18 percent to 12 percent to 9 percent, and the PP [Popular Party] fell from 7 percent to 6 percent in May, maintaining the same level in August. The PDT [Democratic Labor Party], although only entering the survey in August--not having been established at the time of the previous surveys--had the lowest index, only 3 percent.

These figures show two trends in public opinion: one, of growing indecision and apathy toward party politics, with levels bordering on 40 percent of the population; and, on the other hand, a continued strengthening of the two major political parties, with the consequent weakening of the other groupings, which, should this trend continue, could result in a two-party system in fact hidden behind a multiparty system in appearance.

Between the two major parties--the PMDB and the PDS--it is noted that neither holds the majority of popular preference, achieving very similar indices: In May the PDS had 16 percent, against 15 percent for the PMDB, and in August these positions were reversed, while maintaining the slim difference of only 1 percent between the two parties.

Another survey, conducted last August, intended to ascertain preference for the new parties according to national regions and size of cities, showed that the PMDB has a greater share in the state capitals and large towns, gaining a large advantage over the PDS in states of the Southeast region (Rio de Janeiro, Sao Paulo, Minas Gerais and Espirito Santo), with 17 percent of the popular preference against only 8 percent for the government party.

The same survey shows, however, that indecision about party preference or disillusionment with existing parties is very great in several regions of the nation. Except for the Southern region, which has the lowest rate--only 31 percent answer "none of these parties" or "have no preference"--all other regions and cities surveyed show percentages going from 38 percent (North/Center-West region and state capitals) to 44 percent (Northeast region) and 45 percent (medium-sized cities).

State capitals are the place of greatest preference for the PMDB, with indices of 21 percent, and also the place of its greatest advantage over the PDS. The government party received only 9 percent of the popular preferences, equal to the rates obtained by the PTB, but remaining behind the PT, which had 14 percent.

As the size of the cities decreases, so does support for the PMDB, while preference for the PDS increases. In large cities, the PMDB still defeats the PDS, by 19 percent to 14 percent, but beginning in the medium-sized cities the advantage passes to the PDS, with constantly rising percentages. As for regions, the PMDB had its highest percentages in the North and Center-West regions, with 19 percent, Southeast, with 17 percent, and South, with 16 percent, while the PDS had 24 percent in two regions--Northeast and South--and 21 percent in the North and Center-West.

Among other parties, the PTB showed strength in the South and Southeast regions--14 and 13 percent--and in small towns--14 and 16 percent--while the PT had higher indices in the Southeast region--12 percent, in the capitals and in the large cities --13 and 10 percent. The Southeast region, state capitals and small towns are the main stronghold of the PT, with indices of 7, 6 and 6 percent respectively, while the PDT has its strength concentrated in the South--8 percent and in the state capitals--4 percent.

By means of other concurrent surveys, the Gallup Institute also shows that the level of available information about the new parties has been growing progressively, and reveals that when the two-party system was abolished the MDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement] was in the midst of a constantly rising trend at the same time that a steady decline in the number of ARENA [National Renewal Alliance] sympathizers was being observed. With the end of both parties, these trends were interrupted and a significant increase in indifference to parties was noted.

In another survey, where the persons interviewed were asked to identify among the various abbreviations which parties support the government and which oppose it, the PDS was identified as the government party by 46 percent, while 44 percent identified the PMDB as the party of the opposition. All the other parties received smaller percentages than those of the PMDB. But 56.5 percent of those interviewed were unable to answer the question.

Editorial Deplores Indifference

[Editorial: "The Disinterest in the Parties"]

[Text] The public-opinion survey made by a specialized agency in regard to preferences of the Brazilian electorate for the new parties showed a disturbing fact: from 30 to 39 percent of those consulted expressed disinterest or lack of concern about political organizations, either because they do not identify with those now existing or because they do not even have any interest in political developments.

It is even possible--although improbable, given the competence of the agency--that the survey has errors and that the sampling system used to obtain the data, in encompassing small groups of voters, presents a mistaken view of real trends in national opinion. Above all, this may not be the best time to measure voter opinion about the new parties, now that cancellation of the municipal elections and extension of the mandates of mayors and city councilmen already elected by the old parties has created a climate of confusion or even disenchantment about what may occur in the future.

Even so, the disturbing figures remain and, until proven otherwise, are what we must rely upon to interpret and analyze the political expression of public opinion. The disinterest in political activity, even at the height of "liberalization," shows that the nation's burden inherited from the recent past, during which politics was considered an abominable activity, is perhaps much greater than what would be considered likely. The abstinence imposed by the regimes of the institutional acts sowed the seeds of disbelief that will continue for a long time, like a nightmare, to disturb our dreams of creating an institutional system that is to be strengthened through participation by public opinion and not through action of the public power.

Parties are not magical institutions that are built overnight. In real terms, Brazilian parties had only 20 years of useful life, between the redemocratization of 1945 and Institutional Act No 2 of 1965, which extinguished them. Since then, until the end of 1979, they were simply electoral fronts--supporting or opposing the government--created without doctrine, without ideas, without goals. And, just when they were beginning to define their ideas and goals, they were abolished.

The multiparty system that took their place is the fruit of the dispersion throughout the years of the institutional acts. Inexperienced children of an epoch of depoliticization, they are what they are due to not having been in a position to be better. The years of authoritarianism removed the possibility of emergence of political leaders, suspended political thought. Today we have five political parties, without any one of them having explained where it came from, where it is going, why it was formed, on behalf of what platform it was organized. The parties continue to be interested only in votes, without any vision of what future society and future state the current liberalization should lead to.

Among party leaders, no one behaves like a statesman. The level of their concerns is low, desolate and barren. Their supposedly new ideas are summarized in repetition of old commonplaces adapted to circumstances of the moment. One and the other, government and opposition, political leaders continue to ignore the nation and its interrelationship with the world. Politics continues to be a backyard game, at times even in good faith, at other times in keeping with brazenly self-seeking motives.

Real politics, honorable and good politics, continues to be beyond the scope not only of public opinion but especially of the so-called political leaders. When, moreover, the people must concern themselves with their daily sustenance, is it any wonder they do not think about the politics we have now?

HIGH COMMAND TO UNDERGO MAJOR SHAKEUP IN 1981

Sao Paulo VEJA in Portuguese 24 Sep 80 pp 24-25

[Text] The collapse of General Milton Tavares de Souza, commander of the 2d Army on 25 August, during Soldiers Day commemorations, was not caused by sunstroke, as reported in the official story. The fact is that the general suffered a cardiac arrest caused by coronary insufficiency. After that incident, Tavares de Souza suffered two more cardiac arrests and 2 weeks ago he had a pacemaker implanted. He already has three bypasses, all in good condition but jeopardized by obstructions in the coronary network. When he left the Beneficencia Portuguesa Hospital on Thursday, the general limited himself to repeating the statement he had made a few days before: "I want to die in the command."

According to military legislation, he will leave the command and go into the reserve in November 1981. Until then, eight other four-star generals will leave the active service after having completed their term in the rank of general--12 years: Generals Antonio Bandeira, Ernani Airosa, Antonio Carlos de Andrada Serpa, Rui de Paula Couto, Florimar Campello, Gentil Marcondes Filho, Benedicto Maia Pinto de Almeida and Geraldo de Alvarenga Navarro. Thus, in only 14 months, the Army High Command will have undergone the quickest and most profound renovation in its history. Nine of its present 10 members with the right to vote will be replaced. The first of them, General Antonio Bandeira, commander of the 3d Army will already be going into the reserve this November. The radical change in the High Command will bring about the promotion of one of the last batches of colonels who had a prominent participation in the 1964 movement.

The burden of transportation--Bandeira's vacancy in the High Command may be filled by General Hermann Bergqvist, interim chief of the General Personnel Department since General Antonio Carlos de Andrada Serpa was removed from that position last April for having made political statements the government considered to be a brash nature. Bergqvist, 63 years old, is an introvert who does not like to grant interviews. A man with an athletic bearing and deep voice, Bergqvist until 1977 commanded the 3d Army Division (the most important military unit in the country), with headquarters in Rio Grande do Sul. If Bandeira's vacancy slips away from Bergqvist, it may go to General Alacyr Frederico Werner, 64 years old, former commander of the 10th Military Region in Fortaleza who this Wednesday will assume the position of deputy chief of the Army General Staff.

Whether or not he moves ahead of Bergqvist, Werner will get his fourth star when another vacancy opens up in the High Command. Werner was secretary general of the Army Ministry when General Belfort Bethlem replaced the dismissed Minister Sylvio Frota, and General Hugo Abreu, dismissed from President Geisel's Military Household, was organizing the candidacy of General Euler Bentes Monteiro for the presidency of the republic. At that time, he acted as a moderator between Minister Bethlem and the dissident Abreu. He believed that the army should act more firmly against Abreu only if his brother-in-arms were to really represent a serious threat to the unity of the armed forces. In 1978 he was practically chosen to become chief of the National Intelligence Service (SNI) to replace General Figueiredo, who had unencumbered himself of his duties to occupy the presidency of the republic.

Like Werner, Major Generals Heitor Furtado Arnizaut de Mattos and Tulio Chagas Nogueira, both classmates of President Figueiredo at the Realengo Military School in 1937, will be promoted to generals by March or July. The promotion of both may give a lift to General Bento Jose Bandeira de Melo, placed at the head of the list of major generals in the Army Register. Bandeira de Melo, who worked for 13 years with former Minister Sylvio Frota, was the general's office chief when he was dismissed from the ministry; he disappointed his friend because he remained in the position for the first 2 months of Bethlem's administration. Frota never talked to Bandeira de Melo again, but even so the latter never lost the reputation of being a "Frotaist" and precisely because of that he may lose the fourth star. However, Figueiredo always took pride in the fact that he did not allow the persecutions of military dissidents, which he himself suffered before 1964, to be repeated during his administration.

Stepped Aside--Arnizaut de Mattos also lived some anxious moments in October 1977 when he was in the Planalto Military Command. On the day of Frota's dismissal, he told the former minister that he obeyed the orders of President Giesel. Frota wanted to arrest him and tried to prevent Arnizaut from leaving the room where the tense dialog had ensued. Figueiredo is in the habit of calling him "Zozo." A man of very strong temperament, and presently deputy chief of the Department of Training and Research of the army, the general convened reporters on the day he left the Planalto Military Command to complain that the press only reports hunger, coup d'etat and crimes. He was succeeded in that position by General Heitor Luiz Gomes de Almeida, "Frontier Heitor," a nickname he acquired because he spent his career in military units based on the country's frontiers.

A personal friend of President Figueiredo's and his classmate in 1937, the present chief of the Planalto Military Command, 63 years of age, is very religious. In July, when Pope John Paul II landed in Brasilia, General Gomes de Almeida was among the officials who greeted the Pope and was one of the few who bowed and kissed his hand. Whereas the promotion of General Gomes de Almeida is regarded as probable in Brasilia military circles, that of General Rosalvo Eduardo Jansen, deputy chief of the General Services Department of the army is still shrouded in doubt. Jansen, 62 years old, was connected with General Euler Bentes Monteiro when the latter's dissident candidacy to the presidency of the republic flourished. As soon as Bentes Monteiro's candidacy was launched by the MDB, Jansen sent him a report with information about the Amazon region. In that document, he advocated the establishment of a fifth army command in the jungle. But that was all Jansen did for Bentes Monteiro. He remained supportive of Frota when there were rumors that President Geisel, without the knowledge of his minister, planned to punish the then commander of the 3d Army, General Fernando Bethlem, the author of a document criticizing the political opening. But when Frota was dismissed, Jansen remained silent. His promotion is uncertain.

A certain one is that of the silent General Henrique Beckman Filho--related to former President Eernesto Geisel and indicated in Brasilia as the future commander of the 2d Army--similarly certain is that of General Sergio de Ary Pires, a personal friend of Minister Walter Pires. Ary Pires, 62 years old, has already encountered problems because of his explosive temper. In 1964 he threatened to request a transfer to the reserve because he ran the risk of not being promoted to colonel that year. He did not terminate his career because his colleague Alzir Benjamin Chaloub, who was to have been promoted ahead of him, stepped aside and Pires was promoted to his new rank.

Now Chaloub again, like Ary Pires, is on the eve of another promotion, and should get it by November 1981, when General Euclydes Figueiredo, the president's brother and present commander of the 1st Army Division in the Vila Militar in Rio de Janeiro may also be sporting his fourth star.

PROPOSED MILITARY STATUTE PROHIBITS GROUP STATEMENTS

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 15 Oct 80 p 6

[Text] Brasilia--The new military statute proposed to the national congress by the president of the republic yesterday would prohibit members of the armed forces from making "any group statements either concerning actions of their superiors or making demands or political comments," and would also provide that the military can only turn to the courts after all forms of administrative recourse have been exhausted.

These are some of the points differing from the statute in effect, according to the explanation of justification which Gen Ferraz da Rocha, chief of the EMFA [Armed Forces General Staff] sent to the president of the republic. The new statute begins with the provision that the situation, obligations, duties, rights and prerogatives apply to the "members of the armed forces" and not "the military," as the present legislation reads.

Differences

The proposal sent to the legislature regards the members of the armed forces reserve as being on active duty when they are called up, drafted, reincorporated or mobilized. Among the rights guaranteed the members of the armed forces is the payment of compensation based on full soldier's pay, when an individual who does not have 30 years of service is transferred to the paid reserve, ex officio; and compensation corresponding to the next higher rank or level thereof if he is transferred to inactive duty after more than 30 years of service.

The draft law also reconciles the statute with other laws in the country, among others that on divorce, regarding a female companion living with a member of the armed forces for more than 5 years as his dependent, provided there is a legal impediment to marriage. In addition, it eliminates the supplements paid for spending more than 6 continuous months subject to military court-martial; it combines the time spent in the last peacetime post in the various corps, cadres, branches or services; guarantees the right to obtain immediate pension benefits for those with more than 30 years of service; and defines a part of a year equal to or more than 180 days as 1 year for the purposes of totaling actual service time at the time of assignment to inactive duty, ex officio.

OPPOSITION FACES PROBLEMS IN ORGANIZING PARTIES

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 14 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] While the government party and the Brazilian Democratic Movement Party (PMDB) have already scheduled their requests for definitive registration from the Superior Electoral Court (TSE) for December, the other opposition parties are encountering difficulties in organizing in the states and municipalities within the period of 1 year established by the party reform law.

Eight months after the new legislation on political parties went into effect, the Workers Party (PT) of Luis Ignacio da Silva has not even requested its provisional registration from the TSE and officially it is not recognized by the electoral court. The Democratic Labor Party (PDT) of Leonel Brizola is waiting for its provisional registration to be granted it within the next few days. The Popular Party (PP) of Tancredo Neves and the Brazilian Labor Party (PTB) of Ivete Vargas, already provisionally registered, are striving to consolidate into directorates the municipal committees that are still operating provisionally.

The Brazilian Social Democratic Party (PDS) and the PMDB are unconcerned with regard to the time periods set by the electoral court and have already scheduled their municipal, state and national conventions which will elect their definitive leaders. In the meantime, the other parties are preparing to use the nomination procedure, permitted by the law recently approved by the president of the republic, to choose their chairmen and secretaries, who will convene their respective municipal conventions. The TSE established 1 year as the period within which the provisionally registered party must select its municipal leaders and, with the exception of the two major parties, everything indicates that the other parties will find it difficult to surmount that obstacle.

The easiest situation is that of the PDS, whose president, Senator Jose Sarney, believes it will not have any difficulty in fulfilling the legal requirements during the specified time. He wants the party's municipal leaders to be elected at conventions and in principle does not want to order the provisional regional leaders to make those nominations.

Sarney revealed that the PDS already has almost 2,500 provisional municipal committees formed. Its provisional registration was granted on 12 June but the PDS is not going to use the whole year that the electoral court has given it to organize definitely: it has scheduled municipal conventions for 5 October, regional conventions for 9 November and the national convention for 30 November. According to his estimates, the party--which has the largest bloc in the Chamber of Deputies with 222 deputies, and in the senate with 37 senators--will request its definitive registration from the TSE on 2 December.

On the other hand, the president of the PMDB, Ulysses Guimaraes, admits that in some states the party is going to use the prerogative of nominating the chairmen and secretaries of municipal committees although the party is in a position to hold its conventions within the period established by law. As the secretary general of the party, Aldo Fagundes, explained, although that nomination is of a "bionic" nature, it is a prior step to the holding of municipal conventions.

The PMDB has already distributed instructions for the municipal conventions to be held on 12 October, advising its registered voters to follow the law. According to that guidance, 27 September is the final date to join the party in time to vote and 2 October is the last day for registering competing slates. The regional conventions will be held on 23 November and the national convention will be held on 7 December.

Financial Difficulties

Appearing unconcerned with regard to the organization process, the president of the Popular Party, Tancredo Neves, explained that the PP decided to schedule its municipal, regional and national conventions for next year due to financial difficulties and because of hopes of electing voters from other parties dissatisfied with the outcome of their respective conventions.

"Caution prevailed," said Tancredo, relating that many congressmen favored more speed in that work of party organization. He revealed that the municipal conventions are scheduled for 29 March, the regional ones for 3 May and the national convention for 7 June. Miro Teixeira, secretary general, pointed out that the PP has already issued instructions for the holding of the conventions of the 2,500 provisional municipal committees in operation.

The Popular Party obtained its provisional registration last week and is in no hurry because, according to the law, it has until September of next year to request definitive registration from the TSE.

Lidovino Fanton, secretary general of the Democratic Labor Party, points to the decision of the TSE which gave the PTB label to Ivete Vargas in justifying the delay of Leonel Brizola's group in terms of organization. Having to redo all of the documentation pertaining to the 614 provisional municipal committees already installed, the PDT is still without provisional registration and is awaiting its approval this week.

Fanton said that the PDT was organized in 11 states and one federal territory, in one-fifth of their municipalities as called for by law. After gaining provisional registration, Leonel Brizola's party is going to think about the municipal conventions it will have to hold, with or without the nomination of the municipal chairman and secretary.

With only one deputy in the Chamber of Deputies, Ivete Vargas' PTB theoretically should be the first group to register definitively. But there are reports that the Vargas group is having difficulty in holding its municipal conventions although its provisional registration has been approved since May.

The PT is the party that is encountering the greatest difficulty in registering. The party does not yet have its provisional registration and operates only in the congress for legal purposes. According to Airton Soares, its leader in the chamber, provisional registration will be requested from the TSE on 6 October and after approval of the request, the PT will have 1 year to organize definitively.

Airton Soares declared that the fact that the party does not have a political tradition and is being organized "from the bottom up" despite the presence of Ignacio da Silva, has made the job difficult and only on the 30th of the month will it be in a position to fulfill the requirements of the TSE to obtain provisional registration, namely: to have provisional municipal committees in at least 20 percent of the municipalities of 11 states, provisional regional committees in 11 states and an established provisional national committee.

PP Sets Dates of Conventions

The Popular Party has decided on the dates for holding its municipal, state and national conventions, and the state executive committee of Sao Paulo yesterday began to distribute a pamphlet with explanations of how to effect new party memberships.

According to the decision adopted by the party's national executive, the PP's municipal conventions will be held on 23 March 1981. The state conventions are scheduled for 3 May and the national convention for 7 June.

In addition to notifying its municipal groups of the convention schedule, in the pamphlet that it is distributing, the PP state executive committee, presided over by former Mayor Olavo Setubal, conveys a message to all those who helped organize the PP "despite the pressures and challenges." In addition, it considers that "an important stage in the process of democratizing the country has been surmounted."

ACTIVITIES OF COMMUNIST PARTY REPORTED

Prestes Reopens Struggle

Sao Paulo FOLHA DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 21 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Luis Tenorio de Lima of the Brazilian Communist Party (PCB) Central Committee said yesterday that Luis Carlos Prestes' long interview with the weekly HORA DO POVO, covering the whole last page of the edition that began to circulate Friday "is a repetition of the Letter to the Communists, with the same purposes that failed on that occasion." As may be recalled, with that letter Prestes practically opened a split in the party to the point of being ousted as secretary general.

In the interview, Prestes mentions that he has the support of at least five regional committees, a statement that is not taken seriously by the present leadership of the PCB. "It is not a sin to play with numbers," commented Tenorio, who attributed the interview to the "increasing erosion" of the former leader, interested "in returning from obscurity." Jose Sales, also of the party leadership, regretted that Prestes has decided "to intensify the struggle against the party and against a policy that was approved with his support" (in the interview, Prestes stated that the PCB is being dragged along behind the other political forces and acts timidly).

Prestes also announced the resumption of the newspaper VOZ OPERARIA, the official spokesman of the party; number 161 is reportedly already circulating. But the present Central Committee does not know whether or not the publication has been resumed, which would be another "divisionist attitude" inasmuch as the weekly VOZ DA UNIDADE already fills that function, although it cannot assume it formally because the PCB continues to be an illegal organization.

Luis Tenorio de Lima was to speak to his colleagues in the leadership to know whether or not there is going to be a reply to the former secretary general although he has given to understand that there will not be any: "Those who cause divisions have no future; that has been demonstrated from Trotsky to the present time." Jose Sales struck the same keynote: "The attitude of dividing any opposition party, including the Communist Party, only facilitates the action of those who want to return to a climate of terror."

PCB Congress in 1981

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 24 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] Sao Paulo--The seventh congress of the Brazilian Communist Party (PCB) will be held in Brazil in 1981 since the communists believe that the climate of political opening will be maintained until that time.

The decision is diametrically opposed to the position of the former secretary general, Luis Carlos Prestes, who is in Cuba at the invitation of Prime Minister Fidel Castro. He believes that the congress should be held only when the PCB has been legalized.

According to the PCB leaders, the congress is in an advanced phase of preparation and the communists are presently preparing the topics that will be discussed at the meeting. The last PCB congress was held clandestinely in Brazil in 1967.

GUIMARAES URGES FEDERATIVE DECENTRALIZATION OF POWER

[Interview with Deputy Ulysses Guimaraes, chairman of the PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Mobilization Party], in Brasilia: "It Is Time to Decentralize Power and Recreate the Federation"; date and name of interviewer not given]

> [Text] Brasilia--Deputy Ulysses Guimaraes, chairman of the PMDB, acknowledges existence of an economic crisis. But that crisis, he says, begins with politics, because "as long as Brazil is Brasilia, as long as Brazil is the central power, there will be no solutions for problems." He therefore summarizes, on behalf of the PMDB, a basic proposal of the opposition: "to make this country a real federation, by decentralizing power." There are other proposals in the party's platform, he asserts, beginning with the idea of the Constituent Assembly. Merger, national union, liberalization are, to him, words that have yet to be defined more precisely.

[Question] The joint committee rejected the substitute resolution proposed by Senator Aloisio Chaves, with two votes of the PDS [Social Democratic Party]. How should this be interpreted?

[Answer] The amendment named after Flavio Marcilio, president of the Chamber of Deputies, seeks, not recovery of the congressional prerogatives [as such?], but of [the principle of?] congressional prerogatives. Some prerogatives, because Congress must be an independent power. The reason for the existence of Congress, even in the concept of division of powers that comes from Montesquieu, is that well-known one: only power can control power. If the Congress is a power, it can control the executive power. If it is not, it cannot do this. Hence the decision taken by the joint committee seems to me to be a very encouraging sign. Also because the committee speaks of merit. We know that the work of Congress is now based on the committees; it is the committee that is important and, if the committee made the decision to endorse the amendment named for Chamber President Flavio Marcilio, it seems to me to be a significant fact, because a while ago this could not possibly have happened.

[Question] In what way is it a significant fact?

[Answer] I contend that in the legislative branch--in Congress, really--there are clear signs that this yoke, this servitude, of being a subpower, a power by sufferance, of being sacristans in this black mass of authoritarianism, of being an echo rather than a voice, is coming to an end.

We are seeing in Congress itself this desire to harmonize with society--to be an agent of society's political will and not of the unilateral decisions of authoritarianism--a desire not to be a mere appendage, an antechamber, of Planalto Palace.

I was quite encouraged by this decision because it was a sign that our cause--which is not ours, but Brazil's--of regaining democracy is gaining adherents. We are aware that personalities in the government area--Celio Borja, Flavio Marcilio--and those who voted for the amendment--Djalma Marinho and others--are Brazilians who feel they have had enough.

[Question] Couldn't it have been just an error in communication between the leadership and its followers?

[Answer] Leadership does not depend upon persons, but upon ideas, upon principles. A climate of authoritarianism in Congress is not leadership, however capable the government's spokesmen may be. So one cannot speak of leadership within the Congress, especially when such leadership is exercised with the understanding that the Congress is not a Congress. It is a controlled congress, a dependent congress, a congress manipulated by the executive power.

[Question] If the episode is not, strictly speaking, a matter of exercising leadership, what would be the most accurate explanation?

[Answer] It was a defeat of the power, defeat of the system. The government is being defeated systematically, so much so that the system is neither on the offensive, on the defensive nor in retreat. Because retreat is also a strategy. In this case, it is a flight. A flight from elections, a flight from the ballot box, a flight from debate, a flight from the responsibility it would have to take of saying yes or no. We see the government--or the system--hemmed in by its own mistakes, with triple-digit inflation. Something that I learned in Germany: triple-digit inflation, I was told by experts, demolishes any government, any system.

[Question] What will be the political consequence of all this?

[Answer] I am not making a prediction. Politics has human elements; unforeseeable, imponderable elements. This carries much weight in politics. In a country where the keenest political observers could never include suicide in their calculations, it happened--the suicide of Getulio Vargas. Carlos Lacerda, who was at Praia Vermelha, asserted: "This shot did not lodge in the heart of Getulio; it lodged in the nation's heart." And the situation changed immediately. In a nation where the resignation of a Janio Quadros occurs, there is no foreknowledge at all. I contend it is impossible for this situation to continue, as everything is against it, all forces, even those that are frequently opponents--capital and labor.

Hence, I do not believe they have the strength to go on. If only because authoritarianism in Brazil has lasted much longer than it normally does.

I say that there have been 20 years of authoritarianism, because tomorrow or the next day it will be 20 years since the last time this country voted for president.

There are senators--Jaison Barreto, for example--who have never voted for president of the republic. History teaches that arbitrary regimes become old, powerless, forsaken, at a much younger age than this one.

[Question] What chances do you see for the Flavio Marcilio amendment in the two houses of Congress?

[Answer] I believe it will be approved by the Chamber. This is based upon what information I have, spontaneous statements in the halls of the Chamber, by government deputies. The problem in the Senate is that the Senate is not the Senate. There are real senators and there are bionic senators, which is something else. There are the senators who were elected and there are those who were appointed by Planalto Palace. The presence of such senators, who do not represent the Senate, but the will of the executive branch, really creates a serious risk. In any case, I believe in miracles; there could be a miracle.

[Question] How does the opposition view the stated pledge of the president of the republic to restore democracy, combat terrorism and punish terrorists?

[Answer] It seems to me that in the case of President Figueiredo what occurred with the others is repeating itself. They go through the rhetorical exercise of democracy, they use the words of democracy. They promise to return the nation to democracy. It is necessary to see what kind of democracy this is; what the interpretation of democracy is.

The president who promised democracy and liberalization abolished the party of the opposition, which is the most vicious measure that can be adopted against any party; there is no democratic nation where parties can be abolished by decision of the majority.

What liberalization exists is creating unsustainable situations in the social sector, such as the 100 percent inflation. The governors who were appointed by this system during Figueiredo's term of office never had lower levels of popularity.

So we come to the sad conclusion that we have had 2 years of this government and it is fitting to ask: In what way have we advanced? Amnesty? It was a step. But mainly through social pressure, through social forces. In fact, in a certain respect, we are worse off than before. Before, for example, that majority said yes or no; now it says neither yes nor no; it remains outside of Congress, it downgrades Congress, a Congress that does not meet, deputies and senators that do not speak out on important matters.

This contaminates the legislative branch itself. Before, violence was perpetrated through AI-5 [Institutional Act No 5]; now, they want to do it through Congress. Extension of terms of office and other things.

I believe President Joao Batista Figueiredo may have the intention of making this country a democracy, perhaps even instilled in him by his father. But in reality we have not progressed in the sense of really being able to emancipate society from the yoke of authoritarianism that is stifling it.

[Question] What about the measures that have been taken in the process of political liberalization?

[Answer] I don't see that there has been any advance. We were going to have municipal elections; now we aren't going to have them. Congress, I repeat, is merely ratifying arbitrary decisions, undemocratic decisions. The economic sector is exhausted by currency erosion, by wage depreciation. And the social situation is most difficult.

[Question] Shouldn't such topics be used by the opposition to make proposals and seek negotiation?

[Answer] I am afraid the Brazilian situation is much more serious than it appears to be. The Brazilian problem--or the Brazilian difficulties--would be solved by a political platform feasible for Brazil and such a platform would only come about through a revolution, in the broader sense of the word. It is necessary to make far-reaching decisions. It is not a matter of merely surface treatment. The whole Brazilian social edifice is unacceptable because it is based in Brasilia; everything comes from Brasilia: the authority is in Brasilia; the budget is in Brasilia. The municipalities are in the position of beggars, of mendicants. The opposition's proposal is to make this country a real federation, through decentralizing power.

I contend that we must invert this pyramid. Brazil is a pyramid with its base in the air. Large populations live in municipalities that have nothing. They have no power, they have no autonomy. I contend that, in Brazil, if we carry out a process of decentralization of economic power, of political power, giving autonomy to the states and municipalities, we will be taking a step of major importance in terms of our civilization, in view of our 8.5 million square kilometers of territory and our 120 million inhabitants.

Germany was rubble, a pile of scrap iron 30 years ago, and today it has the strongest currency in the world, the lowest inflation in the world, a distribution of income in which the average wage is 100,000 cruzeiros.

What does Brazil lack? It has land. It has people. Are its people incompetent or lazy? They are not. What is lacking here? It is politics. Germany doesn't have petroleum; Japan doesn't have petroleum--exactly the nations that are strongest today do not have petroleum.

Income distribution and taxes are a scandal. In Brazil, indirect taxes bring in two-thirds of federal revenue and direct taxes, one-third. In the United States it is the reverse; two-thirds indirect and one-third direct [as published]. Indirect taxes are socially unjust. As was said, vertical inequality. And there is horizontal inequality, such as the inequality of the South in relation to the Northeast. Now, as long as Brazil is Brasilia, as long as Brazil is the central power, as long as we have this centralized presidentialism, we are not going to solve the problem.

The problem is not one of men. If what we have now were changed and became the PMDB or any other party, within this structure the same absurdities, the same mistakes would occur. More than men, it is things that are wrong. St. Thomas Aquinus said: "Order is putting things in place." That is order. It is order at home, order in business. In Brazil, things are in the wrong places. We must, therefore, call upon the youth of Brazil to do something serious and profound.

This is the proposal of the opposition; it in one of them. I submitted several. We are going to make direct income taxes greater than indirect taxes. Other nations have done that; why can't we? We are going to establish that this abyss between those who earn more and those who earn less is diminished. Because the nation's money is not inelastic; the amount of money does not change. So if you concentrate resources in a minority, the rest are not going to have enough.

[Question] Does the PMDB consider that all these things justify or require the so-called national union?

[Answer] Union today is a misconstrued word that has come to be interpreted as a formal union, a union of men, a distribution of cabinet posts, on an organic basis. I would not speak of union. What I mean is this: We should all join forces and discuss a series of ideas. We should not have the intention of solving Brazilian problems by making savage remarks. We could in that way choose some 10 or 12 ideas and progress with them.

The difficulty is that this means the end of authoritarianism, the end of the system. What we are now realizing in Brazil is that the greatest enemy of democracy has been this rhetorical process of liberalization.

In practical terms, this really amounts to standing pat, preserving the status quo, leaving everything as it is. To such a degree that in certain other countries where force is exercised more violently, without ceremony, without subterfuges, where congresses are closed and so forth, there have been conditions for more rapid recuperation than there has been in Brazil.

I don't believe in this liberalization. It isn't sincere. Certain ideas, such as this, should be discussed in the forum of the nation. If we use the national forum, we shall know whether or not these ideas are good or proper.

[Question] Doesn't this disposition for dialog in broad terms also involve dialog between the opposition and the government?

[Answer] The positions taken by the opposition are known and clear. Some people have the rather simplified notion that we are going to Planalto Palace to meet with the president--a physical meeting, that would resolve everything. But the intention is to put ideas in perspective, from a democratic point of view, to put ideas before the nation.

We are attempting dialog. We want dialog and we have our proposal: the constituent assembly, fidelity to our program. And what are the proposals of the government? That of the government is the extended hand. While they are speaking about extended hands, we are presenting specific proposals, with direct elections at all levels. They are talking about liberalization, but are not implementing, are not putting this liberalization into effect. And thus Brazil remains at an impasse--an impasse of what happens and an impasse of what does not happen. What is it that does not happen? Citizenship is not happening, the universal vote is not happening, the vote of the illiterate is not happening, a better income distribution is not happening. What is happening? Whatever the authorities want to happen: extended mandates are happening; the decision not to vote on the amendment. The Lobao amendment passes; not having inviolability passes and approving bills by the clock passes.

[Question] Besides the political crisis, there is the economic crisis. What is your position and that of the PMDB in regard to the economic situation?

[Answer] The crisis, intrinsically, is that of not having democracy. A nation that does not have democracy has nothing, because the presence of politics is essential in a nation. A nation that does not have politics is doomed to trouble. Today it is politics that destroys or that saves. It is politics, even, that declares war. So I mean a country that does not have politics because it does not have democracy is a nation in crisis, in crisis with society.

What is a crisis? It is the presence of struggle, the Greek word says. We are the spokesmen for society that wants its voice, that wants its presence, its rights, that wants respect for its demands.

The crisis is authoritarianism, dictatorship, tyranny. The measurement of crisis is the greater or lesser margin of authoritarianism. What in happening in Brazil is the great danger that mistakes made before are being repeated in today's crisis, with these enormous [price?] increases, including the case of petroleum. Just today, I had to take a taxi and the driver said he will have to quit. There are thousands of persons that are not able to survive in view of these increases. I know that our president is not responsible for the crisis, for the war between Iran and Iraq. But what happens is that democratic nations are in a much better position to absorb the impasses, to establish the dialectic of the controversies and go on to solutions than are autocratic systems such as Brazil.

[Question] Would holding direct elections in 1982 relieve this situation?

[Answer] I don't know. But I think we are reaching the historical limits of the nation's resistance, where everything is bad. Because the struggle against the government is now widespread. I repeat that even sectors that are in opposition to each other--capital and labor--are against it.

[Question] Doesn't the issue of merger indicate that the opposition also feels pressure?

[Answer] Merger must be examined closely. In the first place, I recall that Voltaire said: "If you want to argue with me, first define your words." First of all, we must define what is merger; first we have to baptize these words; we have to delve a little deeper. What is merger? Is it to create new parties? Or would it be combined programs of different parties in one given party? I don't know. I am saying this because I have heard persons speaking about merger using different vocabularies, and the Bible has demonstrated that this is very dangerous.

[Question] Isn't the opposition also discredited, partly because of the impasse over the idea of merger?

[Answer] I disagree with that. If the people think the government is good for nothing and neither is the opposition, we are all lost--people, government and opposition. Because one has to take his stand with someone. Or else create new options. We now have several parties and conditions for creating others.

I think the opposition is very strong. Think, no; it is indisputable that it is strong. Proof of this is that the MDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement] won the last two elections. First there was that cloudburst, which was worse than a storm, because a storm gives warning that something is going to happen. That was when we elected 16 senators. And the last election we had a 5.3 million majority in votes. So that we are not speaking of weapons, of swords, but of democratic weapons.

The opposition is very strong, and so much so that the government is fleeing. It invented the subparty, the Falcao Law; it extended mandates, thus demonstrating its weakness before society.

Seldom has the opposition been as strong as it is now. As I travel about, still long before elections, I am impressed. Just now, in a city in Paraiba, I saw over 5,000 persons at an opposition rally in the town square. Recently I was in Germany, and a speech given by Willy Brandt before 5,000 persons was considered a success.

[Question] When you speak of the opposition, are you referring to all parties?

[Answer] Yes, I am referring to all of them.

[Question] What about the activities of the PT [Workers Party], the party directed specifically to the workers, who were among the principle beneficiaries of oppositionist action during the time of the MDB?

[Answer] I am a specialist in reference to my own party. As for the others, I am not in a position to know. But I hope that such parties are being organized. Moreover, I think that alternative is the most feasible for civil power.

If we politicians do not organize our own party's house, how will we be able to organize the nation? The first demonstration of competence--and I am determined in this as chairman--is that we must first organize our house, put it in order, making it as solid as possible and most ample, to receive Brazilians. I therefore believe that those who have commitments with the parties must indeed create those parties, because only in this way will the various segments of society be recognized, forming a united potential power very important for all.

Traveling about Brazil, I note, in the hinterland, that we must create the parties, because through them wages, the standard of living and so forth can be defended.

A party unable to assume national responsibilities is really not a party; it is an academic center of speculative debate. A party has a commitment to reality, in anything it does. A party must have an appetite for power; a party without such an appetite is not a party.

Our party wants nothing other than power; it is in a position to assume power. If only because this is a very modest ambition, within present circumstances. If one were going out to compete with a talented slate of candidates who are leading the nation reasonably well, this could be some cause for concern. But to replace the party in power now, to replace the persons governing now, to replace the current cabinet ministers, to replace the government we have now, would actually be easy.

So that there is no doubt at all, the nation would benefit if the opposition came to power at any time. I assert that the opposition is prepared to assume power. When the party has been in power in important cities, it has been reelected. And not by the indirect vote, the bionic vote.

We have won elections in Campinas, in Londrina, and in many other cities, and elections are won by competence.

PROCEEDINGS OF 32D UNE CONGRESS IN PIRACICABA REPORTED

Congress Inaugurated

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 14 Oct 80 p 6

[Text] Piracicaba, Sao Paulo--The 32d congress of the National Students Union (UNE) was inaugurated at midday yesterday at the Methodist University of Piracicaba by the president of the organization, Rui Cesar Costa e Silva, who noted that this was the first time in the past 16 years that UNE officers have succeeded in officially inaugurating a congress.

In addition to the rector of the Methodist university, Elias Boaventura, and the prefect of Piracicaba, Joao Hermann Neto, the inauguration was attended by representatives of the Palestine Liberation Organization, Farid Swan and Kaled Abdul; the president of the Piracicaba PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement Party], Francisco Antonio Coelho; the president of the PT [Labor Party], Luis Inacio da Silva (Lula); and Deputies Pacheco e Chaves, Fernando Moraes, Alberto Goldman, Aurelio Peres, Airton Soares, Rubens Lima, Geraldo Siqueira; and the representative of the PDT [Democratic Labor Party], Eusebio Rocha.

The rector of the Methodist university and the prefect of Piracicaba, as well as Rui Cesar, spoke at the opening session.

Denial

The spokesman of the Itamaraty Palace, Bernardo Pericas, said in Brasilia that the UNE does not exist legally and this may be the reason which led the Brazilian embassy in Panama to review the visas requested by the Cuban and Vietnamese delegations which wanted to attend the UNE congress.

The spokesman said that he is not certain about the reasons for the refusal by the Brazilian embassy in Panama. He said however that the visas requested are not justified, "because the reason for the trip was to participate in the congress of an illegal body."

Strike Discussed

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 15 Oct 80 p 6

[Text] Campinas--The calling of a national strike to demand more funds for the universities, the method of electing the new officers of the National Students' Union and the affiliation of that body with the International Union of Students with headquarters in Prague, Czechoslovakia, are among the subjects on which there is divided opinion among the 5,000 students, 3,000 of them with voting rights, attending the 32nd congress of the UNE being held in Piracicaba.

The main resolutions will be defined in the two plenary sessions today and tomorrow, but it was possible yesterday to see the differences existing among the factions in the student movement. The calling of a strike in the public and private schools in response to the effort to establish paid schooling is urged by the Liberty and Struggle group, the only one organized on a national level, which also has support for its proposal from the New Path and Point of Departure factions. The purpose of the strike would be to obtain a freeze on annual fees and expanded budgetary allocations for education.

There are doubts as to whether the strike would be launched this year or in the first half of 1981 and how long it would last. There are many, however, who regard this strike as a serious threat to the continuity of the student movement.

With regard to the election of the new UNE officers, two suggestions have been made: an election during the congress and direct elections in the schools themselves for the university complex. The latter suggestion however would involve difficulties in setting up voting at all of the institutions. While this issue has not yet been decided, the slates of candidates for the presidency of the body are being drafted. As of yesterday, the main slates were headed by the former vice president of the UEE [State Student Union] of Sao Paulo, Marcos Galvao; the vice president of the UNE, Marcelo Barbieri; the secretary-general of the UNE, Aldo Rebelo; and the president of the UEE of Rio de Janeiro, Amancio de Carvalho.

The Methodist University of Piracicaba, on the other hand, where the congress is being held, issued an official statement denouncing the presence of "unauthorized persons with tape recorders and cameras" near the campus where about 1500 students are housed. The officers of the UNE issued another statement to the effect that the participants in the congress were not responsible for the daubing of automobiles with paint which occurred in the city during the early-morning hours, which the student organization attributed "to forces affiliated with the dictatorial regime which is still trying to prevent the holding of the congress."

Yesterday, the students discussed the status of Brazilian education and the general situation in the country, among other subjects.

Direct Elections Scheduled

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 16 Oct 80 p 14

[Text] Campinas--The new officers of the National Students' Union will be chosen next month in direct elections in balloting held at all the universities in the country. This was the first decision adopted by the 32nd congress of the UNE which will end today in Piracicaba. After 4 hours of debate, the resolution was approved last night by about 60 percent of the 2,664 delegates registered at the congress.

Direct elections were defended by the present officers of the body, who were elected in October of last year, and by the groups known as Remodeling, Advancing, Hands at Work and New Path, with opposition from Liberty and Struggle, Agreement, Spark, Unity and the DCE of the USP [University of Sao Paulo]. Of the delegates with voting rights, 637 are from Rio de Janeiro and Espirito Santo, 616 from Sao Paulo, 404 from the North and Northeast, 319 from Rio Grande do Sul, 257 from Minas Gerais, 206 from the Center-West region and 185 from Parana and Santa Catarina. Today they are to decide whether the election of the new officers will be held in November.

The votes on other motions were to continue into the early-morning hours today. By the end of the evening, various groups agreed, in the debate on problems in education, that a national campaign should be launched against "the abusive increase in annual school fees" and in favor of the establishment of a 12-percent minimum for union budget allocations for education. One of the suggestions is that caravans be formed in all the states to converge on Brasilia during the vote on federal budget allocations in the national congress.

The 5,000 students attending the congress are divided on the subject of the question of annual fees between those who want negotiations with the MEC [Ministry of Education and Culture] about a standard 35-percent increase index for 1981, without review during the school year, and those who defend the establishment of a percentage only after classes have ended.

Also during the debate yesterday, a consensus was reached to the effect that subsidies for private schools should be continued "provided the need for school operations is demonstrated and the students have control over the application of the funds." Another matter discussed was democratization within the universities, with motions on the forms of student participation in the collegiate bodies, in the elections of the rector, and others, being proposed.

On the subject of a national strike, the majority faction yesterday was opposed to it, for the reason that it would not be possible to continue a strike until victory was won, with the establishment of the 12-percent minimum for education.

The plenary session yesterday began 3 hours late because of the disappearance of 300 registration slips, making it necessary for the UNE officers to accredit the delegations previously registered again. The representative of the International Union of Students, with headquarters in Czechoslovakia, Rafael Ruiloba, of the Federation of Panamanian Students, arrived at the premises where the congress was being held at the beginning of last evening. He is scheduled to participate in the debate today on the affiliation of the UNE with the international body, one of the subjects on the agenda for the final plenary session of the congress.

Police Report on Congress

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 16 Oct 80 p 9

[Text] Sao Paulo--The Sao Paulo DOPS [Department of Political and Social Order] received a secret report yesterday on the activities of the students, religious and political representatives participating in the inaugural session of the 32nd congress of the National Students' Union in this city. The report, drafted by police agents in the Intelligence Service (SI), especially assigned to surveillance of students, made various criticisms of the rector of the Methodist University of Piracicaba (UNIMEP), Elias Boaventura.

The police agents who wrote the report accused Boaventura of having his "attention devoted entirely to the holding of the UNE congress, instead of pursuing efforts to pay professors, whose salaries have gone unpaid for several months." The report also criticizes the rector for allowing the congress to be held at the university.

"No newspaper in the city bothered to report that the UNE students came to cause a disturbance in Piracicaba. It is they, the students, who have painted the walls and cars in the city, even threatening trade, which for 3 days has had to face a prolonged '11 August,' with painting everywhere," the secret report said.

Theft of Badges

After stating that the students received support from the prefecture and the university, the police supplied a list of speakers--including some political and religious leaders--said to have committed "a succession of offenses against the government, in particular Father Otto Dana, who called the central government fascist, dictatorial and other similar names."

The debates at the congress in Piracicaba yesterday were delayed by more than 5 hours due to the theft of the delegates' identification badges. In view of this, new badges were hastily produced, but redistribution to the delegates took until 1700 hours yesterday.

Strike Motion Rejected

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 18 Oct 80 p 11

[Text] Campinas--With the presentation of five slates of candidates for the new National Students' Union officers, with the election scheduled for 12 and 13 November, the final plenary session of the 32nd congress of the UNE, which began at 1400 hours day before yesterday, did not end until 0900 hours yesterday. Voting on various resolutions, the majority of the 5,000 students participating rejected the proposed "general strike" for better educational conditions in the schools, preferring to plan a "national day of struggle" to be held during the voting on the federal budget for next year in the national congress, at which time the 12-percent minimum for education will be demanded.

As the congress ended and the delegates left the premises in Piracicaba, all appeared tired after the 19 hours of work which were interrupted only for 1 meal. Many had lost their voices, a number fainted during the discussions, and there were dozens of cases of food poisoning.

One of the resolutions of the congress scheduled demonstrations to be held on 15 November throughout the country to urge the election of a national constituent assembly and to criticize the postponement of the municipal elections. Other political decisions adopted at the gathering called for the investigation of the terrorist attacks and the punishment of those responsible, revocation of the national security law, and a demonstration of support of the workers' demands.

With a view to the democratization of the universities, the students want direct elections for the post of rector and an increase in the representation of students in the collegiate bodies from one-fifth to one-third. Affiliation by the UNE with the International Union of Students, with headquarters in Prague, Czechoslovakia, in which students from about 90 countries are members, as well as the Continental Organization of Latin American Students (OCLAE), with headquarters in Havana, Cuba, was approved.

The composition of the five slates competing for officers' posts in the UNE was not announced until the final hours of the congress. The first, offering a general line of action based on the decisions at the congress, with Marcos Galvao, former vice president of the Sao Paulo State Students' Union, as its candidate for president, was the result of an agreement reached among the groups known as Remodeling, Resistance and Advancing. Another slate was drafted by Liberty and Struggle, New Path, Spark (from Minas Gerais) and Battle (from Rio Grande do Sul), but as of yesterday a decision on its candidate for president had not been made between Valerio Arcari, of Rio, and Ricardo Mello, of the USP philosophy faculty. A third slate is headed by the present secretary general of the UNE, Aldo Rebelo, and is supported by the Hands at Work, Agreement and Unity. Other slates included those headed by Lidia Tumon of Minas Gerais and Amancio de Carvalho, of the Rio de Janeiro UEE.

PC do B CC MEMBERS OUSTED--The leadership of the Communist Party of Brazil, whose secretary general is former Deputy Joao Amazonas, ousted the regional commands in the states of Sao Paulo and Bahia and five other members of the Central Committee, the newspaper MOVIMENTO reported yesterday, under the caption "Radical Outcome of Internal Struggle." The paper announced that in order to fill the vacancies left in the party following the deaths of three of its principal leaders in the Lapa district in Sao Paulo, the leadership decided to name six new leaders without holding elections, something that has not happened since 1962 when the 32 members of the leadership were elected. Many of those 32 members no longer exist: five of them were killed in the guerrilla action in Araguaia, others disappeared after they were expelled or ousted after disagreeing with the top leadership and the official line of the party. Among the best known of those who were ousted now is the Bahian peasant leader, Jose Novaes, who publicly criticized the leadership. Those who were expelled demanded the holding of a party congress and disagreed with the evaluation made of the results of the Araguaia guerrilla action. MAGAZINE ANALYZES ZALDIVAR BANISHMENT

PY312035 Santiago QUE PASA in Spanish 29 Oct 80 p 5

[Editorial: "The 'Zaldivar Case'"]

[Text] The right to live in his native country is one of the individual's fundamental rights and one that takes precedence and stands above any positive law.

Under our legislation, this right can only be suspended temporarily, either as a penalty or as a preventive measure.

The penalty of banishment in this case is to be applied through a sentence imposed by a competent court following trial in accordance with legal procedures. Under the terms of Decree Law No 604 that regulates it, the preventive measure is said to be necessary in order to spare the country a serious disturbance--so serious that its prevention demands, as an imperative and unavoidable need, the suspension of the individual's fundamental right to live in his own country.

In the "Zaldivar case," according to the resolution of the interior ministry, the return of the Christian Democratic leader to the country is forbidden as a preventive measure, not as a penalty. However, the penalty would not apply without the intervention of a judge, following due process of law.

As a merely preventive measure, the ban on Zaldivar's return does not seem to have basis in facts of such a gravity as to justify this extreme measure. If Zaldivar's actions or declarations imply a legal violation or a call for violating the law or an incitement to subversion or any other crime, the case could be classified as a legal misconduct deserving sentence under the law and punishable by the courts.

If what is sought is to prevent Zaldivar from making declarations and actions which are termed dangerous by official communiques, there is no possible way of preventing them, either by keeping him out of Chile or through a simple promise by him "to obey the constituted government, the juridical order in force and the new constitution," a statement demanded by the government to permit his return. One of the two: Andres Zaldivar is either so dangerous that he must stay out of Chile, and in such a case it is naive to assume that the statement will annul his dangerousness; or he is not so dangerous, and in such case, the measure adopted to ban his return to Chile is in itself unjustified.

On the other hand, no legal text authorizes the interior ministry to solicit the mentioned statement. It is known that government employees can only do what the law expressly permits them to do. It is not proper for a public official invested with a discretionary power to condition its use vis-a-vis private citizens, on actions or statements by the latter which are not provided for in the law that has granted that power.

Finally--and precisely because such a demand is not provided for in any law, but derives from discretionary power--the requested statement is not so simple as it looks. It should be clarified that "to obey" a juridical order does not imply relinquishing the right to pursue its modification through legal channels.

Nothing links this magazine (as is known) to Zaldivar. We have not shared his ideas or supported his party or his or its actions. But we believe that a mistake of serious consequences has been made by banning his return to the country. Its correction would not be "losing face" politically; on the contrary, it would demonstrate the serene self-reliance that the regime and the military government have always displayed as the best evidence of their legitimacy and the support enjoyed among Chileans.

ULTRALEFTISTS HOLD UP BANK--Santiago, Chile, 3 Nov (AFP)--The semiofficial Orbe Agency reported that a presumably ultraleftist armed commando today held up a bank in the Chilean capital and got away with $64,000 worth of loot. In a combined action, six members of the commando entered the Loans and Investments Bank, in southern Santiago, and pointed their Soviet made AK rifles at the employees and about a dozen clients whom they forced to lie on the floor. Before leaving the bank, where they broke into the cash desks, a young man who was acting as chief of the group shouted that the popular resistance will always win. The witnesses of the hold up said that the unidentified man also shouted other things against President Augusto Pinochet's government. According to the first reports, the attackers got away in a car, firing their arms to frighten away the curious. One person was wounded. The police and intelligence services immediately launched a vast dragnet operation in several neighborhoods of the capital in order to capture the authors of this second hold up that has been carried out in the past 3 months. The outlawed Movement of the Revolutionary Left (MIR) claimed responsibility for the simultaneous hold ups of three banks which took place here on 28 July 1980 in which a guard was shot dead during a shootout. U.S. COURTS 'LACK AUTHORITY'--Santiago, 6 Nov (AFP)--Mauricio Flisfisch, president of the Chilean State Defense Council, said here today that in compliance with U.S. law, U.S. courts lack the proper authority to issue an injunction against Chilean property in the United States or in other countries. Flisfisch did not give much importance to press reports that a U.S. federal judge has ordered the Chilean government to pay $2.9 million to compensate for damage and injury for the assassination in Washington of former Chilean Foreign Minister Orlando Letelier. Flisfisch stated that in compliance with U.S. laws, there is no possibility of issuing an injunction against Chilean property. He said: "This is something completely false, and it is not in compliance with U.S. law." [Excerpts] [PY071351 Paris AFP in Spanish 0239 GMT 7 Nov 80]

MORE MONEY REQUESTED FOR ATLANTIC COAST MILITARY

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 8 Oct 80 p 12-A [Text] In the judgment of Congress, the budget for defense and for the improvement of military, naval and air force installations ought to be bolstered.

This was the conclusion reached by the Second Senate Committee after an inspection tour of military installations on the Atlantic and Caribbean coasts this past weekend.

The very infrastructure and defense materiel (aircraft, ships and other combat equipment) of some branches are in poor condition.

The chairman of the Second Senate Committee, Norberto Morales Ballesteros, stated that it was urgent to shore up the country's military budget, to overhaul military installations and update combat equipment.

Five senators on the Defense and Foreign Relations Committee conducted a 72-hour inspection of military bases at Bellavista, Barranquilla, Cartagena and San Andres. They were accompanied by Gen Carlos Narvaez, commander of the Second Army Brigade on La Guajira; Air Force Col Alberto Leal Baquero; Rear Adm Tito Garcia Motta, from the Cartagena garrison, and Navy Cap Pedro Jose Gutierrez, stationed at San Andres, among others.

The Second Senate Committee decided to take the tour to receive detailed information on the military budget, infrastructure and equipment and to learn about the tactics pursued by the army, navy and air force to safeguard national sovereignty.

Sites Visited

On a tour of the "Rondon" Task Force installation at Bellavista, just 15 kilometers from the Venezuelan border, they discovered that this was a difficult zone to work in and that it poses obstacles in setting up infrastructure.

During their inspection of transport facilities the senators found out about the condition of tanks and other transporters and saw the confiscated vehicles yard, where motor vehicles seized during drug raids are kept; 80 of them are currently being stored there, pending judicial rulings.

They were told how the Guare Indians are doing military service and going out on patrols in the region in the battle against drug traffic.

In conclusion, they were told about the good relations between Gen Carlos Narvaez and the commander of the Maracaibo Division with regard to settling border disputes and the need to maintain permanent surveillence because of the upcoming marihuana harvest.

In Barranquilla they saw the facilities at the Second Air Combat Command Base at Ernesto Cortissoz Airport, where the platform is expected to be completed by 1982.

Meanwhile, the facilities are being leased to the Colombian Armed Forces (FAC); six confiscated aircraft are being kept there and used for reconnaissance, in addition to a C-47 commercial transport plane that was seized for not having a landing permit.

The Second Committee was then told about the crisis at the ARC naval training base in Barranquilla. Estimates are that 63 million pesos would be needed to develop the infrastructure there.

According to Navy Capt Jaime Sanchez Cortes, these funds have not been allocated in the budget and would be earmarked for the modernization of government housing facilities, the command building, the crew quarters building, arms, health care, administration and the main lecture hall.

Also included are the projects for repairing and paving roads, the routing of gutters, the construction of a sewage system, street lighting and a power network, construction of the loading wharf and sports facilities.

A report was submitted on the base's budget, demonstrating that the funds allotted it currently are inadequate. For example, 85,000 pesos are earmarked for public utilities, whereas the total cost is 150,000 a month.

Separately, Captain Garcia showed the committee how even with a low budget they managed to build a general mess hall and a classroom building valued at 10 million pesos but that still does not have chemistry and physics laboratories or furniture.

In connection with the ARC base in Barranquilla, the committee promised to have the two laboratories built and to seek a budget increase for the next fiscal year, inasmuch as the cadets are trained there who will serve in Cartagena and then return for a specialization.

In Cartagena they visited the Naval Garrison of the Atlantic, the Admiral Padilla School and First Marine Command.

At the naval command the committee inspected the modern facilities, the torpedo plant and one of the submarines that recently arrived from Germany, where the necessary repair work is done on them every 5 years.

Some $400 million are needed, on the average, to completely update the "7 de Agosto" and to repair the "20 de Julio," vessels acquired by Gen Gustavo Rojas Pinilla.

We do not have all of the infrastructure needed to modernize our old defense equipment, which could provide airborne assistance and monitor our natural resources in the ocean.

A report was submitted on the possibility of financing and maintaining the navy with only one percent [sic], which could be obtained from the sale of the marine resources now caught by foreign vessels.

Finally, the committee listened to the request for a naval air force to safeguard our national sovereignty and defend our territorial waters, as well as the need to boost the pay of Naval School staff.

The committee's last tour of inspection was at San Andres and Providencia, and they flew over the keys of Roncador, Quitasueno and Serrana.

They heard about the housing difficulties encountered by Air Force personnel and the impossibility of keeping food fresh. They were also told about the work being done by Task Force 11 (land, air and sea) and the need to build a navy dock on the island.

There are problems in supplying fresh water, which is needed every third day to clean the aircraft and prevent corrosion.

The senators brought up the possibility of asking the Development Ministry to order the total transfer of the headquarters of the Tourism Corporation on San Andres so that hangars could be built for aircraft repair.

The Second Senate Committee also met to consider military promotions, which will have to be ratified by the full Senate, and passed a resolution to ask the Federal Government for an increase in the defense budget.

It was announced that the senators on the committee, Norberto Morales Ballesteros (chairman), Guillermo Benavides Melo, Praxedes Bolanos Britto, Lucena Ossman de Duque and Jose Vicente Mogollon, would meet with President Julio Cesar Turbay to brief him on the situation at each of the commands they toured.

CHAMBER REJECTS CAMPAIGN--Bogota, 6 Nov (EFE)--The Colombian Chamber of Representatives has strongly rejected the "insidious" campaign underway in Venezuela against Colombians concerning "draft" Colombian-Venezuelan agreement to delimitate their maritime areas, it was officially reported here today. A chamber plenum approved the action. The rejection says that such an unfair and groundless attitude contrasts with the serious attitude of the Colombian public toward the issue. "As chamber representatives we voice our strongest rejection of the way an insidious campaign has been conducted in some media in the fraternal Republic of Venezuela against the Colombian people due to the discussion of a draft treaty being drawn up by the Colombian-Venezuelan negotiating committee," the rejection note states. It adds that this attitude contrasts with "the seriousness with which the Colombian public and media have dealt with the already delicate issue, despite the obvious concessions made by Colombia, some of which we could hardly agree with." We know, the chamber adds, that the majority of Venezuelans and their government don't agree with the dangerous campaign which threatens to harm the excellent traditional, fraternal relations between the two countries. It warns that "even if we resort to an international tribunal, that should not affect the ties of friendship and mutual respect between Colombia and Venezuela and between their nationals, who are linked by historic and geographic reasons which compelled them to come together to discuss their nations' problems." MILITARY PREDOMINANCE CRITICIZED--Gilberto Vieira, secretary general of the Communist Party of Colombia [PCC] in Bogota denounced the predominance of the military over the Colombian Government mechanisms. As an example, he noted the state of siege which has been in effect for over 30 years, the promulgation of the state security statute in 1978 and the generalized application of military justice. Vieira's declaration is included in the political report of the PCC Executive Committee to the 13th PCC Congress which began on Friday. The top Colombian communist leader criticized the warlike tendencies of the United States and emphasized the need to clarify the important role that the USSR, the other socialist countries and the nonalined countries are playing as the main centers of the struggle for peace. A delegation of the Cuban Communist Party, headed by Jorge Enrique Mendoza, a member of the Party's Central Committee, is participating in the PCC's 13th Congress in Bogota. RAUL CASTRO CHAIRS ARTILLERY ANNIVERSARY COMMEMORATION

FL031358 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1145 GMT 3 Nov 80

[Text] Army Gen Raul Castro, second secretary of the PCC Central Committee and minister of the Revolutionary Armed Forces [FAR], has presided at the commemoration of the 20th anniversary of the FAR artillery held at the Comdr Camilo Cienfuegos Artillery School. During the event, which ended with a military parade, Pedro Miret Prieto, member of the PCC Politburo and founder of the FAR artillery, made a speech.

Div Gen Raul Menendez Tomassevich, chief of the Central Army, accepted the flag accrediting that command as winner of the national artillery competition carried out throughout the country with the participation of all armies. The winning group was the Central Army's 130-mm field gun unit which held maneuvers and conducted live fire at the Corralillo proving grounds. Lt Col Jesus Martin Jimenez accepted the winner's pennant and the certificate of founder of the ground artillery. The winning general headquarters was that of a Central Army artillery brigade and Col Eusebio (Paumier) Salas, founder of the ground artillery, accepted the pennant.

During the ceremony certificates of founders of the ground artillery were presented to Pedro Miret Prieto, Antonio Nunez Jimenez, Col Jose (Morfa) Gonzalez, Lieutenant Colonels Alvaro Lopez (Miera), Enrique Alvarez Valdes, Juan Samper Lopez and Felix Delgado. Comrade Diosdado (Aeropacito) Montero, who together with Pedro Miret founded the FAR artillery in the Sierra Maestra, also received a certificate.

In a speech Pedro Miret stated that when the threat of aggression against the Fatherland was real, thousands of youths volunteered for military service and began to learn how to use the arms to contribute to the consolidation of the revolutionary power. He said that the process climaxed on 2 November 1960 when members of the Rebel Army and youths of the revolutionary national militias joined the combat units. He noted that the presence of Commander in Chief Fidel Castro in the artillery units had been an inspiration to overcome the first tests under combat and that with his everlasting example he had shown the unavoidable need for taking up arms in defense of the revolutionary gains. He added that a large number of those youths have remained in our glorious armed forces and today are excellent command cadres and artillery technicians who, with their experience and dedication, train the new generations of artillery personnel.

Subsequently, Pedro Miret referred to the role played by the artillery throughout the years and mentioned its decisive participation in Giron and noted its successful fulfillment of internationalist missions in Angola and Ethiopia. [Begin Miret recording] On arriving at the 20th anniversary of the ground artillery, we can proudly observe the gains made in the formation and cohesion of its units, in the combat and political readiness and preparedness, in the results obtained in maneuvers, exercises and training and in the determined fulfillment of the internationalist missions assigned to it. All this has been the fruit of the selfless and arduous efforts of its chiefs, political agencies, organizations of the party and the union of young communists, officers, sergeants and soldiers who, with a high degree of political and moral awareness as well as discipline, have responded with great determination to all tasks assigned by the high command. [End recording] In closing, the PCC Politburo member congratulated all members of the ground artillery on behalf of the FAR minister and urged them to continue to work to raise the level of combat readiness.

The ceremony concluded with a military parade in which officers and students of the Comdr Camilo Cienfuegos Artillery School, Western Army, Camilo Cienfuegos Military School students and members of the reserve participated. Various types of ground artillery equipment, among them BM-21 rocket launchers and 130-mm field guns, also paraded.

PEASANT COOPERATIVES MOVEMENT EXAMINED AT MEETING

FL052108 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 2103 GMT 5 Nov 80

[Text] With slightly more than a month to go before the start of the Second Party Congress, the National Association of Small Farmers' (ANAP) fulfillment of tasks assigned to it by the historic First Congress of Cuban Communists is being examined. This is noted in the main report at the First National Meeting on Agricultural-Livestock Production Cooperatives which opened this morning at the economic management school in Marianao.

The report refers to 17 May 1974 at La Plata [Sierra Maestra] when Commander in Chief Fidel Castro urged peasants to start thinking about the need to advance to superior methods of production. From that point on, the ANAP took on the patient and systematic task of informing, clarifying and convincing each peasant family on advancing to socialist methods of production.

Elsewhere, the main report released at the First National Meeting on Cooperatives states that as of the third quarter of this year there are 1,017 agricultural-livestock production cooperatives in this country. These cooperatives cover a total area of more than 14,000 caballerias or the equivalent of 11 percent of the land of the peasant sector.

The province with the largest percentage of land under cooperatives is Ciego de Avila with more than 23 percent, followed by Las Tunas, Pinar del Rio, Matanzas, Villa Clara, Camaguey and Holguin. Of the existing cooperatives in this country, 302 are devoted to sugarcane cultivation, 264 to tobacco, 160 to tubers and vegetables, 85 to livestock and the remainder to other farm goods.

HUMAN RIGHTS SEMINAR OPENED--Elena Gil, member of the party Central Committee and president of the Cuban Movement for Peace and Sovereignty of Peoples [MPSP], has opened in Havana a seminar on human rights in honor of the 63d Anniversary of the Great Socialist Revolution of October. Representatives of liberation movements and progressive organizations of Latin America and other parts of the world are attending the seminar. In her opening speech, Elena Gil denounced the pharisaical human rights campaign launced by the United States with the aim of directly attacking the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. This aggressive attempt is directed against the very roots of peace and tries to show an image of socialism that progressive humanity indignantly rejects, she said. The representative of the Salvadoran Revolutionary Forces, Julian Rodriguez, also spoke at the opening session. He accused the United States and the democratic-christian [as heard] Government of Venezuela of arming the Fascists who are trying to exterminate the people of El Salvador. RUMORED DISMISSAL, STRIKE--The secretary of state for education says that his dismissal is simply a rumor. Eng Pedro Porello Reynoso has categorically stated that what has been said in this regard is not true. It is mere speculation, the secretary added. Porello Reynoso was asked about the stike of thousands of teachers over most of the country in effect since Wednesday. He said that when President Guzman discussed the situation, he clearly stated that the teachers who remain on their posts and act in a proper manner will have no problems. There is nothing to add--this is a closed case, the education secretary said. He said that there was no chance that the cases of teachers dismissed for alleged negligence in the performance of their duties would be reviewed. POLITICAL FIGURES COMMENT ON REAGAN VICTORY

PA061456 Quito VOZ DE LOS ANDES in Spanish 1230 GMT 6 Nov 80

[Text] Several of the country's political sectors have prudently analyzed the election of the new U.S. president. All of them agreed that the U.S. president must officially define his policy toward Latin America before they can air any definite opinions. Regarding this, politician Dr Rodrigo Borja Cevallos said the following:

"I am seriously worried over President Reagan's conduct in the international arena and over the possibility of U.S. interventionism, which might endanger world peace and security. Naturally, we, like the rest of the Latin American countries, must strengthen our position of rejecting all foreign interference in our domestic affairs. Above all, we must strengthen our defense of the prices of Latin American raw materials in the world market and of Ecuadorean and Latin American basic products."

For his part, Raul Baca Carbo, president of Parliament, talked about the need to strengthen continental democracy first. "The doubts and fears that might exist in connection with Reagan's election as president of the United States must simply make us think about the need to increasingly consolidate our democratic process, to consolidate and strengthen it internally. We must realize that certain foreign elements might be negative. That is enough reason not to add internal problems, when the idea is to strengthen the democratic processes.

"The election of the U.S. president is a fact; so is our need to strengthen democracy in this country. So I have faith that above and beyond any fear or doubt, Ecuadoreans will carry out the work needed to consolidate the democratic principle, while looking for the necessary consensus among the country's various sectors and political forces. This will make it possible to show that democracy in Ecuador is indestructible regardless of who is elected president anywhere in the world."

To conclude, here is Foreign Minister Alfonso Barrera Valverde's statement: "[In progress]...respect their decision. We, of course will wait for President Reagan and his advisers to define a policy. I would be ill advised to venture any opinion before hearing their plans. I would expect a serious country to define a serious policy. So, I repeat, I would be ill advised to venture an opinion without having even an idea of the policy that the new U.S. president will define."

[Question] [Unidentified speaker] Will the Ecuadorean Government congratulate the new U.S. president?

[Answer] It is not for me to say. The president will have to answer that at the proper time.

OFFICIALS COMMENT ON REAGAN ELECTION--Quito, 6 Nov (EFE)--Presidential spokesman Augusto Alvarado, in commenting on the election of Ronald Reagan as U.S. president, expressed the respect of the Ecuadorean government, "which loves democracy," for the decision of the U.S. people. The government, he added, by inclination defends democracy and could never make adverse comments on Reagan's legitimate victory. Similar statements were made yesterday by Foreign Minister Alfonso Barrera. Asked if Reagan's election represented any threat to Latin America, the minister expressed his hope that this would not be the case. I hope, he said, that a serious country will establish a serious policy. [Text] [PA071807 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1334 GMT 7 Nov 80]

MINISTER REFERS TO U.S. EMBARGO--The national government headed by lawyer Jaime Roldos Aguilera, has the obligation to enforce respect of the law among nationals and foreigners alike, Natural Resources and Energy Minister Cesar Robalino said during a news conference last night at the Office of the Fishery under secretary in Guayaquil. He discussed the retaliation measures of the U.S. Government. It has put an embargo on Ecuadorean tuna imports in reprisal for the confiscation of nine pirate tuna fishing vessels. We must defend our national sovereignty, Robalino added, explaining that this sovereignty extends 200 miles from the coast. He said this is the Ecuadorean people and government's policy. Unfortunately, therefore, he continued, as minister of energy and natural resources, he had to apply the law because the U.S. pirate fishing boats had violated legal codes. IMPORTANCE OF IMMINENT PEACE WITH HONDURAS NOTED

Peace Treaty To Be Signed

San Salvador LA PRENSA GRAFICA in Spanish 21 Oct 80 p 7

[Editorial]

[Text] The excellent mediation effort by eminent Peruvian jurist Jose Luis Bustamante y Rivero is practically drawing to a close.

In a report from Lima, the capital of Peru, transmitted by international news agencies, it is revealed that the illustrious mediator, Bustamante y Rivero, has indicated that the General Peace Treaty that will put an end to the dispute between Honduras and El Salvador, will be signed in the Peruvian capital at the end of this month. The date mentioned for the signing of the historic document is 30 October.

The signing of the General Peace Treaty between Honduras and El Salvador will bring to a successful conclusion 2 years of negotiations through mediation, with Bustamante y Rivera acting as mediator. During all that time, the parties never came as close as they are now to resolving one of the most damaging problems not only to the two countries directly involved, but also to the image of the entire region, of all of Central America. Central America is the only region in this hemisphere which has a group of countries united not only by geography, but also by their historic roots, their common ties of independence, their efforts for reunification and their struggle to emerge from the cave of underdevelopment. Thus, it is inevitable that the General Peace Treaty should have positive repercussions throughout the nations of the region.

Obviously the news of the upcoming signing of the General Peace Treaty between Honduras and El Salvador has been welcomed by the five brother nations of Central America, particularly, and by the other nations of America, in general.

In practical terms, the conclusion of the General Peace Treaty could reflect nothing more than the solemn written recognition of what has already happened: the beginning of the resumption of relations between Honduras and El Salvador. That was precisely what happened when El Salvador's foreign minister visited Tegucigalpa and held talks with the chief of state and foreign minister of Honduras.

Honduran Foreign Minister's Visit

San Salvador LA PRENSA GRAFICA in Spanish 24 Oct 80 p 7

[Editorial]

[Text] The Honduran foreign minister, Col Cesar Elvir Sierra, has just made an official visit to El Salvador.

The high-ranking official of the Honduran government came to San Salvador the day before yesterday to return the visit--also official--of the Salvadoran foreign minister, Dr Fidel Chavez Mena, to Tegucigalpa on 16 October.

Both visits could be interpreted as a desire to reiterate, to reaffirm, to repeat their expression of political good will in terms of the signing of the General Peace Treaty between Honduras and El Salvador.

Just as the Salvadoran foreign minister was received with cordial and fraternal demonstrations of affection by the president of Honduras, Gen Policarpo Paz Garcia and members of the cabinet as well as distinguished celebrities and representatives of the Honduran press, the same has happened on Foreign Minister Elvir Sierra's visit to El Salvador.

We must point out these circumstances because they prove that between Salvadorans and Hondurans there cannot but exist an undeniable feeling of brotherhood, a desire for mutual understanding, as is natural between two peoples that have never ceased being brothers. These feelings and desires go beyond mere protocol, penetrating to the very soul of the multitudes, the very soul of the nations. Chavez Mena could indeed attest to this after his visit to Tegucigalpa, as could Elvir Sierra after visiting San Salvador.

Thus, the visits by the two foreign ministers must be treated with due respect for their importance. They must be interpreted to the maximum degree, as the linchpin of the normalization of intra-Central American relations. The normalization of relations between Honduras and El Salvador is reflected, as we said in our editorial of Tuesday 21 October, in these visits.

Within the current sociopolitical context of Central America, this resumption of relations could run up against negative attitudes, but it will never lose its essence of sincere and genuine brotherly feelings. In years to come, it will be a beacon of Central American ideals.

LA PRENSA GRAFICA sends its greetings to the people of Honduras through Foreign Minister Elvir Sierra.

OPPOSITION PARTY'S PARTICIPATION--The main opposition party of this country's political arena--the People's Progressive Party (PPP) is definitely contesting the upcoming December 15 elections. But the party's general secretary Dr Cheddi Jagan has hinted that the PPP has a small chance of winning. He indicated at yesterday's press conference held at Freedom House some of the plans he had if his party managed to win. Dr Jagan disclosed that he would form a broad-based national front government comprising "patriotic" local capitalists, the intelligentsia, small businessmen, and farmers plus all those political forces that oppose the policies and actions of the ruling People's National Congress (PNC) and which share the PPP's views. But Dr Jagan said this "broad-based national front government" would not include PNC representatives, as he claimed that the party had no support in this country. "Despite our belief that the elections will be rigged and will be fraudulent the PPP will contest. But that does not mean we will accept the results. That question will be decided on later...like after the 1973 elections when we decided to boycott parliament," stated Dr Jagan. Earlier, in a statement read out to the newsmen, Dr Jagan said his party was also contesting the election, despite its slim chance of winning because "the PPP believes that it must utilize every forum, however, corrupt, to expose the reactionary, minority PNC regime and to raise the ideological-political consciousness of the masses, so as to advance the cause of the revolution." COMMUNIST PARTY LEADER DISCUSSES LEFTIST GAINS

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 21 Sep 80 p 19

[Interview with Rigoberto Padilla, secretary general of the Communist Party of Honduras, by Pedro Martinez Pirez in Havana; date not given]

> [Text] We discussed with Rigoberto Padilla, secretary general of the Communist Party of Honduras, when he was in Havana, the significant political events taking place in Central America, where the focal point of the Latin American revolution is located at this time.

Question: In the first place, could you make a comment on the development of the revolutionary struggle in El Salvador?

Answer: The Salvadoran people, faithful to their heroic traditions of struggle, have demonstrated their strength in the recent 3-day national strike, notwithstanding the brutal repression to which the mass organizations which sponsored the strike were subjected. There have been few occasions on which people have been subjected with such cruelty to such bloody repression as that unleashed by the repressive agencies against the strikers in a desperate attempt to impede the successful development of the strike. The inhabitants of the city and the countryside valiantly faced the repressive entities of the Christian Democratic military junta and showed that they are firmly convinced that it is through armed struggle and the mobilization of the working masses that they will topple a despotic regime which is assassinating El Salvador's worthiest sons with impunity, a bloodstained regime which denies the freedoms and social rights of the people and which is vainly trying to check anyone who is struggling today to give that fraternal country its second and definitive independence.

I wish to seize this opportunity to express to the fraternal Salvadoran people our feelings of solidarity, which not only motivate the communists of Honduras but also all the revolutionary and patriotic forces of our country which stand by them in these dramatic moments. The Salvadoran people, as the Nicaraguan people before them, will secure the victory for which they have shed so much blood.

Question: Concerning Central America, how do the Honduran revolutionaries appraise the triumph of the Sandinist revolution and the climax of the struggle in El Salvador and Guatemala in relation to Honduras?

Answer: A few years ago Central America was nothing more than a fief of American monopolies and Honduras was known as a banana republic, the quiet--or more or less quiet--backyard of the United Fruit Company. That situation has changed completely, and the political and social panorama of Central America is different.

Following the triumph of the Sandinist revolution a new stage is getting under way in the struggle of peoples on our continent against the rule of the oligarchies and against dependence on the United States.

After the triumph of the Cuban revolution no political or historic event has moved or affected our peoples so much as the victory of the Sandinist revolution because the latter signaled the start of a new stage in the liberating struggle of the peoples and demonstrated that it was possible to sweep away an oppressive regime such as that of the Somozas; because it showed in practice that it was possible to destroy an army like the National Guard trained by the United States starting in the 1930's, when Augusto Cesar Sandino, the general of free men, valiantly challenged the American occupiers.

The Sandinist revolution also demonstrated that the unity of the popular, democratic, and revolutionary forces could convert into reality the most cherished dreams of our peoples when fruitless sectarianisms are put aside--sectarianisms which have only helped to splinter those forces which are most rational, most honorable, most patriotic, and most honest in seeking change in Central America.

It is natural that the triumph of the Sandinist revolution should have had repercussions in Central America. It had immediate repercussions in El Salvador where conditions are ripe because of the degree of political awareness and because of the organizational level achieved by the laboring forces so that a popular uprising may also burst out there against a bloodstained dictatorship which is already half a century old and which, under different names and different labels, has maintained itself in power there ever since Maximiliano Martinez also massacred the Salvadoran people.

The people of El Salvador, just like those of Nicaragua and all our peoples, have reached the necessary and dramatic conclusion that there is no alternative other than armed uprising to topple a hateful tyranny which not only denies our peoples their most fundamental rights but which also denies them the right to a better life, the right to an independent life.

These facts which we have noted must necessarily have an import at the same time on countries like Guatemala where, since the fall of the democratic government of Jacobo Arbenz Guzman, there has been a succession of events which are really a challenge to the democratic conscience of America because it would be difficult to note a more abominable attitude of cruelty against the working classes than the attitude of the ruling Guatemalan class.

Every day 20 or 30 bodies of Guatemala's sons are found, people who in one way or another have struggled for their social and political rights. But there are no crimes which remain unpunished and in Guatemala, too, the patriotic forces have risen and they seek fervently the paths of unity to confront the genocidal government of Romeo Lucas Garcia.

These events in Guatemala in turn have consequences and form the outline for a new situation in Honduras, and I would say that the most outstanding fact in recent times is desire for unity which today motivates the efforts of all the patriotic and democratic forces of our country. We still have our differences, which is natural, but we also coincide in our firm resolve to liberate our country, to place our country's policy on a new path. We are determined that Honduras shall not be turned into what the Yankee imperialists wish to make it, that Honduras shall not become a base of aggression against neighboring peoples, that the Honduran army shall not be the new repressive army of Central America but instead that Honduras shall become the secure refuge of all those persecuted by the tyrannies which still remain in Central America, that Honduras shall become a unified base of those peoples who are struggling for their liberation, and that simultaneously in this united struggle the Honduran people will find, as they undoubtedly will, their way, the way leading them to their own liberation.

DRAFT BILLS ON TRADE, MILITARY, POLICE EXPLAINED

Police Role Defined

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 26 Sep 80 p 7

[Text] The Council of State has received one of the most important draft bills yet drawn up in the qualitative advances of the Sandinist process for the consolidation of the revolution's military agencies.

It is the "Law of Jurisdictional Functions of the Sandinist Police," which will regulate a series of situations, especially in the field of administering the country's police laws.

The plan includes, first, a definition of the functions of the Sandinist police: "...it is a military body dependent on the Ministry of Interior, charged with protecting the lives of the country's inhabitants, preventing crime, preserving the social order, overseeing respect for national, social and private property and giving necessary assistance to civil authorities in enforcing the law and in the discharge of their functions."

It also establishes that the police will exercise their authority throughout the national territory.

Police trial judges are created to combat crime, preserve the social order and assist with criminal justice.

Trial Judges

The judges will administer the regulations and the police laws. They may be Nicaraguans over 21 years of age, of good reputation and preferably lawyers, law students or other persons conversant with the law.

The regional delegates of the Interior Ministry will be authorized to hear appeals from the decisions of the police trial judges.

Twenty-four Hour Limit

The proposed law states that when a person is arrested, the police will have 24 hours to investigate his case, at the end of which time he will either be brought to trial or released.

The law also establishes the functions and activities of the trial judges.

Reasons for Proposal Explained

The proposal sent by the National Reconstruction Government Junta was accompanied by an explanation of the reasons behind its presentation. They are as follows:

Reasons for Proposal

Using the right of initiative of this National Reconstruction Government Junta, we are presenting for the consideration of the Council of State and for its approval the attached Draft Law Concerning "Jurisdictional Functions of the Sandinist Police," with which we hope to help solve immediately one of the chief problems now facing our revolution--crime. The solution of this problem, inherited from Somozism, is one of the most urgent challenges confronting our revolutionary process.

We are fully aware that there is a series of factors which, within the present frame of reference, are causing an apparent increase in crime as a social phenomenon, the logical product of the 45 years of oppression and of being ignored under which our people lived, combined with the social maladjustments which are the natural result of an uprising like the one our people have survived and the existence of another series of unfortunate situations inherited from Somozism, such as unemployment, lack of education, etc.

Several programs to attack these problems are being implemented in the respective areas, but we are fully aware that we do not have an adequate legal system to confront immediately this challenge to our revolution. Since for the suppression of crime the only immediate natural choice we have is a Criminal Procedure Code from the last century which does not respond to the demands of the times and to the efforts and good intentions of police officials and criminal judges, they are up against a lack of the most elementary needs for investigation and a legal system which hampers them. We are aware that this problem needs in-depth review, and insofar as legislation is concerned, another legal system is needed; but in view of the imminent danger that crime represents for our revolutionary process and our people, we must work to combat it with what we have, and for that reason we are proposing the attached draft law, which we consider easy to carry out, quick to implement and a perfect aid for expediting our present criminal procedure. In view of the situation described, there is nothing more practical than to endow our young police force legally with certain jurisdictional faculties, since that institution is in direct daily contact with this problem and is the one which logically detects antisocial actions and gathers preliminary information and evidence.

It must be observed that this law will be temporary and that in practice it is an emergency measure against the growing crime rate, since the urgency to combat this social problem does not permit us to wait for all the time and human and material resources which would have to be invested in its solution, as well as for the creation of the new legal system to which we have referred.

Proposed Law for Military Trials

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 26 Sep 80 p 12

[Text] The procedures for military criminal trials will be in charge of the General Tribunal of the Sandinist People's Army and of the military tribunals to be created in keeping with the country's military structures, according to a draft law proposed by the National Reconstruction Government Junta and sent to the Council of State for consideration.

This General Tribunal, according to the proposed decree law, will exercise jurisdiction throughout the national territory, and the military tribunals will do so within their respective territories. The General Tribunal of the Sandinist People's Army will be made up of the military judge advocate, the judges, military prosecutors, subordinates and the secretaries assigned to them.

As to the strictly military functions, the document states that the General Tribunal will be under the General Command of the Sandinist People's Army. The military tribunals will be subordinate to their respective military commanders.

What are the purposes of the criminal trial?

The document indicates that the purpose of the criminal trial is to clarify crimes, determine those responsible and guarantee a proper application of the law, so that anyone who commits a crime or fails to comply with the law will receive a just punishment and no innocent person will be punished. It must also help to strengthen Sandinist legality in the military institutions, to prevent and eradicate crimes and failures to comply among the military and to educate the latter in the matter of strict compliance with laws, regulations, orders from superiors and the demands of military discipline.

Military Criminal Process To Be Public

The proposed decree states that the military criminal process shall be public, but in certain exceptional cases the press and the public in general may be excluded from all or part of the trials for reasons of ethics, public order or national security.

It is the duty of military judge advocates to be familiar with the crimes and infractions committed by persons under their jurisdiction, even when such persons are dismissed from active military service after the fact. In those cases in which crimes or noncompliances are committed by persons who, after committing such act, the military tribunal will not hear such cases. [sentence as published] The military tribunal and military criminal process law also includes the right of the accused to know the charges against him and to offer explanations for his actions, to offer evidence during the trial, to participate fully throughout the trial when he is present, as well as his right to a defense.

Arrests

Concerning arrest, the law indicates that any soldier must arrest any person who attempts to commit a crime at the moment he is about to do so, during its execution or immediately afterward; any person who escapes from detention, whether such detention is a precautionary measure or involves the carrying out of a sentence; any person who is absent without leave from his unit or from the place where he is assigned to work; or any person who fails to appear for his trial. The person who makes an arrest under these circumstances must turn the accused over to the nearest military or police unit, giving a detailed account of the reason for and circumstances of the arrest.

The chief of the military or police unit in turn will inform the proper military tribunal of the arrest.

In addition, the law proposed by the Government Junta to the Council of State includes precautionary measures, such as provisional arrest, house arrest, custody by the head of the military unit, moral guarantees from the social organization to which the accused belongs and his promise to report periodically to a probation officer assigned to him.

These precautionary measures shall be applied according to the seriousness of the case, and in crimes against the security of the state only provisional arrest may be used as a precautionary measure. Provisional arrest will last no longer than 10 days.

Statements in Investigations

No accused person shall be obliged to testify against himself nor to admit his guilt, the military penal law states.

In testifying, the accused may make any statements he deems proper in connection with the act of which he is accused or which he considers to be in the interest of his own defense.

Also, no violence or any type of coercion may be used against the accused to force him to testify against himself or to admit guilt.

Searches

The law indicates that the prosecutor or the court may permit, upon well-founded evidence, the search of any building, military unit or other public place, domicile or other private compound, when there are indications that the accused, objects or tools used in the crime, or documents or objects which may indicate and prove the crime under investigation, may be on the premises. Such searches should be made, preferably, during the daytime.

Appeals

Concerning appeals, the proposed law states that such appeal must be made within a few days after the final sentence is handed down in the military criminal trial. This appeal shall be made to a court of appeals which will have national jurisdiction and operate in the capital of the republic and will be composed of the judge advocate general of the Sandinist People's Army or his representative and two other judges when he deems this necessary.

Trade License Created

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 25 Sep 80 p 12

[Text] The excessive "concern" of representatives of private enterprise that their interests not be affected turned the debate on the proposed law creating trade licenses into an argument over positions which are, to a certain extent, petty.

The proposed law, inspired by old claims of the Nicaraguan Chamber of Commerce, calls for the creation of the trade license as an instrument through which any person who is an agent of commerce will be given his own identity, precisely for his better protection.

In addition, the trade license will guarantee freedom of this activity, strengthen the action of the state in defense of this freedom against the "snipers" who come in from other countries and consolidate the same organizations which bind the businessmen together.

However, several areas considered in the law, such as, for example, the fact that the businessmen must present confidential reports to the state institutions involved, caused discussion of the law to drag out for more than 3 hours, with frictions which impair the activity of the Council of State itself.

As Comrade Federico Lopez explained, the license will permit an inventory to be taken of the trade network of the country as well as of existing distribution networks.

First Question

Although, as we explained initially, the law originated in the historical claims of the businessmen, it was questioned by some delegates from private enterprise who, first of all, believed it clashed with registration with the Local Reconstruction Board.

It was then explained that the license authorized and completed the body of decisions and codes concerning commercial activity. Registration with the board, on the other hand, was through the payment of a tax.

What About Peddlers?

The first obstacle having been overcome, there was a complaint from the peddlers, ragpickers and those who sell small items, etc. It caused some surprise that never, either in the Chamber of Commerce or in the MDN [Nicaraguan Democratic Movement], a highly business-oriented party, or in the Chamber of Construction, much less in the Union of Large Agricultural and Livestock Producers of the country, had a word been said about the activity of these people, who are not legally considered merchants. The situation of the peddlers, ragpickers, etc., will be regulated if the Ministry of Domestic Trade, which was entrusted with the job of writing such a regulation, deems it necessary.

Speculation in Nicaragua

Reinaldo Hernandez requested a postponement to delve deeper into this matter, since he believed some elements of judgment were lacking for its approval. Major Tellez replied, stating that it was becoming urgent to discuss this matter, since speculation arising from the anarchy in Nicaraguan trade was hurting the purses of the workers and of the people in general.

Ronald Paredes, in turn, said that all kinds of people, many of them from other Central American countries, are traveling about Nicaragua, exploiting our peasants with their business deals.

Honesty of MICOIN [Ministry of Domestric Trade] Questioned

Comrade Federico Lopez then summarized the entire basis for the suggestions made by some delegates from the private sector: suspicion about the honesty of the Ministry of Domestic Trade.

He said that basically what was being defended was "concern" for the interests of big business.

Reinaldo Hernandez intervened again, this time to question the fact that confidential reports about businessmen are given to the government, and he implied that that information would be used against them, because the state is also a businessman under the People's Trade Corporation Law.

He added that he believes there should be equality, with no advantage for the state in matters of trade competition.

Discussion Closed

Major Tellez closed the heated discussion with a strong claim for the positions maintained up to this time. She stated that she was surprised by the idea of a mixed economy, introduced by Reinaldo Hernandez. She recalled that CORCOP [People's Trade Corporation] must have an advantage because it is the property of the people, and in all cases the people must have the advantage.

She said that logically the firms which are the property of the people must have preference.

Major Nunez added that criteria of competition should not be set against those of confidentiality.

To set the two against each other would be to limit the spirit of the law. He explained that the object of the law is for MICOIN to have information available about business activity and that what was involved was the patriotic spirit of the businessmen and their political confidence in the revolution. The law was finally approved with some changes which did not affect its original meaning.

PARENTS PROTEST SCHOOL-TO-WORK INTEGRATION PROGRAM

Women in MDN Complain

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 19 Sep 80 pp 1, 12

[Text] We have recieved a statement from the Organization of Democratic Women (MDN) [Nicaraguan Democratic Movement] protesting two basic decisions which they believe violate the patria potestas, destroy the family unit and go against several paragraphs of the Statute of Rights and Guarantees of Nicaraguans. They are referring to the "school-field integration" and to the unilateral decisions that those who went to the fields to teach the peasants to read and write automatically become members of the 19 July Youth. The organization's statement follows:

Statement

The Organization of Democratic Women of the MDN, as mothers, make public before Nicaragua and the free peoples of the world our protests against the unquestionable violation of the statute on rights and guarantees of Nicaraguans and of human rights, as well as the government's usurpation of the parents' patria potestas in:

1. The agreement published in Gazette No 154 of 8 July 1980 designating the period from 1 December 1980 to 4 January 1981 as the time for the integration of schools into the fields, sending off our children without previous consultation in the season of greatest family unity, which this period is, and of great religious closeness among our people.

2. Mr Humberto Ortega Saavedra's decision automatically making those who participated in the literacy campaign members of the 19 July Sandinist Youth, also sending off our children without previous consultation with us or with them, violating the Statute of Rights and Guarantees of Nicaraguans and Human Rights, Article 26, paragraph 3, which states: "The parents will have the preferential right to choose the type of education their children will receive" and Article 20, paragraph 2, which says: "No one can be compelled to belong to an association."

Most of the youths are minors, therefore we demand from our officials that in order to make effective this and future provisions, they consult previously with the parents because we are the parties who are rightly responsible for our children.

Chinandegan Parents Defend Rights

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 19 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] On 13 September 1980, we, the parents of this city of Chinandega, have gathered to discuss the Ministry of Education's Agreement No 90-AA for the coming school year, which refers to the integration of the school into the fields from 1 December 1980 to 4 January 1981.

We note that in the booklet of documents regulating education which operate through the school councils in Cuba it is clearly stated: "The integration of schools into the fields /is the essential premise of communist education/." [in boldface]

We believe that such a decree diminishes the rights of parents over their children who are minors and therefore openly violates the patria potestas. That provision attacks the integrity of the family, ignoring fundamental truths of our own cultural heritage, imposing doctrines opposed to our religious beliefs and motivations in a veiled way, which in this case is specifically manifest by the choice of the month of December for that objective.

Our protest does not mean we are inconsistent, lack awareness of our social reality or are opposed to the establishment of real justice inspired in the true hopes of men who share their own values. But we believe that this is not achieved through the lies, slogans or false offerings with which some are trying to lead our children, to teach them doctrines foreign to all that is /ours/ [in boldface]. Doctrines which have not been able to demonstrate in the world their capacity to create in men true motivations to improve themselves in all the social aspects of human life.

The aspiration to obtain a better education for our children, to let them participate in and be the authors of the social changes of our people, does not mean that our children should be alienated again in a type of education which might prove to be even more harmful than the previous one, since it robs man of the freedom to believe in his deepest values, which are the values inherited from his forebears. Because those methods of obviously and deliberately monopolizing our youths tend to create lack of discipline and respect from the son for the parents and teachers and to disintegrate the family, creating a social and moral chaos which could have disastrous consequences in the future.

All of this results from the fact that our youth, due to its lack of maturity, is the most propitious culture medium for these viruses to germinate, which are only expressions of the highest degree of depersonalization, where man has the only value of being only an instrument toward the ends which are pursued.

Therefore, we ask the minister of education to revoke the above-mentioned agreement of the schedule for the coming school year, since we are not ready to let the state make instruments of our children, violating the right which is ours from the patria potestas, which is the inalienable right of honest and responsible parents.

Finally, we mention Article 26 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which states: "The parents will have the preferential right to choose the type of education to be given their children." We also support the last pastoral letter of our bishops, the highest representatives of our Catholic Church, which says: "It is equally unacceptable to deny parents the right to educate their children according to their convictions."

We invoke therefore the support of our petition by our highest spiritual guide, Monsignor Obando Y Bravo, and we make an appeal of solidarity to all the parents in the country to share our feeling of concern for Nicaragua's youth.

Managuan Parents Interviewed

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 21 Sep 80 pp 1, 12

[Text] LA PRENSA has been informed by a group of Managuan parents that they disagree with the decree of the Ministry of Public Education which, in their view, disposes of the children, ignoring their patria potestas.

"The defense of the family unit is a national concern and it has been caused by the school-to-work decree. We believe the intention is to diminish the religious importance of the festivities of Christmas," the parents said during their visit to this newspaper.

At 1600 hours, a time of great commercial activity when the aisles were full of buyers, LA PRENSA interviewed some parents at the Managua shopping center.

In Disagreement

"I would not agree and I am not sending him. What trouble are they going to keep him away from? This affects the family's authority. No one can compel us to do things with which we disagree," said Luisa Martinez de Rodriquez, an employee in an electrical appliances store.

A woman named Guillermina Buitrago, who sells sweets, said: "What can we do? Of course I prefer that he stay with me. The older ones are with the police. I want them to study and be well taken care of."

Rosa de Calderon, who has a 9-year-old daughter, said: "I would not send her, much less in December when the family must be united and, besides, they are ruining the peasants. You can see that the domestic employees leave their jobs during the coffee harvesting season because they have that opportunity to make more money...well now the young ones are going to take the job away from them."

"I prefer that he not study and if he is not accepted in school because of that, I do not care. I am not sending him and it is not selfishness. My children went out with the literacy campaign," Edelma Martinez said.

"Children are yours. It is not right in my view, because they fall behind and they have to rest because studying is work," a lottery vendor who is expecting a child and has another one of school age at the Ramirez Goyena school told us.

"I will not stand for it. The children must be with us and even more so during Christmas," said Clementina Cabezas, the mother of two.

Eustaquio Corrales said: "It would be sad if he left. The same thing happened when he went away with the literacy campaign; his mother cried and it would be the same now, thinking that he could die of hunger or something else. We work to give him what he needs."

A group of watchmen at the Managua shopping center said that there are lots of children who "are already earning a living, helping at home" and who helped in the literacy campaign with good will, who learned and taught. "They chose a bad month, they should not have chosen December," they said. "Besides, there are enough unemployed for those jobs. From my point of view, children are admired by their parents and a united family seems to us very important," those interviewed answered.

Mrs Hilda de Zamora answered: "It is an abuse. What reason do they have to decide that the children go to learn in the fields? What they are trying to do is to end the family nucleus and ignore the patria potestas. Our children must spend Christmas with us. What will be left for the peasant who cuts coffee?"

Miriam de Castillo commented: "The patria potestas cannot be entrusted to anyone, and it, the ministry, if it wants to represent us, is anyone. I believe I have the freedom to defend my rights. They are my children. And it is an absolute abuse for the children to have to belong to the Sandinist Youth. They must have the freedom to elect where and with whom they want to associate politically. It is their own initiative that must dictate whether they want to be Sandinists or not.

"My children went away to teach reading and writing, four of them," she continued. "But this is not the same. The literacy campaign did not mean a break between us, we were watchful of their needs and illnesses and it was a Christian obligation. But this is a means to use the youths, and, moreover, to impair production because these are inexperienced hands that will go to the fields," concluded Mrs Castillo.

One hundred percent of those interviewed disapproved of the decree and agreed that the patria potestas belongs to the parents and that they are ready to defend it.

PRESS COMMENTARY ON REAGAN ELECTION

U.S. Democratic Tradition Praised

PY080205 Asuncion ABC COLOR in Spanish 6 Nov 80 p 12

[Editorial: "The Best Strategy Against Communism"]

[Text] Winston Churchill said that the Chamberlain government had had the choice between dishonor or war, and that on having chosen dishonor it got not only dishonor but also war.

With this phrase Winston Churchill could synthesize all the problems which his country was experiencing at that time. Many other cases may be mentioned in which a whole complex picture of facts and tendencies, patterns and circumstances could be expressed in only a phrase or two, but they are really exceptions. The complexity of events is a common characteristic in big countries, and under this condition an attempt to unravel the deep meaning of current events and through them to try to catch a glimpse of the future, is a task which does not admit superficial generalizations and should not be guided by an overestimation of a few isolated and unimportant facts.

The Carter administration has crumbled noisily. The outcome of the recent U.S. elections shows it very clearly. It does not follow, however, that Mr Carter's government has been a bad government (although it may have been so in some areas of internal U.S. government responsibility) or even a mediocre one.

But it has been a lacklustre government, perhaps without luck; often not well-informed and sometimes even naive, but it has also been a government deeply rooted in some of the best U.S. political traditions.

In the fight against Marxism, defeat in several battles may possibly be charged to the Carter administration. A deeper analysis should be made, however, to see whether, despite those defeats, it did not develop a strategy--maybe the best possible--for the triumph of democracy in the war waged against it by Marxism.

Internal dissidence in countries dominated by Communism is today an increasing phenomenon. The evidence, through experience, of the definitive failure of the Communist system (economic, social, political, humane) and even more, of the fundamental inaccuracy of the Marxist theory is becoming increasingly clear. The Carter administration may not have put the same emphasis on the concrete defense of human rights in countries behind the iron curtain as in those outside it, but something that cannot be denied is that it has everywhere shown the humane superiority of the democratic system based on individual freedom, which is the U.S. way of life.

By that turn to the essence of fundamental U.S. political institutions and their worldwide recognition, the Carter administration earned credit for its country throughout the world. The administration did not always act properly. It did not always understand the internal problems of other countries or respect values which should at least have been understood, but fundamentally it may have achieved the revaluation of the principles of individual freedom and democracy--the same ones that made the United States a politically great and stable country--to a degree which may be decisive for the final defeat, or rather the bankruptcy, of Marxism.

The task of governing the United States is, in its own right, one of the most difficult which man can conceive. The assignment of this mission and the withdrawal from it are determined, however, by the U.S. voters alone. But no U.S. president can escape the knowledge that his post is not limited to his responsibility to his voters, but that he also assumes responsibility before the whole world. As long as the United States is the number one country of the world, these responsibilities will be his glory and his burden in everything having to do with the definition of the policy, peace, coexistence, and even the survival of the world. James Earl Carter will no longer be the president of the United States, but only time will tell whether his contribution to the cause of democracy and human freedom has become a lasting element of the international action of his country.

Impact of Reagan Policy

PY101521 Asuncion ABC COLOR in Spanish 10 Nov 80 p 12

[Commentary by Alcibiades Gonzales Delvalle entitled: "The United States is Back to Normal"]

[Text] We have to admire the remarkable coherence of the people of the United States, their loyalty to their motives and their ideology. The United States loves vastness; that is why it is great; its past is the source of its splendor; that is why it tenaciously holds onto its traditions. Within the framework of this cohesion, President Carter seems to be no more than an accident.

Mr Reagan promised his people a return to the past, and this gave rise to a landslide of votes in his favor. Thus, we do not agree with those who believe that people did not vote for Reagan, but against Carter. We believe that the people voted, sincerely voted, for Reagan. His electoral platform offered the United States a return to the past, those glorious times when the United States ruled the seas with its ships, the land with its factories and the skies with its planes and satellites.

Mr Reagan told his people that the United States will be respected once again, and to do this he plans to increase defense expenditures. This is what he said and he obtained a landslide of votes.

The fact that the U.S. economic situation is on the rocks is obvious. We believe the U.S. citizens were never so humiliated as when they were forced to purchase Volkswagen "beetles." It is well known that they were in the habit of driving around in veritable apartments on wheels rather than in cars. Mr Reagan has promised them that the economic situation will be as it was before.

We hope that Mr Reagan will succeed, as far as the economy goes at least. We do not wish hardships on any people of the earth, but...

Before anything is done we would like to say that we Latin Americans have painful memories of the U.S. well-being. We will never, never, forget the banana plantations, the meatpacking plants, the rubber plantations, the oil prospecting, the copper and tin mines, etc.

If the Americans plan to go back to their past economic splendour, good luck. But let it not be at the expense of the long-suffering Latin American people who are today, more than ever, developing toward a better standard of living. We still remember, and quite clearly at that, the prices the United States set on the products it sold us and how much it paid us for ours. The enormous difference in Uncle Sam's favor helped expand its economic power. We also remember that in order to avoid losing this power for whatever reason, they used to appoint and dismiss rulers at will.

Yes, it sure was a wonderful time. A golden epoch to which every American who longs for the past will want to return. In order to remain ignorant of the source of, and especially of the manner in which they gained access to the means necessary to build their country's greatness, they developed a wonderful system: they knew nothing about geography. They simply did not know where some country or another was or what some people felt or believed. With this plug in their ears--better to say in their hearts--they did not hear the moans. They did not want to hear the moans because they might have upset their digestion.

And then along came Mr Carter and talked to them about human rights. While he was talking about these rights, the cars in the United States grew smaller and smaller until they reached the size of the "beetles." This is why Mr Carter did not lose the elections on 4 November; he lost them a long time before that. He lost them when it seemed that the U.S. people were going to lower their status to the level of any Latin American country. But now the upheaval is over; the United States is returning to normal.

Let us hope that with Mr Reagan the Americans will regain their Cadillacs, their Lincolns, their Continentals and Chryslers, but we pray to God that Latin America does not have the bread taken out of its mouth.

Respect for Self-Determination

PY101606 Asuncion HOY in Spanish 9 Nov 80 p 15

[Editorial: "Reagan Against the World"]

[Excerpts] Once its sometimes bitter election struggles have been overcome, the United States unites around basic national objectives. Ronald Reagan has outlined his future national policy, but he has done it in a prudent manner without interfering or hindering the actions of the incumbent president, who in turn has started to work in close cooperation with his former adversary so the transition period will be carried out in a normal manner. Both of these men have completely different views on how to solve many problems, but they agree that these are problems the United States must solve in one way or another. This is an example of maturity that must be followed by others.

Regarding Latin America, Mr Reagan has stated that he will put emphasis on the achievement of bilateral agreements and on ways to improve bilateral relations which have deteriorated in the past few years. Canada will also be included in this policy. He noted that it is his purpose to unite the nations of North, Central and Latin America in their determination to achieve freedom.

Based on past experiences and disappointments of many years, it is our belief that just as the people of the United States are united, Latin American countries should also unite to demand greater respect for our self-determination. Our nation's policies cannot be outlined on the bases of the whims of some other nation's policy. It should be based on our historic, economic, political and social conditions. Paraguay does not need "aid" or "leadership" from any foreign power. But its independence and intrinsic way of living must be respected and justly treated.

The international political situation may at a given time either favor or hinder the realization of our national objectives. But this should not deviate us from the path since we have the right and duty to follow it by ourselves. This is what the Americans do, and although Paraguay is a small country whose international influence cannot be compared to that of a world power, it can, as a sovereign state, imitate the United States in one aspect: to look after its own interests and demand that its decisions are respected within the framework of international rights.

Machiavellian Foreign Policy

PY081916 Asuncion HOY in Spanish 8 Nov 80 p 15

[Commentary by Helio Vera: "A Falling Star"]

[Text] In the 16th century, a man wrote a book to convince his new sovereign that he would be an excellent adviser. He had good luck with the book, and it is now part of history. The name of the author: Niccolo Machiavelli. The name of the book: "The Prince." The name of the man for whom the book was written: Giulio de Medici. The result of the book: to establish the disassociation of morality and politics as a political theory.

Some charged that Machiavelli wrote a sordid, immoral treatise. Others who read it better noted that he merely described, with holding the pertinent conclusions, what sovereigns do in exercising power, especially those who prevail successfully in power despite their enemies.

In the 20th century, many centuries later, Jimmy Carter tried to give a moral orientation to U.S. foreign policy. Filled with deep religious convictions, he based the actions of his government on these convictions. These principles were quite evident in several aspects of his administration.

And this was not exclusively pertinent to the human rights policy, although that was one of the most controversial aspects.

There is no need to state that it was not this theory that defeated the Democratic party. No, it was not. U.S. citizens based their votes on much simpler reasons: more expensive fuel, higher taxes, unemployment, the escalation of prices and the declining value of the dollar. The human rights policy also had its share of responsibility.

The White House is now preparing to receive a new guest. Ronald Reagan knows that in politics there cannot be a distinction between moral and immoral issues, only between the winners and the conquered. And he is apparently ready to incorporate the wise teachings of Machiavelli into U.S. foreign policy. By so doing he will merely be continuing an old American tradition of taking anything they desire, either from a neighbor or from another country, for any reason at all--and exactly because of moral principles.

This new policy that Reagan will enforce is nothing new. On the contrary, since in the last few decades U.S. power has started to decrease while this policy was being enforced. Carter simply believed that his ethical outlook would enable his country to recover its lost power. Facts have shown the contrary, however. And this will probably continue to be the case under Ronald Reagan. At the proper time both Rome and Great Britain experienced the same situation. The United States will not be original in this aspect, either. Like the lyrics of the tango song state: "History repeats itself."

Little Change With Reagan

PY051703 Asuncion ABC COLOR in Spanish 5 Nov 80 p 6

[Text] "We, the Authentic Radical Liberals, with our president as leader, did not start opposing the government when Jimmy Carter became president. We started in the schools and will continue in the universities. With Carter or without him, we will continue the struggle for freedom and democracy in Paraguay." These remarks were made early this morning by Miguel Abdon Saguier, member of the executive board of the Authentic Radical Liberal Party (PLPA), after learning of the victory of Republican candidate Ronald Reagan.

Saguier also said: "When I visited the United States on an invitation of the State Department, I was able to become familiar with the two problems afflicting President Jimmy Carter. The two problems were inflation and unemployment, and President Carter could not solve them despite his efforts."

Saguier added: "It is obvious without any question that these two problems were decisive for Republican candidate Ronald Reagan's victory."

Miguel Abdon Saguier also said: "We must recognize that the problem of human rights is of particular interest in Latin America, particularly in countries like ours which must bear strong military governments; Americans, however, do not have this problem."

He added: "I believe, however, as do many U.S. experts, that Ronald Reagan's policies will not vary too much from the policies implemented by President Carter."

The politician also said: "This is so because the human rights policies advocated by President Carter reflect the feelings and ideals of the United States and were not simply a political platform, as believed by some people."

Miguel Abdon Saguier also said during the interview that "what I really hope is that with the return of the Republicans to power we will not have to bear the policy of direct 'marine' intervention in Latin American countries."

EDITORIAL VIEW ON REAGAN'S ELECTION

PA120302 Lima EL COMERCIO in Spanish 6 Nov 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Meaning of Ronald Reagan's Election"]

[Text] The great discontent felt by U.S. citizens with the existing difficult economic conditions and President Jimmy Carter's hesitations in international politics caused his overwhelming defeat and the election of his opponent, Republican candidate Ronald Reagan, to the U.S. Presidency.

The ballot boxes reflected the criticism of the spending program of the outgoing administration, with its accompanying inflation which caused unemployment, although not at an alarming rate.

Among U.S. majority groups there has been for some time, a marked concern over the excessive government spending to support human groups who, too often, they say, are incapable of solving their own problems or helping themselves.

Americans believed the Democrats were squandering and the Republicans would be more austere in spending state funds. Reagan's campaign in favor of cutting taxes confirms this belief.

The solution to the existing negative situation requires positive action, according to President-elect Reagan. This is why his first statement when the vote tally began to favor him was, "I am not afraid of what is to come...we are going to put America back to work."

This trust in positive action, is evidently based on a greater concept: the faith in the huge moral and material resources of the United States: "Leader of the free world and so strong that no nation on earth would dare to violate peace."

This certainty marks a difference in character from the hesitating foreign policy waged by Jimmy Carter and is also a warning to Washington's rivals: "The burden of keeping peace is on our backs, therefore we must be strong."

The decision, will be, therefore, the new weapons of U.S. diplomacy. Regarding the SALT II treaty or any other that may come after it, the president-elect has said he will not give in any more to the Soviets who have moved their pawns in the international chess game, advancing in Afghanistan or surpassing the United States in military power. He will support Israel, avoid any negotiations with the PLO "terrorists" and give guarantees to Europe and other U.S. allies.

The forceful policy, thus announced, would extend to support all governments in Latin America and other parts striving against violence, within a different concept from President Carter's in regard to human rights. At the beginning of his mandate Carter created great sympathy in the world, but the human rights was not applied in the same manner in all parts of the world where they were being abused.

Anyhow, the ` is no information on the most important matter for us--Washington's policy with Latin America and the rest of the hemisphere. This was one of the most notable gaps in the platform of all the White House candidates, including John Anderson.

Within this context, the possible attitude of the president-elect is somewhat different toward the Caribbean countries, which have been to a great extent being won over by communism. Reagan believes that this was possible because of the failings of his predecessor who allowed Cuba and the Soviet Union to interfere in the region.

It is evident that the hardening of a line in the international sphere could alarm many capitals, but Reagan believes that only in this way can peace be guaranteed, without risking a failure because of a weakened United States. This conviction undoubtedly influenced the elections last Tuesday and is apparently the policy desired by U.S. majorities.

MULTINATIONAL IRRIGATION PROPOSALS UNDER STUDY

Lima LA PRENSA in Spanish 9 Oct 80 p 5

[Text] The government is studying proposals from Sweden, the United States and the Soviet Union for participation in the Olmos Irrigation Project. Its decision will be rendered before the end of the year, Vice Minister of Agriculture Jaime Hoefken Perez reported yesterday.

The vice minister said that there are new systems which can make completion of the Olmos project possible within a shorter period of time.

He stated that the financial support offered by the Swedes is very interesting, as is the American operating system, which has been shown. It involves equipment that is expensive, but it has the advantage of reducing the time needed for completion of the job.

He did not rule out the possibility of joint participation in the project by several countries.

Hoefken said that the government is interested in increasing production and productivity and that the Olmos project will make it possible to irrigate nearly [illegible two-digit number],000 hectares of cultivated land, increasing production, particularly that of rice and cotton.

He noted that the drought has seriously harmed agriculture and expressed pleasure with the rainfall recently observed in that region of the country.

The vice minister also said that the desire was to devote more attention to projects requiring a shorter time for completion, such as small-scale irrigation works, rehabilitation of coastal land and, at the same time, agricultural research, extension and development programs.

Returning to the subject of the Olmos project, he said that the day before yesterday there was a meeting at the palace with representatives of agencies interested in implementing that program.

He noted that there is confidence in the constitutional government. There are, he said, a number of countries and international financial agencies that want to help us.

Regarding the invasions of lands, he said his department is working with the Ministry of the Interior to determine measures to be adopted. He stated that a way will be found to engage in a dialog and to relocate the people involved. "We don't want to use force," he added.

Hoefken was speaking at the ALIDE [Latin-American Association of Financial Institutions for Development] office, where he was to open a meeting of Latin-American governmental economic development agencies.

BELAUNDE RESUMES CONSTRUCTION OF MARGINAL HIGHWAY

Lima CORREO in Spanish 12 Oct 80 pp 6-7

[Article by Ernesto Vega Pardo]

[Text] Completion of the Marginal Forest Highway will have a considerable influence on the country's economic development because of its effects on agriculture, livestock raising, energy, mining and settlement of people.

President Belaunde recently called this highway "the road of meat, petroleum and gold."

During his electoral campaign Belaunde did not forget the Marginal Highway, and now that he is in office he has done what was appropriate to have this important artery placed in service of the country's progress.

First it was the architect Eduardo Orrego Villacorta, and now it is the present minister of transportation and communications, Fernando Chavez Belaunde, who has set this ambitious project in motion.

Despite the brevity of his term as head of transportation and communications, Orrego Villacorta flew over several segments of the Marginal Highway with President Belaunde just a few days after assuming his post.

Chavez Belaunde took the post and within record time called for resumption of work on the San Alejandro-Puerto Bermudez segment.

Chavez B. has made several trips to the region, personally giving the instructions necessary to avoid any delay in construction of the road.

With the help of the Marginal Highway, the forest is to become "Lima's larder" because of its rich lands and because of the opportunites for stock raising that it offers.

It is estimated that a total of 500,000 hectares of arable land will be brought under cultivation when the San Alejandro-Puerto Bermudez link has been completed.

Moreover, it is assumed that plans to settle people in areas penetrated by the modern highway will be carried out.

Belaunde has decided to make a reality of this important project, initiated during his previous term in office.

The highway facilitates socioeconomic integration; and, because of its great importance, the project has been welcomed by Colombia, Ecuador and Bolivia.

With regard to the last-named, when the road is completed in Peru, the Bolivian Marginal Forest Highway will be started.

This international road will probably be 5,490 kilometers long, reaching from the Colombian-Venezuelan border to the city of Santa Cruz in Bolivia.

In its course it will link all valleys suitable for settlement and development of agriculture, stock raising and lumbering along the rain forest in the four countries.

Venezuela, Paraguay and Brazil also approve of the project, and it is reported that those countries are constructing highways to connect with the Marginal Highway.

When this road is finished, there will be a continuous route from the city of Maracaibo (Venezuela) on the Caribbean Sea to Asuncion (Paraguay) with an approximate length of 7,000 kilometers.

Few works in the world offer the opportunity to link all the countries in a continent in a joint, fruitful operation.

President Belaunde has said that the Marginal Forest Highway, the project of his dreams, will in large measure solve the problem of unemployment, hunger and poverty.

It now appears that the experts agree with Belaunde, for they are convinced that the country's future actually does lie in the forest.

Belaunde has said, "In the Amazon region we have millions of hectares of productive lands, forest-products resources, mineral wealth and energy resources and other resources, all awaiting the presence and the persevering creative effort of all those Peruvians who are prepared to forge a future and constructively serve the fatherland."

He also reiterated that his new administration will foster the establishment of new cities 100 km apart or of new towns 25 to 30 km apart.

In this regard, he expressed support of the groups of settlers preparing to travel to the Amazon region in search of a better future.

What will his administration do to foster development of the Amazon region?

"Provide the Amazon region with a suitable administrative structure that insures its development and makes it possible to reorient governmental activities in the spheres of highway infrastructure, integrating it with the region's river transport system."

The AP's [Popular Action] Plan of Government for 1980-1985 also speaks of "channeling vast public and private credit resources into its development."

Belaunde also deems it necessary to "draw up a national investment program to assist in its development, one capable of raising funds for and granting medium- and long-term credit to settlers and small manufacturers in the region."

Another of the actions proposed by the president for the Amazon region will be to "furnish technical assistance, which is useful and essential for development" and to "create a regional body whose function will be to plan and to foster ongoing development of the region."

He also considers it "necessary to modernize and standardize exploitation of timber resources in the Amazon region, using suitable techniques that insure preservation of the ecological balance."

It is well known that the president's face lights up and his manner becomes more animated when he speaks of his great project, soon to become a reality: the Marginal Highway.

Now that the road is taking shape, a highway considered the spinal column of the Amazon region, a great future is foreseen for Peru's eastern region.

The experts agree that the Marginal Highway, connected with the longitudinal Sierra and coastal Pan-American highways by transverse roads, constitutes, along with the existing river transport network, the region's basic communications system and the principal link with the rest of the country.

Construction of the Marginal Highway has resumed, and the country is awaiting, with rare optimism, completion of the project that will undoubtedly bring a better future for all Peruvians.

CERTEX NEW TRENDS, EXPORTS OF NONTRADITIONAL GOODS EXAMINED

Lima CORREO in Spanish 12 Oct 80 pp 8-9

[Text] CERTEX is the acronym for Export Tax Refund Certificate. It has been the principal tool used to increase Peru's nontraditional exports, along with the incentives provided by the realistic exchange policy and the Central Reserve Bank's credit terms.

For the exporters belonging to the ADEX [Exporters Association], it was heaven-sent, for, without it, they would not have been able to compete with the manufactures from other countries in the competitive, protected international markets or sell to industrial corporations.

To leftist economists and independent experts, it is a major subsidy of domestic and foreign capital that is unpardonable under present circumstances, when all Peruvians are paying the true cost of food, milk and fuel.

Positive

In the opinion of the Central Reserve Bank, the CERTEX has positive aspects. The pamphlet "Thoughts Concerning a Stabilization Program; the Peruvian Experience, 1978-1980," presumably written by the former executive chairman of the Central Reserve Bank, Manuel Moreyra Loredo, states, on page 45, "[T]he level of exports has been diversified by means of a substantial increase in sales abroad of nontraditional goods. Along with the more prominent role played by petroleum and silver, this makes our foreign trade less vulnerable to cyclic external movements, and thus we can expect a suitable increase in earnings of foreign currency in the years ahead."

Main Thrust

The impetus given nontraditional exports was one of the main thrusts of the economic revival worked out by the "Cosmos" team headed by Javier Silva Ruete and Moreyra Loredo.

The pamphlet mentioned above says, on page 33, "Regarding the industrial sector, we sought to concentrate resources in manufacturing firms with a high value added and with possibilities of selling a part of their production abroad. At the same time, we attempted to increase domestic competition. To this end, we drew up a law to promote exports of nontraditional goods and a program to reduce protection of industry. The former guarantees for 10 years an appropriate tax refund (approximately 30 percent, plus an additional 10 percent for firms established in provinces), eliminates bureaucratic controls and legal obstacles, creates the Export Promotion Fund and enhances all governmental support activity, including the granting of preferential credit. . . ."

100 Percent

This boost, embodied in legislation at the end of 1978, resulted in a 100-percent increase over the previous year. Exports of nontraditional products in 1979 were valued at $688 million, more than exports of petroleum and petroleum products, valued at $645.7 million, according to the Central Reserve Bank [BCR]. In 1978, nontraditional exports totaled the modest sum of $382.8 million, according to the Secretariat of State for Commerce of the then Ministry of Industry, Commerce, Tourism and Integration.

The textile and fishery sectors ranked at the top, the latter advancing farther than the former from 1978 to 1979.

Indiscriminate

With the euphoria over the inflow of dollars past, it has been found that in some instances the CERTEX was granted indiscriminately. Essential goods with little or no value added were sold abroad, and fraud was perpetrated by colorful people in the provinces. In Piura, people speak of the case of a former cook with the nickname "Califa" [Caliph] who probably exported imaginary papers valued at tens of millions of soles.

Nontraditional exports swelled because of the crisis in the domestic market. The recession of 1978 and 1979 led to a split in the Manufacturers Association that gave rise to the Exporters Association, a pressure group with interests differing from those of the Manufacturers Association. For the manufacturers associated with the ADEX, the slogan was "Export or die." They exported, according to most economists, at any price, owing to the support provided by the CERTEX, which involved highly favorable conditions, obtained after a vigorous campaign.

Bourgeois Alliance, or Distress Price?

The left thought it saw a "new bourgeois alliance." The truth, no doubt, is that if the CERTEX had not been applied, the scanty modern industrial apparatus would have sold out at distress prices to the advantage of the multinationals.

The nontraditional exports enabled manufacturers having no domestic market to survive. We should stress that the crisis has been surmounted.

Today the new economic team, "Dynamo," led by Manuel Ulloa, chairman of the Council of Ministers and minister of economy, finance and commerce, is presenting new ideas about the CERTEX. Elimination of it is not being contemplated. It is merely to be redirected.

Value Added

The "Dynamo" proposes that the CERTEX favor manufacturers with a high exported value added. This is an abrupt change, and it will provoke more than one comment or complaint within the ADEX.

The present executive director of commerce, Roberto Abusada Salah, knows the subject well and has written an interesting, skeptical essay that appears in the booklet "Proposals for Peruvian Development," sponsored by the ADEX.

Abusada offers the following analysis: "In recent years, Peru has witnessed a rapid increase in its exports of manufactured goods. This has been because of the sudden, but perhaps temporary, disappearance of the bias against exporting. The rate of exchange, along with the CERTEX and the reduced domestic demand, resulted in the expansion of exporting in 1978 and 1979. However, there clearly has not been a policy that actually makes the long-term profitability of exportation of manufactures equal to or greater than that of production for the domestic market. The Law for the Promotion of Nontraditional Exports promulgated at the end of 1978 has undoubtedly had an important psychological impact, but its effects are, at this time, clearly marginal."

Serious Errors

He says, too, "Standing in contrast with this fact are the change in the exchange rate and the domestic recession, phenomena due to serious errors in fiscal and exchange management. These have indeed led to increased exportation of manufactured goods as a secondary effect."

Abusada asserts that "the corollary of this view is thus obvious: With the errors corrected, and in the absence of a policy favoring the exportation of manufactures, this activity will cease to grow or will decline in 1980."

A Lesson

Abusada is not so pessimistic, but finds a useful lesson: The manufacturer is learning to export and is finding that this activity can be the solid foundation on which he develops his business over the long term.

Abusada emphasizes that, for this to happen, industrial development essentially must achieve optimal levels of production, constant improvements in the quality of products, reduction of costs, access to new technology and information concerning the design of products, wrapping, packaging, and so forth. According to Abusada, all these elements are typically associated with policies promoting industrial growth. These policies use the national system of incentives to promote exportation of manufactures and competition in the domestic market.

Proposals

The executive director of commerce of the Ministry of Economy, Finance and Commerce proposes various specific measures to promote exportation of manufactured goods, from subsidies for the exported value added (a turning-about of the CERTEX) to credit subsidies and institutional support in the areas of trade information, marketing, credit insurance and establishment of free zones.

Why are they proposing modification of the CERTEX with respect to value added?

The "Dynamo" experts and leftist economists have detected irregularities, especially during the first quarter of this year.

Gold and silver jewelry and craft items made up 13 percent of nontraditional exports, surpassing canned fish and frozen fish during that period.

On the other hand, according to ACTUALIDAD ECONOMICA, subsidies for nontraditional exports rose 70 percent during the first quarter in comparison with the same quarter of the previous year.

The Amount

What has the amount of the CERTEX been in recent years?

According to the incorruptible "National Accounts of Peru," prepared by the National Statistics Office, the tax refund or subsidy for exports was on the order of 33.666 billion soles in 1979, much greater than other subsidies, which totaled only 17.222 billion soles that year.

In 1978, the figure was 11.845 billion soles; in 1977, 3.839 billion; and in 1976, 1.435 billion soles.

With these arguments, the "Dynamo" has set out to channel the CERTEX and place it truly at the service of genuine national manufacturing.

The new levels of Peru's import tariff, which clearly conflict with previous agreements concerning the Cartagena Agreement's Common External Tariff, would provoke a new crisis in the Andean Pact. However, this crisis would be remediable, for it would make it possible to reexamine what has happened thus far and to offer realistic proposals regarding the process of integration, especially in industrial planning.

Now we understand why the chairman of the Council of Ministers, in his message to Congress, said nothing about the Andean Pact and Peru's relations with the members of the Cartagena Agreement. The idea of a national industry protected by high tariffs is not found among the mentors of Manuel Ulloa's economic team. On the contrary, it is being proposed that the domestic economy be integrated with or brought closer to the international economy by means of exportation of nontraditional goods with the help of stimuli that reward the value added rather than the gross production value, as now occurs with the CERTEX.

The Common External Tariff should be approved by 31 December of this year at the latest, according to Article 61 of the official text of the Cartagena Agreement.

That is, only 2 and 1/2 months remain. The military government approved an import tariff during the term in office of Minister Silva Ruete, whose viewpoint differs from that of the "Dynamo" team. We believe that the Cartagena Agreement has the duty of reviewing the steps taken in this regard. In Peru's case, the tariffs were a source of inflation and provided disproportionate protection to certain industrial sectors to the disadvantage of others.

PCP REJECTS CHARGES--Lima, 28 Oct (PL)--The Peruvian Communist Party (PCP) has rejected the campaign of the conservative press that is trying to blame the leftwing for violent acts which, according to the PCP, are being committed by the police or rightist gangs. In a public communique, the PCP vigorously rejected the campaign noting that the terrorist acts, as has been charged publicly, are being committed by the civil guard (the uniformed police) or paramilitary gangs of the extreme rightwing. The communique also rejected a bill promoted by the ruling party in the Senate to declare those found guilty of sabotage to be "traitors to the fatherland" and to sentence them to 25 years in prison. The PCP document demanded a thorough investigation of these violent actions which, in any case, are promoted by the rightwing to create a climate of insecurity and terror favorable to its coupist plans. The repressive bill was rejected by the leftwing and other opposition forces. According to government legislative sources, this bill already has the support of President Fernando Belaunde Terry. RADIO STATION ATTACKED--Lima, 6 Nov (AFP)--It was learned here today that a Dominican Fathers radio station of this capital has been attacked by an unidentified group who destroyed recorded material and left written slogans supporting fascism and nazism. Father William Boullon, chairman of one of the national groups for the defense of human rights, said that the attack perpetrated last Tuesday against Radio Santa Rosa was aimed at his program called the People's Day, which is committed to the poor. He reported that the attackers took 2 typewriters, 2 recorders and 200 cassettes containing interviews with Nicaraguan, Bolivian and Salvadoran political leaders and the Pope's Puebla message to Latin American bishops. These losses are more valuable than the material ones. Father Boullon said that the attack does not intimidate him and that his program will be back on the air next Sunday. He concluded by saying that the attack was perpetrated by those who are annoyed by the commitment they have made to the people and that this action is part of an aggressive campaign against popular media organizations. HIJACKERS, M-19 LINK INVESTIGATED--The police are investigating a possible connection between the 19 April movement [M-19] and the individuals who hijacked the Avensa plane on 6 November. The chiefs of the Directorate of Intelligence and Police Services and the (?Judicial Technical Policy) are analyzing statements made by the 55 passengers of the plane. The police chiefs think that the fake names of Jose and Felix Grimaldi were used to hide the real identity of the hijackers. It has even been reported that one might be a Colombian National. The police chiefs doubt that the two hijackers are brothers or that they have given their real names. Some details indicate that one might be a Colombian guerrilla of the M-19, which took over the Dominican Embassy in Bogota on 28 February. On that occasion, the guerrilla group, along with the hostages left for Cuba aboard a plane provided by the Colombian Government. The features and speech of the hijackers are being analyzed by the police because some passengers have said they look like Guajiros or people from northern Colombia. In any event, the pictures of 20 well-known Venezuelan guerrillas, whether still guerrillas or not, were shown to the passengers. The results of this still have not been released to the public. According to the Avensa passengers, the two alleged brothers were treated as common criminals by a militia officer when the plane touched down at Havana Airport. The passengers took note of this. STRINGENT ANTIHIJACKING MEASURES--Security measures continue to increase at our airports since an escalation in terrorist activity is feared. Members of the Directorate of Intelligence and Prevention Service and the Judicial Technical Police are participating in these operations, although it is believed that the action by Felix Suarez Grimaldi and his mysterious friend is not part of a general plan. According to circles close to the case of the Avensa plan hijacking, it was believed at the onset that the incident marked the beginning of a chain of reprisals in connection with the acquittal of the four persons implicated in the Cuban plane case. It was even believed that the person who accompanied Suarez Grimaldi was the Venezuelan terrorist known as the Jackal. It was later determined that this was not the case after the passengers described the mysterious young man. In any event, security measures will continue at airport to prevent further actions like the hijacking of the Avensa plane. A Freeze at the Wrong Time

As far as wheat is concerned, supplies for next year are already practically determined. Nearly three million hectares were planted this year, with an initial yield forecast of 3.2 million tons. After the September frost, the estimate was reduced temporarily to 2.8 million tons. Actually, however, the losses are still not known exactly.

Therefore, next year's imports should be the same as those of 1980: nearly 4.6 million tons. With the decline in the subsidy, it is estimated that consumption should stabilize.

PETROBRAS SIGNS FIVE OIL PURCHASE CONTRACTS

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 3 Oct 80 p 19

[Text] PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation] announced yesterday that it had signed five contracts to purchase 117,000 barrels of petroleum per day, to offset the interruption of the supply of 400,000 barrels per day imported from Iraq. The contracts were signed with Indonesia (45,000 barrels), Gabon (38,000 barrels), Saudi Arabia (20,000 barrels) Equador (10,000 barrels) and Venezuela (4,000 barrels per day).

Announcing the list of supplemental suppliers, Carlos Sant'Anna, PETROBRAS director of marketing, reported that other contracts have been signed for the purchase of liquefied petroleum gas, diesel oil and fuel oil, in an amount equivalent to 13,000 barrels per day. With the average price per barrel of petroleum at $31 and $32, the contracts will come to $330 million by the end of the year.

Many Offers

Carlos Sant'Anna noted that PETROBRAS was authorized by the National Energy Commission (CNE) to purchase up to 200,000 barrels per day. The initial contracts were limited to 17,000 barrels per day because PETROBRAS is adopting a cautious attitude with respect to prices. The enterprise may or may not reach the limit, depending on the prices offered. "First of all, we are discarding those offers where the price is higher than the OPEC quotations," he stressed.

The three derivatives (liquefied gas, dieseloil and fuel oil) are to meet domestic requirements, since these products are in the greatest demand. The gas will come from Saudi Arabia and Venezuela, the diesel oil from Gabon, Venezuela and Argentina, and the fuel oil from Gabon, Canada and Argentina.

All the contracts terminate on 31 December. According to Sant'Anna, this period is very important because the situation in the Persian Gulf could return to normal at any time, in which case the country would again receive petroleum from Iraq.

Information War

In addition to the war between Iraq and Iran, the PETROBRAS director noted, there is also an information war in the petroleum market. He did not clarify further, but hinted that PETROBRAS is examining other offers, within the criterion that only the lowest bids will be considered.

"If we wanted to pay the price, we could close deals to import over 500,000 barrels per day," he stressed.

There is no reason to take any hasty action before mid-November, since the present contracts have significantly eased the pressure on the domestic supply. According to Sant'Anna, Brazil still has fairly comfortable reserves. He made a point of saying, with the support of Armando Guedes Coelho, superintendant of marketing, that the country has not yet begun to use its strategic reserves. "During most of 1980, Brazil has purchased oil beyond its needs. I honestly cannot say if we are using our security reserves. Only the National Security Council can make such a statement," he observed.

Sant'Anna said that among the present contracts is one for petroleum supplied by Texaco, although he preferred not to reveal the intermediary country. According to the director, Texaco was the first international company to understand Brazil's situation. He hopes that other companies, like Exxon and Shell, will adopt a similar position if the situation becomes more complicated in the future.

Questioned about the gasoline surplus resulting from the price policy adopted by the government and the suspension of exports, Sant'Anna explained that these are precautionary measures. In canceling its sales contracts, PETROBRAS, like other countries, cited the greater force clause, since there is domestic priority.

Before the war between Iran and Iraq and the interruption in the supply (400,000 barrels per day) of Iraqi oil, PETROBRAS foreign purchases reached 915,000 barrels per day, including purchases to form reserves. With the Gulf crisis, imports declined to 515,000 barrels, and have now risen to 632,000 barrels per day. Among the new contracts, the greatest surprise was Indonesia, which is supplying a major portion of the 117,000 barrels per day. A month ago, an Indonesian delegation came to Brazil, and this helped in negotiating the new contract. Equador was no surprise, since there had already been an offer 2 weeks ago, when Minister Cesar Cals was attending the conference of the Latin American Organization for Energy Development (OLADE) Brazil now has 16 petroleum suppliers. They are!

Saudi Arabia, 220,000 barrels per day; Venezuela, 54,000 barrels; Kuwait, 80,000 barrels; Arab Emirates, 20,000 barrels; Neutral Zone, 10,000 barrels; Libya, 10,000 barrels; Algeria, 8,000 barrels; Mexico, 20,000 barrels; Angola, 7,000 barrels; Nigeria, 30,000 barrels; Congo, 10,000 barrels; China, 30,000 barrels; Gabon, 58,000 barrels; Qatar, 20,000 barrels; Indonesia, 45,000 barrels; and Equador, 10,000 barrels; totalling 632,000 barrels per day.

GRAND BAHAMA AUTONOMY--Freeport, Grand Bahama: Senator Jeffrey Thompson last night called for "administrative and economic autonomy" for Grand Bahama. Giving the welcome address at the PLP convention, which opened at the Bahamas Princess Hotel, Mr Thompson said administrative self-government "will stimulate even further our economic growth and enhance our political maturity". "Our ideal is administrative and economic autonomy within one socially, politically and culturally diverse, yet united Bahamas," Mr Thompson said. Grand Bahama's commercial health, he said, suffers because there is no local licensing authority, and an arbitration tribunal for dealing with industrial disputes. LANGONI: IMF NO SOLUTION FOR BALANCE OF PAYMENTS PROBLEM

[Text] Rio--Brazil could not solve its balance of payments problem by resorting to the IMF, for two principal reasons: first, because the funds it could draw would be insufficient and, second, because it is not yet known what role the IMF could play in recycling petrodollars.

These arguments were presented yesterday by Carlos Geraldo Langoni, president of the Central Bank. In an interview in Rio, Langoni reiterated that Brazil will continue to use the international banking system to finance its balance of payments deficit.

He admitted that the situation is not easy, but he guaranteed that the problems are being solved to get through this difficult period. "Brazil will have to cope with somewhat higher interest rates, paying a higher-risk rate, but this is preferable to a reduction in the loan period."

According to Langoni, who attended the IMF and World Bank meeting last week in Washington, neither the American monetary authorities nor the bankers are unhappy with the minimum 8-year term for Brazilian loans. On the contrary, he said that in his contacts he encountered the most favorable reaction to the manner in which Brazil is handling its foreign debt.

In the United States, Langoni met with John Haiman, who is responsible for currency and credit control, to discuss Brazil's situation. According to Langoni, Haiman said no official guideline had been offered to American banks regarding the risk of continuing loans to Brazil. Although it is not his function to encourage or discourage loans to other countries by the private sector, Haiman's opinion is important because it reflects government leanings. Haiman indicated the feeling that, despite the problems, the banking system would continue to finance the Brazilian deficit, although the Brazilian debt should not be allowed to represent a larger share in the banks' portfolios.

The Central Bank president said steps are being taken to avoid this increase. According to his calculations, the average growth in the capital of the banks is 15 percent per year, and Brazil intends to hold the increase in borrowing to a rate of 10 percent, thus hoping to keep Brazil's share in the credit operations of each of these institutions at least stable in relation to its capital.

SEPTEMBER INFLATION RATE 5.3 PERCENT, 8 PERCENT PREDICTED FOR OCTOBER

Inflation Rate Drops

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 4 Oct 80 p 22

[Text] Brasilia--The inflation rate in September was 5.3 percent in terms of domestic offering (Column 2), raising the cumulative rate for this year to 71.5 percent and the cumulative rate for the last 12 months to 104.4 percent. The official figures were released yesterday by the Office of Research, Brazilian Economic Institute of the Getulio Vargas Foundation [FGV], and for the first time since June 1979 they indicate a reduction in the annual growth rate of the General Price Index--104.4 percent from October 1979 to September 1980, as opposed to 109.1 percent from September 1979 to August 1980--since the high rate of inflation recorded in September of last year, 7.7 percent, is not included in the latest calculation.

According to the FGV, the September index is also felt to have been pushed up by the behavior of the Construction Cost Index in the city of Rio de Janeiro; although it has a limited weight in the inflation computation, it reached a substantially higher figure than the Consumer Price Index or the Wholesale Price Index.

The Construction Cost Index reached 8 percent in September, reflecting a 10.3 percent increase in manpower costs and a 6.3 percent increase in the cost of materials. The cumulative rate for this year reached 87.3 percent, and the cumulative rate for the last 12 months was 106.7 percent.

The Wholesale Price Index reached 5.2 percent in terms of domestic offering, bringing the cumulative variation from January to September 1980 to 77.4 percent, and to 113.8 percent in the period October 1979-September 1980. The Wholesale Price Index also shows, for the first time since May 1979, a deceleration in the 12-month rate of inflation in relation to the previous month, when it reached 120 percent.

The Consumer Price Index in the city of Rio de Janeiro, the third component in the inflation calculus, reached 4.4 percent in September, with a cumulative rate of 54.3 percent for this year and 84.4 percent for the past 12 months, according to the FGV. Health and hygiene assistance registered the largest price increase (9.5 percent), followed by household articles (5 percent), public services (4.6 percent), food (4.5 percent), clothing (4.4 percent), housing (3.5 percent) and personal services (3.5 percent).

Predicted October Rate

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 7 Oct 80 p 29

[Text] Inflation this month should come very close to the July rate of 8.4 percent, according to financial experts in Rio. In addition to strong pressure from the increased cost of petroleum derivatives, several other products will cause a renewed acceleration in price rises. The most optimistic forecasters estimate an October inflation rate of about 8 percent.

These analysts, who use the calculations of the Getulio Vargas Foundation, believe that the unusual petroleum price increases set last week as a result of the Iran-Iraq war dampened recent hopes that inflation would remain below 100 percent this year. It is now admitted frankly that in 1980, for the first time, the country will see 3-digit inflation from January to December.

The products whose price has risen this month (petroleum derivatives, cigarettes, milk, automobiles, coffee and sugar, and telephone rates) carry large weight in the formation of wholesale and retail price indexes, so we can expect a high growth rate in the General Price Index (IGP)--which is a measure of inflation, according to FGV criteria--and in the cost of living index in Rio de Janeiro as well.

In addition to this weighty combination of higher-priced products, the cumulative figure for the 10-month period will be inflated by the fact that the rate for October 1979 was low (5.2 percent). Hence, if inflation reaches 7 percent this month, the cumulative figure for January-October will be 83.5 percent, and the figure for the last 12 months will be 107.8 percent.

Accepting this most optimistic (7 percent) figure, and assuming that November and December will average 5 percent (extremely optimistic), the analysis calculate an annual inflation rate of 102 percent.

Before the government decided to raise the prices of petroleum derivatives because of the Middle East conflict, the analysts were estimating an inflation rate of about 97 percent for this year.

CORN SEEN REPLACING SOYBEANS AS PRIMARY CROP

Rio de Janeiro ISTOE in Portuguese 15 Oct 80 pp 84, 85

[Article by R.K.: "The Time of Cornbread and Mush Is Coming"]

[Text] There may be a lot of cornmeal mush with chicken in the future of Brazil. In the next harvest, estimated at 56 million tons of grain, corn should stand out as the great star, with a possible harvest of 23.4 million tons in the Center-South.

Generally, supply conditions should improve next year if early government estimates are confirmed. Weather conditions--responsible this year for the great losses in beans, corn, and once more in wheat--are the main sources of uncertainty and fear.

According to latest figures, agricultural production should increase about 10 percent in the summer harvest. The increase in area was calculated at nearly 5 percent, it being expected that the increase in yields will be more or less the same.

High prices, as expected, attracted great interest to corn. Land destined for that crop should increase between 10 and 16 percent, while the area for soybeans could decrease up to 3 percent or, in the best of cases, remain the same.

Beans, one of the most politically important products, also attracted planters. A sack of beans has sold for as much as 5,000 cruzeiros in recent days, while the shortage of black beans in Rio once more caused riots (read the box on this page).

Rice could increase about 4 percent in the center-south or in the worst of cases, decrease by 1 percent. However, the calculation could possibly be pessimistic. The government is committing 10 billion cruzeiros to the opening of new areas destined initially to rice.

The New Trend

Those estimates, made in September, were based on planting intentions, sales of fertilizers and machinery and production of seeds. The results confirm certain changes already expected some months ago. Corn is spreading throughout the areas traditionally devoted to soybeans, the absolute king of agriculture for a decade in the center-south, and replacing them.

In Parana, the area destined for corn should increase from 10 to 15 percent with respect to the last harvest, while the land planted in soybeans should decrease between 2 and 5 percent. The same trend is observed in Rio Grande do Sul, but in a more accented way. The area in corn should increase from 15 to 20 percent, while that of soybeans should be reduced between 4.5 and 7 percent.

Generally, the traditional areas are changing this season to products with a high price, which require less fertilizer, with soybeans partially moving to the center-west. One reason may also justify the growing interest in corn: it is possible to obtain large increases in yield with that crop. In the case of soybeans, yield increases under normal conditions should be slower in coming from now on after years of great advances.

Up to July, deliveries of fertilizers should increase 10.8 percent in volume by comparison with the first 7 months of last year. This partly reflects advanced purchases. From August to August, prices increased nearly 120 percent and the farmers, providing they could do so, tried to build up stocks. "Up to the end of the year, in the best of cases, the volume of sales of last year should be maintained," said the economic affairs coordinator of the Ministry of Agriculture, Deniz Ribeiro.

According to the same technician, sales of wheeled tractors--as shown by figures received from that industry--increased 8.7 percent from January to August, compared to the same period in 1979. Farmers were waiting the release of loan money and delayed their purchases. Finally, they decided to buy with their own money--there were significant profits this year--forcing some industries to make sudden changes. One of them had dismissed 500 or 600 workers and decided to rehire personnel recently after noting the change in the market. At this time it has no inventory in its yards.

Doubled Costs

The farmers are facing the effects of the great inflation of the past 12 months during this planting season. The majority of costs more than doubled and the Middle East crisis could bring new scares. For the time being, according to Minister of Agriculture Angelo Amaury Stabile, the increase in the price of diesel fuel is contained in the estimates for loans for operating expenses and should, therefore not cause any major problems. The cost of diesel fuel represents from 15 to 18 percent of the variable expenses in agriculture, varying proportionately with the size of the area planted.

According to the minister, serious financing problems may arise, however, within some years if agriculture continues its high rate of growth. That is the reason for his interest in creating new formulas to attract investments to the rural area. One alternative still under study would be the creation of incentives for the formation of associations in temporary partnerships, giving the investors a credit of up to 30 percent in their income tax. The subject has been under study for several months and the plan has already undergone several formulations.

CFP FORECASTS 10.2-PERCENT RISE IN GRAIN PRODUCTION FOR 1980/1981 HARVEST

[Text] Brasilia (O GLOBO)--In a first projection for the 1980/1981 agricultural harvest, the figures of the CFP [Production Finance Commission] point to a 10.2-percent rise in grain production. According to economist Jaime Ramos de Almeida, chief of the CFP Department of Economic Analysis, a record crop is expected, particularly in corn, soybeans and rice. The prospect for beans is not as good.

Despite the record harvest, Almeida feels that the reserves were very low in January 1980, which gave rise to a rather tight situation with respect to supplying the country. This meant there was additional demand, owing to the growth of the country, and extra pressure as a result of the crop failures, mainly in the northeast.

According to Almeida, the result was the recourse to imported corn and beans, "and," he explained, "we are taking steps to import rice."

Results

According to Almeida, the good crop is the result of a combination of factors: the minimum price, which rose beyond the inflation rate for the period, such that farmers responded with additional production; credit, through the VBC, which the economist said covered all the costs of production (except in the case of soybeans), in addition to an open account for expenses, making capital available to anyone who wished to plant; the market--the large crop notwithstanding, the increase in demand has been even greater, offering a good price to the producer, who could liquidate old debts; and the weather, an uncontrollable factor, which has also been helpful.

Reserves

According to de Almeida, the market is tending to stabilize, with the predicted 10-percent increase in production. This should guarantee reserves, while the growth rate in demand should diminish. He cites the livestock sector, for which he predicts a very peaceful situation next year, with good price levels at a fair return to the producer. He bases his prediction on the fact that the growth in demand is not keeping pace with the increase in production.

Function

Da Almeida explained that the role of the CFP has been to coordinate remuneration to the agricultural sector, to prevent the supply, in a market economy, from causing a major drop in prices. This has been done because agriculture is the only activity in which the supply for a given period cannot be adjusted. Once the seed is in the ground, there is no way to alter the production process.

Forecast

The CFP study permits a preliminary comparison between the 1979/1980 and the 1980/1981 crops. The study compares grain production data, but notes that the forecast for the next harvest is only a projection subject to variations. The figures used for reference purposes were the normal averages for the northern and northeastern harvests, as well as the central southern crops which have a second harvest. These averages take into consideration the periods in which weather conditions have caused setbacks.

Following is the comparative table of agricultural harvests, as presented by the CFP:

UNE OPENS CONGRESS IN PIRACICABA WITH SUPPORT OF MAYOR'S OFFICE

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 13 Oct 80 p 5

[Text] Piracicaba, Sao Paulo (O GLOBO)--The 12th Congress of the UNE [National Students Union] will begin today at 0900 hours in the Barao de Serra Negra Municipal Stadium. The congress will last until 16 October, and it is being held with the support of the Methodist University and the office of the mayor of this city. Some 15,000 students are expected to attend, of which 4,000 are voting delegates. Among the topics to be discussed, the most controversial is the election process for the UNE. From all indications, the preference is for direct elections.

The congress will also discuss the status of Brazilian education, the statutes and charter of principles of the UNE and the general state of the nation. Today, the first day, there will be two cultural events: the launching of the book, "History of the UNE," whose contents include statements of past presidents, programs and lines of action of the directorates; and a performance of Brazilian music, with Ivan Lins, Amelinha, Joao Bosco, Elba Ramalho, Diana Pequeno, Marlui Miranda, Decio Marques and the musical group Tarancon e Sa e Guarabira.

Choice

According to Elias Boaventura, dean of the Methodist University of Piracicaba, the convening of the congress is a decisive test for the Methodist Church, "which will have to make a choice in the area of education."

In a message released yesterday, Dom Eduardo Koiak, bishop of Piracicaba, said that "the church has confidence in the young people who do not tolerate an unjust and violent society, but accept the challenge of their mission to transform their country into a free, democratic and just society, which respects the rights of the poor, the young, the aged and the social outcasts." The message concludes:

"I sincerely hope that Brazil's university students will regain the right to legal recognition of their representative organizations, including national organizations, without guardianship and without patronage."

After meeting for several hours yesterday afternoon with the other members of the directorate, Rui Cesar Costa Silva, president of the UNE, announced that he will propose that direct elections be held by 15 November.

He continued: "We will also propose that the struggles and campaigns against tuition increases in the private universities continue, an end to passing on deficits, and that the Federal Council of Education hold a single annual discussion, so the monthly tuition increases in the Brazilian university system will be uniform."

Costa e Silva feels that the Brazilian universities' deficits can in no way be passed on to the students. "Also, in this congress, we should propose that direct elections be held also for the rectors and deans of faculties throughout the country."

STUDIES SHOW 105 TONS OF GOLD IN CEARA; PRODUCTION DOUBLES IN PARA

Gold in Ceara

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 5 Oct 80 p 53

[Article by Fortaleza correspondent Rudolfo Spinola]

[Text] Fortaleza--There is much gold in Ceara. We have always known it, and prospecting ventures have long since begun. Historical and geological records indicate that in one of the poorest areas of the state lies an ore reserve of over 100 tons of gold. Next week, specialists of the CPRM (Mineral Resources Prospecting Company) should forward a report to Brasilia on the studies conducted in the region of Ipu, Reriutaba and Carire, where they estimate there is a reserve of 105 tons of gold.

Owing to the way the gold occurs in the region, exploitation by a private firm is not economically viable, nor is a joint prospecting operation like the one in Serra Relada. In Ipu, Reriutaba and Carire the gold is abundant and easily mined; it is still concentrated in large quantitied in a small area. Those 105 tons are contained in 31 million cubic meters of ground, at from 0.5 to 1 gram per cubic meter.

Cooperativism

The CPRM has a suggestion for the exploitation of this gold potential. It will forward to Brasilia a recommendation that the government implement a cooperative program for exploitation of the gold. Mining cooperatives have already been established in Rio Grande do Norte, and in Reriutaba the second cooperative will be established in the sector. According to the CPRM, the social effect of this exploitation by a cooperative system could represent the economic and social salvation of the entire northern region of the state, one of the areas most severely affected by the drought.

The geologists' reports indicate that a large number of farmers are leaving their traditional activities to work on the exploratory studies, but the landowners where the studies are being conducted have indicated their concern as to what their share will be if the government decides to exploit the gold.

Mining School

The work executed by the CPRM conforms to the general plan outlined by the organ (for the establishment of the Ipu-Reriutaba Mining Cooperative). It includes geological mapping, prospecting and measurement of gold per cubic meter. in order to ascertain the location and concentration of gold in that region. On conclusion of the surveys to determine the gold reserves and conditions for exploitation, the next step will be to set up, by next January, a mining cooperative.

To make it possible to establish a cooperative gold mining system, a technical school has already been installed, which is teaching mining techniques to farmers who have left their traditional work. According to the technicians, these farmers will be the future cooperative members in the region of Ipu, in Engenho Belem. According to the CPRM study, six prospecting nuclei will be installed initially, with 10 cooperants apiece. Prospecting should be conducted solely in the area marked off and analyzed by the company.

Three Possibilities

According to the estimates developed by the CPRM, 6 cubic meters will be processed per day, with three hypothetical results that would justify exploitation: (1) Concentrations of 0.5 gram per cubic meter, which would equal a total return of 468 grams of gold per month, working 26 days a month; (2) A concentration per cubic meter such that the 60 cooperants would extract 780 grams of gold per month; (3) If concentrations of 1 gram per cubic meter are confirmed, production would be as high as 1.56 grams of gold, or over 1.5 kilograms per month.

Production Doubles in Para

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 7 Oct 80 p 27

[Text] Ivan Barreto, director general of the DNPM (National Department of Mineral Production), announced yesterday that gold production in Serra Pelada and the Tapajos region reached 2.4 tons in September 1980, as against 1.1 tons in August. Barreto made the announcement during the "Round of Debates on Mineral Policy," promoted by the chamber committee on mines and energy. He added that this reveals the importance of the Second Decennial Master Plan, which is being drafted by the Ministry of Mines and Energy to enable the country to measure its true mineral potential.

According to Barreto, the present Mining Code is "out of phase," and should undergo some modifications, including provision for environmental protection so that mining will no longer be destructive to nature. Although it will be included in the future Second Decennial Master Plan, the code should be the object of "separate studies," because it is so important to the design of the new policy for the sector which the government plans to apply in the near future.

Importation

Barreto said it is vital that Brazil reduce its mineral imports, but this calls for expediting a new policy for the area in order to offset the expenditures in foreign exchange reserves. He said the DNPM does not think it is logical to "export minerals for the sake of export," but to produce what "others want to purchase." This policy of selling minerals abroad should not be "out of desperation." As he reported, there is still so much to be done in the mineral sector that the Second Decennial Master Plan, which is meant to cover 10 years, could be revised every 2 years; a product that is felt to have priority today "might not have the same priority tomorrow." According to Barreto, the DNPM's Development Division will be divided in two; in addition, a Division of Mines will be created, which will be responsible for studying projects and production and mining problems.

The DNPM director general also reported that the Single Mining Tax should be revised. It should not be increased or decreased, simply handled differently, in order to bring more investment into certain areas involved in the production, mainly into state and municipal areas. Finally, Barreto said a mineral program requires investment, providing for a "reasonable, although perhaps not immediate" return. He noted that Brazilian private enterprise should have a part in all the DNPM plans for mineral production, since this is also the wish of the government itself.

Only 10 Percent of Gold Mined Is Reported

Only 10 percent of the gold actually extracted nationwide is reported. Deputy Alvaro Dias (PMDB-PR) [Brazilian Popular Democratic Movement-Parana], made the accusation yesterday in the chamber, based on a private report drafted in August by the working group of the Ministry of Mines and Energy, which is studying the nation's precious metals and gemstones sector.

In his accusation, the deputy revealed that a significant portion of the gold extracted from a field located north of the Santo Antonio falls on the Jari River was being smuggled abroad. The field is owned by an American, Daniel Ludwig, and the amount of gold smuggled would pay for half the petroleum imported by Brazil.

Referring to accusation he himself had made in the chamber in May of this year regarding gold smuggling, the deputy said they had now been confirmed by the Ministry of Mines and Energy task force, which pointed out that "a relevant aspect of mining is failure to report the product obtained, which is sold to middlemen and flown to undetermined locations."

BRIZOLA DIALOG WITH MPLA--Leonel Brizola, president of the PDT [Democratic Labor Party], met yesterday in Luanda with the Central Committee of the MPLA (Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola) to analyze political developments in the two countries, it was reported yesterday in Porto Alegre by former deputy Neira Moreira (Maranhao), editor of CADERNOS DO TERCEIRO MUNDO. Moreira added that "political, economic and cultural relations between the two countries, through their respective popular parties, will be intensified, fostering an atmosphere of fraternal understanding." Brizola was accompanied by Deputies Jose Mauricio (Rio de Janeiro) and Carlos Souza (Rio Grande do Sul). He also plans to meet with Lucio Lara, MPLA secretary for organizational matters, Henrique Santos, secretary for legal affairs, Afonso Van Dunem, secretary of foreign relations, and Bernardo de Souza, director of institutions and organs of popular government, of the MPLA Central Committee. FOREIGN EXCHANGE RESERVES DECLINE--Brazil's foreign exchange reserves declined by about U.S. $445 million in September from the balance at the end of August. Standing at $6.945 billion in August, they fell to $6.5 billion. Reporting this information, Carlos Geraldo Langoni, president of the Central Bank, said the authorities will continue efforts to reach the end of the year without any further losses; on the contrary, the goal is to raise reserves to $7 billion. "By the end of September," Langoni reported, "Brazil had managed to bring in $9.209 billion, with $2.893 billion from Resolution 63 and $6.316 billion from Law 4131. This means that in September Brazil took in $1.638 billion, as opposed to $1.012 billion in August. In contacts last week with American bankers, Langoni met with the directors of City Bank, Manufacturers, Morgan, Chase and Chemical Bank. According to Langoni, these banks feel they can continue to finance Brazil's balance of payments deficit. He admitted that criticism of Brazilian policy is centered on subsidized interest and preset monetary correction. We have already begun to solve these problems with the decision to make adjustments more in line with those inflation rates. Langoni said he encountered great receptiveness with regard to financing for U.S. importers of Brazilian products and for various programs to develop alternative energy sources. Havana TRABAJADORES in Spanish 16 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] The 20th Anniversary of the CDR Brigade, composed of 73 internationalist construction workers in Angola, has completed, 35 days ahead of schedule, its commitment to finish 13 buildings being constructed in the Viana area, 17 kilometers from Luanda.

The group's plan had set 15 October as the date for conclusion of construction of the 13 buildings and in a general assembly the construction workers agreed to finish that phase before 28 September in salute to the 20th anniversary of the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution. The meeting also agreed to name the brigade in honor of that anniversary.

This group, composed of experienced construction workers in various specialties, has completed the first phase of its commitment to the leadership of our party and to the National Union of Construction Workers to finish the 13 buildings as a salute to this great event among Cuban communists.

The effort made by these workers has meant that these projects will be turned over to the Angolan Government by December of this year, a delivery which was originally planned for the first half of 1981.

This shortening of the timetable represents a saving, in terms of efficiency, of 485 men who were to have joined the project in December--a project which will be completed with a force of 168 workers.

This brigade, which recently returned to our country, worked under the system which links time with work accomplished with satisfactory results. The group will give the CDR National Directorate its insignia flag in tribute to the 20th anniversary of that mass organization.

ANAP NATIONAL MEETING ADOPTS RESOLUTIONS

Havana ANAP in Spanish Aug 80 pp 26-29

[Article by Rimagu]

[Text] The Seventh Plenary Meeting of the National Committee of ANAP [National Association of Small Farmers] was held on 4 June, with the afternoon session chaired by Jose Ramon Machado Ventura, a member of the Political Bureau, and Jose Ramirez Cruz, a member of the party Central Committee and president of that peasant organization, who also led the morning session. Several important aspects of the work being done by ANAP members, including fulfiliment of the resolutions of the Fifth Peasant Congress, were studied.

At the start of the meeting the assembly agreed unanimously to congratulate the people of Ciego de Avila Province on having their province chosen as the site of the central 26 July ceremony and all the peasants in the country for their participation in the March of the Fighting People held on 17 May. It was announced during this important meeting that Ciego de Avila was the most outstanding province in the special 17 May emulation in the 1979-1980 sugarcane harvest, completing its plan 113 percent; the best sugar-cutting brigade in the country was the Augusto Olivares Brigade of Matanzas, which cut more than 5 million arrobas of sugarcane and achieved 233 percent, while the best peasant sugarcane cutter was Arcadio Perez Cruz, from Sancti Spiritus Province, who cut 98,448 arrobas, and the most outstanding hauler in the country was Gerardo Perez, of Matanzas, who hauled 347,384 arrobas, achieving 214 percent of his plan.

The members of the ANAP National Committee studied the matter of compliance with the resolutions of the Fifth Congress and agreed to issue a resolution with regard thereto, the text of which is published here and includes an evaluation of the same, pointing out causes for noncompliance and looking toward the Sixth Congress, which is to be held soon.

In concluding this important meeting, Jose Ramirez Cruz indicated that from now on, future meetings of the various ANAP work sectors will be required to review compliance with the commitments of the previous peasant congress, so that this review may serve as a sort of preparation for the next congress. Then he referred to the importance of increasing the agricultural and livestock production cooperatives in the rest of this year, with emphasis on increasing the areas thereof.

Concerning emulation, he indicated the need to revamp the emulation program so that it may again play its former role; he also called for keeping step in the campaign for sixth grade education so that it will be completed within the allotted time.

Pepe Ramirez said that the Eduardo Saborit Creole and Peasant Music Contest was a success, and he congratulated all the participants, including support personnel.

He concluded by congratulating the provinces which achieved their goals in the sugarcane harvest emulation and in particular Ciego de Avila, which was the most outstanding. He also congratulated the cutters and haulers, the brigades and all the peasants who did an outstanding job in the recently completed sugarcane harvest, while at the same time calling upon all to work with discipline and quality in worthy salute to the Second Party Congress.

Resolutions of the Seventh Plenary Meeting of the ANAP National Committee

Degree of Compliance With the Resolutions of the Fifth Peasant Congress

The Seventh Plenary Meeting of the ANAP National Committee, held on 4 June 1980, the Year of the Second Congress, examined the results of complaince with the resolutions of the Fifth Peasant Congress, thus bringing to a close the process which began in the rank and file organizations in December 1979, and was later carried out in the municipal and provincial committees. The study--made from the close of the Fifth Congress in May 1977 to the present--has permitted the Plenary Meeting of the ANAP National Committee to appreciate the achievements, as well as to evaluate those tasks which presented difficulties and require greater dynamism to be able to approach the Sixth Peasant Congress with a positive balance. It therefore resolves: To charge the National Bureau with the following tasks, so that through its various areas of work, intermediate leadership organizations and rank and file boards of directors, it may encourage them:

1. In the period between the historic fifth congress and the present, organizational measures have been taken which have been implemented on the various levels, but we still need to strengthen the internal functions, guaranteeing that meetings are held by the secretaries and committees on the various levels and especially by the boards of directors and general assemblies of the rank and file organizations to consolidate their functions in the credit and services cooperatives, which were formed as a result of the changeover in the peasant associations and especially in the agricultural and livestock production cooperatives.

2. The peasant woman has contributed her efforts, along with the other peasants, to the development of productive, educational, political and ideological activities, but we must continue to strengthen coordination with the FMC [Cuban Women's Federation] directorate on each level and to adapt the work to the current situation of cooperative development, as well as reviewing structural problems and forming closer work ties between the boards of directors and the FMC delegations, so that we do not refer only to FMC-ANAP brigades, but to work in general with the peasant woman.

3. Although some effort has been made in the work with the UJC through the Youth Brigades with the firm purpose of having the young peasants be the standard-bearers of the highest forms of production, this is still weak. For that reason we must make a careful study of this to stabilize it and see that it is carried out systematically and not just in the form of campaigns, as is now being done.

4. Peasant advancement has been an important factor in the development of activities in the rank and file organizations, but there are still some difficulties, making it necessary to give greater impetus to this activity. Therefore, in addition to strict compliance with the guidelines set forth in the documents regulating the selection process, we must study the practical utilization of that process and its part in the concrete tasks being developed by ANAP in each place.

5. The Historic Dates Emulation and the microemulations still have some difficulties, more or less, which have prevented them from playing their proper role, and we must take suitable measures to see that emulation is the true motivation of our tasks and to utilize for this the framework of the Second Congress Special Emulation in 1980 and for 1981, the 20th anniversary of ANAP.

6. The application of the cadre policy in organization generally has had some success in the various principles which govern it; however, we must direct our work to and make a careful study of everything concerning the stability of the cadres, see that our daily work methods are aimed at all times toward helping them and achieve proper training of those cadres.

7. We must continue our close working relationships with the DC [Civil Defense], comply fully with the missions which it is our organization's task to develop in this area, and encourage the incorporation into the territorial militias of the peasants and their families who are not in the armed forces reserve.

8. Bearing in mind that the Fifth ANAP Congress came out in favor of a savings policy and negotiation for higher wages, we must work on each leadership level to guarantee the proper utilization of the expenditures budget, as well as for more adequate use, care and conservation of the resources our organization has for its operations, as well as to take all the measures which will guarantee the realization of the cooperatives fund discount, so that the CCS [Service and Credit Cooperatives] will have the funds needed for its operation and make a 1 percent contribution to defray the organization's expenses. In addition we must guarantee collection of the social quota from members of the CPA's [Agricultural and Livestock Production Cooperatives] and peasant associations, as well as the cost of the ANAP magazine.

9. The cooperative work has gone slowly, not keeping pace with present demands. There has been failure to comply with the commitment to establish CPA's by 8 March and 17 May, so it is imperative to study this situation critically and to take necessary and timely measures to recover the time lost and comply with the plan to establish 481 CPA's with an area of 5,882.7 caballerias and 13,193 new members for 1980, as well as to increase by 2,142.3 caballerias and 5,507 members those which have been established to date. In addition, we plan to increase the rate of formation and growth for 1981.

10. We must work for the establishment of cooperatives with a greater area for the various crops. In case of sugarcane workers, they can discuss with MINAZ [Ministry of the Sugar Industry] the sale of cutting, loading and hauling equipment to all those who qualify, and to those who do not qualify for the cutting equipment, at least what is needed for loading and hauling. Acquisition of more equipment for irrigating and mechanization for tobacco, miscellaneous crops and livestock cooperatives can be discussed with MINAGRI [Ministry of Agriculture]. In addition, we must discuss with the People's Government and other state agencies, chiefly the Electric Power Enterprise, the acceleration of group housing construction and electrification for these cooperatives. In this way we will not only achieve the establishment of cooperatives, but also the real transformation of the peasant family in its way of producing, living and thinking.

11. We must also work with all the CPA's which have been formed and in those which are being established to achieve their stabilization and proper operation in all areas: organic, accounting, financial and productive--which will permit us to obtain positive progress in this important task, and although we have had some problems with lack of resources, this must not slow us down. For this we must receive from all cooperative members the maximum use of the resources they have at present, so that it will be possible for them to have the economic means to guarantee the acquisition of those they may need in the future.

12. Along with the formation, growth and stability of the CPA's, we must work in all those areas whose characteristics permit, to achieve the merger of cooperatives. We already have the example of mergers in some provinces. Las Tunas and Ciego de Avila are outstanding in this respect, having succeeded in building collectives of a size not achieved before, which permits greater attention to organizational as well as social matters and to the assignment of resources for production.

13. The First Party Congress and the Fifth ANAP Congress approved the development of Integral Production Plans as one of the ways to achieve the transformation of agriculture, and for this reason, thousands of peasants throughout the country have joined these production plans.

In analyzing the work developed by the peasants who have joined such plans, the good work of the peasants of the livestock plans in Havana and Matanzas Provinces and those in the citrus plan of Jaguey, in Matanzas Province, is evident. With their efforts they have contributed to the production achievements of those plans.

While we recognize these efforts, we must also work so that the peasants who have joined these and other integral plans in the rest of the country work earnestly, along with the workers, to achieve the consolidation and development of those important state agricultural and livestock enterprises.

14. With regard to our revolutionary government's call concerning the need to increase export levels, and since sugarcane production is an area in which the Cuban peasants can contribute substantially with their efforts, we will work to comply with the plans for the seeding, cleaning, fertilization and cultivation of the cane fields, as well as to reestablish, through planned programs, the areas of Barbado 4362 which were affected by the rust disease.

15. We will also work to comply with the 1980-81 sugarcane harvest activities, with the plan for delivery as well as in assistance and productivity, through the 17 May Emulation, to coordinate with the state agencies the problems which have arisen with material rewards for the sugarcane harvest emulation and to have our association achieve greater publicity for and organization and development of the millionaire movement. For this purpose we must work to guarantee an objective fulfillment and increase of production in accordance with the present living and working conditions of the peasants.

16. In addition to cultivation activities in the sugarcane fields and the development of the sugarcane harvest, we must work with the Ministry of the Sugar Industry on stabilizing the structure for the sugarcane producers in the peasant sector.

17. The Cuban peasants, in line with the proposal to raise the level of consumption of the people, will continue to develop their efforts in compliance with the plans for sowing and for the production of legumes and vegetables for 1980 equal to 7,389,300 quintals of legumes and 5,864,700 quintals of other vegetables. Here the upcoming program for planting boniato of the CEMSA [Agamic Seeds Improvement Center] 74-228 variety, must be followed. This plan has been implemented in the majority of the provinces, replacing the areas of yucca which could not be seeded in the first quarter.

18. We must continue to work to increase the production and improve the storage of citrus and other fruits, on the development and care of the citrus plantations so that they provide a good export quality, and on the harvests of mango and guava for the manufacture of jams and jellies.

19. We must also continue to encourage compliance with the plans for the sale of other products, which is expected to reach 1,751,900 quintals of citrus fruits, 2,182,200 quintals of other fruits and 899,100 quintals of grains. This will also be an important contribution to the people's consumption needs.

20. In spite of the reverses suffered by tobacco in the 1979-80 harvest as a result of blue mold disease, the peasants will work and exercise all care to recover what was lost in quantity and in quality in this important category of our economy, and proper measures will be taken to combat that disease. In this regard the Vegueros de Jesus del Monte Emulation will be used in its mobilizing and competitive role.

21. We must continue to comply with the measures set forth in the plan for recovery of the coffee crop, guaranteeing the plans for nurseries and sowing and the application of balanced and nitrogen fertilizers to all the areas planned and to encourage other cultivation activities. The use of the 21 September coffee workers' emulation will be an important factor in achieving success here

In the case of cocoa, we will work to comply with the program for this crop, which includes cultivation and the creation of nurseries and plantations, as well as emphasizing storage of the pulp.

In both cases we must comply with the storage plans approved for the 1980-81 harvest.

22. Proper attention is also needed to comply with the livestock production of 305,000 head of cattle, 61,854 quintals of pork, poultry and goat meat and the 19,772,400 liters of milk planned for 1980; to continue our joint efforts in the livestock raising industry area of MINAG and the Institute of Veterinary Medicine and to improve the standards for cattle feeding and the general indexes of animal health protection.

23. To achieve success in productive activities, in addition to the necessary effort to increase productivity and yield per area for each crop, we must continue to develop even further peasant education in the use of technology and science, encouraging and consolidating the work of the plant and animal health commissions.

24. We must cooperate with the proper state agencies to send cooperative members and cadres to be trained as engineers, economists, mid-technicians, accountants, etc. This will guarantee the adequate technical training which will be required in the immediate future by the development of the cooperative movement in our country. In addition, we must contact the universities in each province so that young people from the peasant areas may enter the various disciplines to study the careers needed by the cooperatives and, when they finish their studies, join and work in those cooperatives. We must continue to develop the work being done by scientific and technical organizations such as CEMSA, INIFAT [Institute for Basic Research in Tropical Agriculture], ICA [Institute of Animal Science, the Sugarcane Institute and the Central University, bring agricultural extension services to the CPA's, offering them technical advice and supplying them with varieties which have a potentially high yield, and we must encourage joint work with other universities and their branches.

25. We must reforest the CPA zones, especially in that area included in Sierra Maestra National Park, and publicize and implement measures to protect wildlife, as well as complying with the joint work program with INDAF [National Institute of Forestry Development and Exploitation], which is designed to solve the problem of moving and housing construction in the CPA's.

26. Concerning the development of productive activities, we must work jointly with MINAGRI and MINAZ in improving the mechanisms of planning and contracting and of technical and material assistance to the peasant sector and especially to the cooperative movement.

27. We must continue working on the campaign for sixth grade, placing special emphasis on this final portion; on the incorporation of those peasants who have no chance for classroom study into the clubs for the sixth grade campaign, with a view to completing it by the end of this year, and see that all peasants capable of studying achieve sixth grade education in 1980, the year of the Second Congress.

28. Given the need for the peasants to achieve higher levels in cultural and technical areas at the same rate that they achieve superior grades of production, we will work to bring the peasants to the classrooms of the SOC [Workers and Peasants Secondary School] wherever this is possible, and with the help of the Ministry of Agriculture we will also continue to bring peasant cooperative members into courses for technical improvement.

29. We will reinforce, with the support of ANAP delegates to the Councils of Schools, our cooperation in the repair and construction of schools and their furnishings, basically in the eastern provinces and especially in the mountains, where the situation in this respect is critical in many of the primary schools.

30. We will continue working to improve the Political Orientation Clubs and to systematize, beginning with the next school year, the evaluative tests for orientation workers and boards of directors, as well as implementing the evaluation plan drawn up by the second national session on political studies.

31. We will continue to encourage the amateur peasant artists' movement, from the quantitative as well as the qualitative point of view. With the help of the Ministry of Culture, the best groups of amateurs from each province are being advised, and beginning this year the groups will receive musical instruments through the Technical and Material Supply Enterprise.

32. We will work for qualitative improvement in sports, and we must develop other sports outlets in the peasant areas and establish, together with INDER [National Institute for Sports, Physical Education and Recreation], ways to acquire sports equipment. We also plan to implement peasant sports contests at all levels starting in 1981.

33. Regarding recreation, we will strengthen our ties with the People's Government to increase and reinforce recreational activities in peasant areas, and we will be especially interested in the functioning of the social clubs, which can be social centers for the peasants and for the area.

34. Notwithstanding the progress made in the work of propaganda and agitation, we believe that all the possibilities have not yet been exhausted, even in those areas where the work has gone well. It is imperative also that we solve certain deficiencies which have arisen in the important tasks of volunteer correspondents and printed propaganda. It is also necessary to increase direct propaganda to the masses where feasible, which will be capable of explaining things to them in regard to the diversionism and attacks of our enemies--basically imperialist propaganda.

It is necessary, therefore:

--To offer a systematic work of education and improvement in the work methods of the Committees of Agitation and Propaganda, creating the necessary mechanisms for theoretical orientation and practice proposed in the second session of the CPA's, thus strengthening the direct propaganda developed by those committees.

--To revitalize the volunteer correspondents' movement through implementing a plan for socialist emulation, as well as through establishing effective methods of controlling their work and strengthening work relations in all areas with the Cuban Journalist Union.

--To work to prevent graphic propaganda from running the risk of arriving late at its destination. To do this it will be necessary to comply with delivery deadlines for getting the texts to the design and printing enterprise and then to see that the work is done in the proper time and manner. ANAP magazine, after recovering the rate of its copy runs in May, must plan in the coming months to guarantee the distribution of the magazine on time and in good condition, as well as to continue improving its subject matter and the quality of its work.

35. A positive work has been maintained and developed by the history workers; however, notwithstanding the successes, we must continue to strengthen this work, to implement the suggestions made by the National Meeting of History Workers held in November 1979 and to work for better quality in the works presented in the 1 January and 17 May History Contest. Also, in keeping with the constant changes which take place in the rank and file organizations when CPA's are created, we must see that the recorded history of those organizations is begun immediately, as well as locating any photographs or plates of martyrs and any other historical facts remembered by the assembly.

36. ANAP will continue to work for closer relations with the socialist countries, with the peasant organizations of Latin America and the Caribbean, Africa, Asia and the Middle East, as well as redoubling our efforts toward solidarity with the struggles being launched by peasants in various parts of the world against imperialism, colonialism, neocolonialism, racism and apartheid. We will support the action and struggles for a deep and true agrarian reform being developed by many sister peasant organizations, chiefly in America and the Caribbean.

The tasks mentioned above make up our work goal to encourage and achieve perfect compliance with the tasks emanating from the resolutions of the Fifth Peasant Congress. To face this task, in addition to the effort required from each person, we must strengthen the internal functions and the economic, political and ideological aspects.

Confident in the spirit with which compliance with the resolutions of the Fifth Peasant Congress have been discussed, the Seventh Plenary Meeting of the National Committee exhorts the intermediate leadership organizations, the rank and file organizations and the peasant family to adopt the measures which are appropriate to each case, to finish the year of the Second Party Congress and arrive at the Sixth Peasant Congress with our duty completed, to measure up to our patriotic and revolutionary traditions and the example of dedication, tenacity and fearlessness set each day by our guide and chief, Comrade Fidel Castro. We express to the party and the government our support for and firmness with the policy of the Cuban Revolution, our energetic condemnation of imperialism, which is hatching new aggressions against Cuba, and the miserable trash which is fleeing to the United States. In the face of the insolent imperialist threats the worker-peasant alliance is stronger and more solid than ever, the revolutionary awareness of the peasants, who along with the people are rising to express their unswerving decision to press forward, to confront and destroy those who try to oppose our progress toward the future, is greater and more combative than ever.

In view of this situation created by Yankee imperialism, the peasants have responded positively, closing ranks with all the people in the great demonstration of 1 May, in the fighting marches for cessation of the blockade and the spy flights and the return of Guantanamo Naval Base, and protesting in front of the Peruvian Embassy against the provocations which cost the life of soldier and peasant Pedro Ortiz Cabrera, raising higher each day the banner of work and of combat, demonstrating firmly the unshakable decision of rural men and women not to flinch for an instant, since the Cuban peasants, representing the worker-peasant alliance in the building of socialism, will comply with the historical task entrusted to us by the First Party Congress--to progress to higher levels of production and cooperation under any conditions.

We are in combat and disposed, if necessary, to recall the deeds of the Mambises in 1869 and 1895, of the struggle of the Sierra and of Giron; we trust the party and Fidel and we are united in a single voice, along with all the people, to shout toward victory always.

Approved in the Seventh Plenary Meeting of the National Committee of ANAP.

'MONCADA' REPORTS ON BOMBING OF PLANE OVER BARBADOS

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 19 Oct 80 pp 52-55

[Interview with Freddy Balzan, Venezuelan revolutionary, by Juan Carlos Fernandez: "The Murderers Must Not Go Free"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in boldface]

> [Text] Months before the acquittal of the four murderers of Barbados by a Venezuelan military court was announced, a reporter from the magazine MONCADA interviewed Freddy Balzan, a Venezuelan internationalist revolutionary, in Managua, Nicaragua. As soon as he heard of the heinous sabotage of the Cubana de Aviacion airplane and knew one of those allegedly implicated in the terrorist act, he followed the threads of the investigation and publicly denounced the criminals.
> The infamous decision to acquit them was seen coming. The governing clique of COPEI [Social Christian Party] and, particularly, President Luis Herrera Campins decided to ask the court to acquit the proven murderers.
> MONCADA gave VERDE OLIVO the result of this interview about the COPEI government's responsibility in the judicial farce. It was part of the campaign of provocation and slander orchestrated for months by the Christian Democrat clique in power in Venezuela.

On that day, this Venezuelan, who is a great conversationalist, looked like a caged tiger and seemed to be older than 44. His glasses framed his long, pale face and the lines on his forehead gave him a sad look.

Freddy Balzan destroys that image as soon as he starts talking and laughing. His laughter is like an explosion and, occasionally, like long bursts of shooting. At those times, his optimism and his tremendous self-confidence overflow.

Without any doubt, he is a man who has lived a lot and, therefore, must have suffered a lot also. It is unspoken but obvious from his talk that he does not regret having been born. If he had the opportunity to be born again, he would repeat the things he has said, written and done.

We learned from him that he was very poor as a boy, he was an acolyte at the Caracas cathedral and, in 1957, he studied at a technical school where he became an electrician, plumber and installer. He later found journalism as a vocation. He debuted in this profession by interviewing Pablo Neruda, "a very great and very simple man, very much a poet and very much a patriot." They congratulated him for the interview but, in reality, according to what he told me, "he did that interview, not I."

Since then he has never stopped being a journalist nor stopped being and feeling like a worker.

He saw the guerrilla movement that was developing in Venezuela in the 1960's as the only chance to solve the serious social problems of his country. For this he was imprisoned. He was released due to the tremendous clamor that the journalists in Caracas made. In reprisal, he remained unemployed and had no other alternative than to sell books. However, he did not break his ties with the press workers; he was later elected secretary general of their union.

In 1971, as a delegate to the IOJ Congress held in Havana, he met Carlos Fonseca Amador, that great national hero of Nicaragua who continued Sandino's unfinished work,and other important Sandinist leaders.

Back in Caracas he began to work as a correspondent for PRENSA LATINA and later was elected vice president of the IOJ.

No one can explain how he could fulfill all these responsibilities but the truth is that he did it. Those closest to him know that if he achieved this, it was due to the help of his indefatigable and faithful wife Rosalia. She supported and encouraged him to offer his unconditional support to the Sandinists living in Caracas and to organize the World Conference of Solidarity with the People of Nicaragua at a time when imperialism was trying to frustrate the people's triumph over Somoza.

With the Sandinist victory on 19 July 1979, he did not hesitate to drop everything in Caracas to take an airplane with Rosalia and 150 FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] exiles in Venezuela to work for the consolidation of the people's victory in Nicaragua. He stayed as an assistant to Major Tomas Borge, soldier, poet, minister of interior and member of the National Directorate of the FSLN. Later he was responsible for the magazine PATRIA LIBRE, the organ of the Ministry of Defense and the Ministry of Interior.

This is Freddy Balzan. When he learned of the heinous crime of sabotaging a civilian Cubana de Aviacion airplane in flight near the coast of Barbados which killed 73 passengers and learned that Freddy Lugo, a known terrorist, was one of those implicated in this abominable deed, he took up the task of tying up the loose ends that he knew about to reach a conclusion. Although very little was known about this sabotage and its perpetrators, he publicly denounced the fact that the other person implicated who had been identified as Jose Vazquez Garcia was actually Hernan Ricardo.

For all these reasons the enemy hates, insults and cannot stand this internationalist soldier named Freddy Balzan.

Freddy Balzan, Venezuelan revolutionary, publicly denounced the criminals who blew up the Cubana de Aviacion airplane in which 73 persons died.

[Question] Am I right, comrade Balzan?

[Answer] It is at least very logical that you are.

[Question] What background do you have about the perpetrators of the sabotage of the Cubana de Aviacion civilian airplane in Barbados?

[Answer] On 21 September 1976, at 1900 hours, I was waiting in the airport at Maiquetia, Venezuela, for Camilo, my son, who was returning from the Jose Marti

International Pioneers Camp in Havana. The flight arrived from Panama and I was very surprised when I saw Hernan Ricardo, a photographer for the newspaper EL MUNDO, edited by Cuban counterrevolutionary Carlos Romero, among the passengers. We always suspect Hernan Ricardo in the union because of his ties with the political police, the DISIP [Directorate of Intelligence and Prevention Services].

Hernan Ricardo was acting completely idiotic--drunk. He said: "Hello, Freddy. How is the union?"

"It is fine. Where are you coming from?" I asked him.

"From Panama." He added: "Did you know about the bomb that exploded at Cubana de Aviacion in Panama?"

He surprised me. I knew nothing about it. As a correspondent for PRENSA LATINA, I should have known it or, at least, have had some information. I attributed my ignorance to not having been in the office that afternoon since I had to do a number of things at the union and go to the airport to meet my son. Nevertheless, I answered that I had heard the news on the radio. However, I remained anxious to learn what had actually happened.

After Hernan Ricardo left, a journalist who worked on the CSE [Supreme Electoral Council] came up. She asked me: "Do you know that person?" I answered: "Yes, he is a member of the union. Why?"

She said angrily: "He got on the airplane and when he learned of my stay in Havana, he threatened to have me fired."

I comforted her so that she would not worry. I promised her I would meet with the board of directors of the union about speaking to Carlos Delgado Chapellin, at that time president of the CSE, to prevent this threat from materializing.

The next day I told Aurelio Gil Beroe, secretary-organizer, about what happened and asked him to speak to the board of directors of the CSE and tell them that we would not stand for any type of sanction against this woman.

A week later, Jorge Baloz and I ate lunch at the Tia Pura Restaurant located some 50 meters from the National Journalists Association in Caracas. Four people came in; one of them was Hernan Ricardo. My friend said to me: "Look at the 'caramelitos' that just arrived." In Venezuela, "caramelito" connotes "crook."

Hernan Ricardo was accompanied by Freddy Lugo and two other people I did not know. Later, we learned that they were Luis Posada Carriles, /Bambi/, and Orlando Bosch; they were also implicated in the sabotage of the Cubana de Aviacion airplane in Barbados. This meeting occurred on 27 September 1976.

[Question] How did you hear the news of the sabotage of the Cubana de Aviacion airplane in Barbados?

[Answer] That day I was at my job in the PRENSA LATINA office in Caracas. The young members of the fencing delegation that would travel on the Cubana de Aviacion airplane sabotaged in Barbados that afternoon arrived in the morning. They were very happy and showed us the medals they had won in the sports competition held a few days earlier in Caracas; they had won a resounding victory.

That afternoon, at approximately 1600 hours, the first news was heard on the radio in Caracas: "A Cubana de Aviacion airplane crashed in the sea near Barbados." It was very brief. Later, they reported that there were 73 victims of the accident which occurred near the Barbados airport. Subsequent reports indicated that the airplane had been sabotaged.

We felt great pain because of the harsh fact: 73 lives were lost. When we learned that sabotage was involved, the pain changed to anger and indignation.

Later other information came which indicated that two Venezuelans arrested in Trinidad were suspected of perpetrating the airplane sabotage.

At that time, the identity of these individuals was not known. It was not until the morning of 7 October that it was learned that those arrested, according to information from the Trinidad authorities, were named Freddy Lugo and Jose Vazquez Garcia.

[Question] How did you find out that Jose Vazquez Garcia was an alias?

[Answer] When I reached the press union, I called comrade Aurelio Gil Beroe and the office secretary and asked them to get me Freddy Lugo's personal file. At that time, we did not know that the other man arrested in Trinidad was Hernan Ricardo.

Freddy Lugo was a little strange and everywhere he went, he was always accompanied by Hernan Ricardo. My journalist comrades said that Freddy Lugo was a homosexual.

It was known that Hernan Ricardo had invited several journalists to take a course on explosives and he was a self-proclaimed expert on this. His ties with the political police, the Venezuelan DISIP, were obvious. Later, it was verified that he was an agent of Division 54 which is concerned with control of leftist foreigners.

This background made me think very hard. I also requested his personal file; I wrote down his telephone number and called him. His mother told me that Hernan Ricardo was in Coro Department at an aunt's house. I called there and the aunt explained to me that he had not visited her for several months. I again called Hernan Ricardo's mother and explained to her that her son was not in Coro as she had told me. She answered that she thought he had left for there since he had left with his suitcase the day before. That increased my suspicions that the other man arrested in Trinidad was not Jose Vazquez Garcia; that was the alias by which Hernan Ricardo was hiding his identity.

My conjectures were well supported:

1) Hernan Ricardo had spoken to me about an attack against the Cubana de Aviacion offices in Panama several hours before the news was announced. 2) He had been seen at the Tia Pura Restaurant with Freddy Lugo, Orlando Bosch and Luis Posada Carriles, /Bambi/, known Cuban terrorists. 3) Hernan Ricardo had left on a trip, according to his own mother. 4) He was always seen with Freddy Lugo who was arrested by the Trinidad authorities and accused of being one of the perpetrators of the sabotage of the Cubana de Aviacion airplane near the coast of Barbados.

This evidence led me to conclude that Jose Vazquez Garcia was an alias and that, in reality, it was Hernan Ricardo. Therefore, we had to denounce him publicly.

We were moved by great indignation although, at the same time, an incredible sadness that we shared with the Cuban people overcame us. We had to carry out our action.

[Question] How did you announce your suspicions?

[Answer] To us it was a moral obligation to publicly announce what we already knew even though we did not have all the parts. We also thought that the problem of evidence was secondary. The most important thing was to denounce the murderers of the 73 passengers of the sabotaged Cuban airplane.

Our action was taken very responsibly. I was the secretary general of the press union and I had never shirked my responsibilities. Now I assumed them with all their implications.

The following day it could be seen that I had acted correctly. The Trinidad police announced that the arrested man had deceived them by identifying himself as Jose Vazquez Garcia when, in reality, he was named Hernan Ricardo.

The denunciation was broadcast by Radio Rumbo--the most powerful one in the capital --Radio Continente and Radio Tiempo and written in several press organs. Then, in the trial against Hernan Ricardo and Freddy Lugo, it was indicated that they held a telephone conversation from Barbados with the office of Luis Posada Carriles called ICICA [Criminal Investigations Company, Inc.]. Hernan Ricardo said in it: "The thing about the bus loaded with dogs has been resolved."

[Question] What maneuvers have the CIA and its henchmen in Caracas done to pressure and distort the judicial process?

[Answer] It is obvious that Orlando Bosch always had ties with the CIA as did Luis Posada Carriles, Bambi. Hernan Ricardo, who placed the explosive devices in the airplane, was a photographer for one of the Caracas newspapers. He photographed those who attended the receptions given by the embassies of socialist countries. Those photographs never appeared in the newspapers so it was obvious that he was spying. Obviously these photographs indiscriminately went to the Venezuelan political police or the U.S. Embassy.

Therefore, it is not strange that these "friends" used various means and maneuvers to intimidate the members of the court and used pressure to affect the trial. I talked on several occasions with Judge Delia Estaba Moreno in her office. She spoke to me about the insults, abuse and threats she received daily. She is a very honest woman and, on repeated occasions, expressed to me her anguish and her family's because of the death threats that she received. Her parents asked her on several occasions to withdraw from the case. Nevertheless, she continued. I encouraged her in her mission. I told her: "Delia, you are an honest woman and this is a case where your prestige as judge and the prestige of Venezuelan justice are at play. International attention is on your work because the perpetrators of the criminal sabotage of the Cuban airplane must be punished."

The six defense lawyers for the criminals pressured the different judges and their threats affected some of them. Therefore, the case of the sabotage of the Cuban airplane in Barbados became like a /leper/: no one wanted to approach the famous /Cuban Airplane Case, File 8494/. Practically all the judges, except those like Dr Delia Estaba, were inhibited, some through cowardice and others through moral complicity with the perpetrators of the sabotage or with the interests of U.S. imperialism.

At that time, CORU [Council of United Revolutionary Organizations], an organization of several groups of Cuban terrorists which was allegedly responsible for the sabotage, made a statement in Caracas. The participation of the Cuban counterrevolution in this attack and, therefore, of the U.S. CIA which has nurtured it for all these years became evident.

Later there were many judicial incidents and political pressures. It is true that Carlos Andres Perez, then president of Venezuela, played an important part in giving the green light for this case to be heard and gave personal instructions to Dr Delia Estaba as she herself told me. However, it is also true that there were people in the Democratic Action Party who were opposed to having judges connected with the party, like Dr Delia Estaba, involved in the trial.

Delia herself confessed her disappointment to me on several occasions in the way Octavio Lepage, minister of interior, answered her when she told him about the death threats she had received from the counterrevolutionary and terrorist group behind Orlando Bosch. She also explained to me that she had not had the opportunity to talk directly with Carlos Andres Perez to try to keep the proceedings from being diverted. At that time, the publicity given to this case in Venezuela was aimed at distorting many of the legal aspects. To give an idea, publicity and lawyers and journalists cost more than $250,000.

For this reason, the trial was slowly changing direction. Also the lack of any person to personally accuse the murderers made it possible for the murky intrigues in this trial to become effective.

On several occasions, I told Dr Delia Estaba that I would assume that role but she felt it was not necessary, that the evidence against the criminals was solid and overwhelming. Apart from that, there were other legal considerations; I had not been in the airplane and did not have ties with these people.

The truth is that the case finally went to a military court and, from that moment on, the trial took a different direction. Within the framework of Venezuelan justice, the Cuban counterrevolutionaries and the CIA have managed to negatively influence the military judges hearing the case. I say this because of a report that appeared recently in the magazine RESUMEN where I observed with surprise that the military court has accepted alleged evidence contributed by the defense of the murderers which exonerates the principal defendants because it shows that the explosive device that blew up was not the one that had been placed in the airplane cabin but another which had been placed in the freight compartment. The accused never had access to it. This, of course, is totally false. A 31-page technical report with 48 photographs compiled by the British laboratory Royal Armament Research Development Establishment was inexplicably filed away for more than 3 years.

The report in RESUMEN also specualted that there could be a verdict favorable to the four prisoners. It stated that Judge Delia Estaba passed the airplane case on to military jurisdiction. It is no secret in Venezuela that the defense lawyers for the four criminals did everything possible to take the case from this judge, precisely because of the honesty with which she handled the proceedings.

The Venezuelan Government headed by Luis Herrera Campins has permitted judicial honesty to become unscrupulously lax and thus becomes an accomplice to the perpetrators of such a heinous deed as the Barbados crime.

NAVAL ACADEMY STUDENTS INTERVIEWED AT NEW CENTER

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 19 Oct 80 pp 34-37

[Article by Pablo Noa: "Why Am I a Midshipman?"]

[Text] It was during the week of homage to the vanguards of socialist emulation of the FAR [Revolutionary Armed Forces] this year that I met Dagoberto, Rafael, Humberto, Roberto and Rolando, five midshipmen who stood out for their fraternal and outgoing relationships. They are youths like all the others--happy and spontaneous, responsible and disciplined.

Where they are, one speaks of the sea, ships, boats, rockets, equipment, the training that they receive and something that summarizes it all--the MGR [Revolutionary Navy] Naval Academy where they study.

Now I was visiting its new installations, still under construction, and I met them again.

Rafael Gamez Navarro told his comrades: "Fidel said it; the sea is for strong, bold men!"

I took advantage of the fact that they were having a break to talk about the academy and the specialties that they have chosen.

Rafael, an 18-year-old from Guantanamo, initiated the dialog.

"Ever since I was little, I have liked the sea. When they talked to me about entering the academy, I did not think twice. I took the step immediately."

I asked him what he thought now, after 3 years.

"I am more convinced that this is my true vocation. I study the specialty of naval radiocommunications and I strive to obtain the best grades in the courses that they teach us.

"A great number of youths like us ignore the chances for development and the prospects that a midshipman has. His technical, professional and military training are fully guaranteed in the planned courses of the academy."

I asked again: "You all agree with Rafael? What do you think, Anaya?"

"Look, my greatest aspiration was to become an MGR officer. Here I am training as an engineer in armaments, rockets and artillery which is what I like. The youths can choose other advanced-level courses like: engineer-navigator of surface units; engineer in armaments, torpedoes and antisubmarine weapons; engineer in naval radiocommunications; naval electrical engineer; and engineer in naval energy installations."

Dagoberto Anaya Cordero has been named FAR vanguard on two occasions. He is 20 years old and is a native of Baire in Granma Province.

Humberto Gonzalez Francis, also an FAR vanguard from Marianao, is 18 years old and is being trained as a naval electrical engineer. He interrupted: "Look, comrade. We have great prospects here. We acquire advanced technical and professional training. You leave ready to face any problem in life. A youth who comes to the academy has his future guaranteed. The study programs are of good quality as are the activities that form part of the general program. There are sports and different cultural performances and recreation has increased."

Humberto continued: "All this is very good. Nevertheless, the conclusion each one of us must reach is that when we graduate and also as students, we will always be in the position to offer the knowledge we have for the defense of the socialist fatherland. That is the most important thing to me." That left two of the five vanguards: Roberto Perez and Rolando Hechevarria. I could not speak with the first because he was on a training cruise on the 20th Anniversario training ship.

Rolando told me that he lives in 10 de Octubre in Havana and is 22 years old. "I am training as an engineer in naval energy installations. Like my comrades, I think that the academy offers youths the opportunity to train as MGR command cadres. A midshipman is a future officer who is going to lend his services to the different units."

He continued explaining: "The academy is still under construction. According to what has been said, it will be finished in 1983. What will be here then is incredible. The planned installations and buildings include even the smallest elements in order to train the students who enroll well."

What Rolando stated is true. Minutes before talking with them, I had a brief meeting with Frigate Capt Angel Goni Rodriguez who gave us a general report.

"When the construction of the academy is finished, it will have buildings for the departments and branches, ranges for antennas, radio beacons and repair work, an indoor gymnasium, an auditorium for about 1,000 people and an amphitheater for 3,500. It will also have outdoor sports areas. The Santa Ana River is being adapted for use in the practice of nautical sports and training activities for the midshipmen. There will also be a place for the academy ships, principally the training ships Vietnam Heroico, Jose Marti and 20th Anniversario."

Frigate Captain Goni continued with more detailed information.

"The academy graduates officers for the MGR at a special advanced level in seven specialties; for the Merchant Marine and Ministry of the Fishing Industry, there are four specialties. Now there are regular directed courses and 'self-taught' courses. All last 5 years. They conclude with the student's presentation of a graduation project or thesis; he also takes state examinations before a committee appointed by the minister of the FAR."

And after graduation....

"The student receives a diploma and medal as an advanced-level graduate. With the rank of corvette lieutenant engineer, he goes on to the units of the MGR, Merchant Marine or the Ministry of the Fishing Industry."

Goni continued: "The subsequent development of each one will be determined by the work that he does, his attitude toward advancement and the results of the work he does. Therefore, when he reaches his assignment, he will hold a low position and be promoted slowly to advanced levels along the line of command or technology. Depending on his characteristics, he can advance through postgraduate courses that are also taught at the academy."

Frigate Captain Goni pointed out some of the planned initiatives. One is to create the tradition of beginning the courses with a patriotic march in which the midshipmen candidates will participate. This would begin in Las Coloradas, go through La Plata and end at the Sierra Maestra--in other words, the same trip made by the founders of the Rebel Army. It would render homage to the precursors of the present FAR. During the march, the students would take the military oath.

We said goodbye to Goni and later to the FAR vanguards. We retained the impression of life at the academy and, especially, of the horizons that the revolution opens to the youths who enroll as midshipmen and acquire political, military and technical skill to successfully fulfill the missions that the party and the socialist state assign to them. We could understand the pride of the students when they told us why they are midshipmen.

PEASANT BANK LOAN REQUIREMENTS DISCUSSED

Havana ANAP in Spanish Aug 80 p 19

[Article by ANAP Technical Section and the Directorate for Peasant Credit of the Cuban National Bank]

[Text] Frequently, at the seminars and meetings of cooperative members and in our daily work, we hear about difficulties or inconveniences in negotiating and obtaining credit requested by the CPA's [Agricultural and Livestock Production Cooperatives] from banking institutions.

The cause of such problems is generally found in an incorrect interpretation of current regulations and in ignorance of the standards and procedures which regulate credit to the peasant sector.

As a consequence, the negotiations are repeated unnecessarily and there are delays in granting the loans, or such loans are not received in the amount needed for the production involved.

If economic controls are not properly applied, there is a negative effect on the administration, utilization and recovery of credit. If the requirements established by the bank are not fulfilled, this also affects the credit negotiations.

An advantageous labor relationship is achieved when bank officials correctly apply the current standards and procedures for granting loans to the peasant sector and when the cooperative members chosen to represent that sector also know those regulations, have a clear idea of their functions as credit negotiaters and know what action to take to insure that the CPA obtains and repays its loans.

In this article we are beginning a series designed to discuss the current standards and procedures concerning individual as well as cooperative peasant credit.

We will begin with credit to the agricultural and livestock production cooperatives, and we will examine first the requirements they must meet to receive from the National Bank the credits needed for their production and investment plan.

Certain requirements must be met by the CPA at the time it is organized. These are:

--To present to the bank's credit department its certificate of registration in the Register of Agricultural and Livestock Organizations (REANE) of the State Committee for Statistics in its municipality.

The name of the CPA, the date of registration and its agricultural and livestock organization code must appear in the certificate. The bank office will note these data and return the certificate to the CPA.

--To bring to the banking institution a list of the complete names--including the permanent identification card number--of all members of the cooperative. Whenever a member withdraws or a new member is admitted, this must be communicated to the banking institution.

--To give the credit department the names of members of the board of directors which will maintain relations with the bank in opening and operating current accounts, as well as to request, receive and liquidate bank loans. The designated members of the cooperative must register their signatures with the bank when this information is delivered to the bank or later on. When a bank-accredited member is replaced in his functions, the bank is to be so informed.

In addition, every 2 and 1/2 years, when the general assembly meets to elect the board of directors, the bank will be informed as to which members of the cooperative were elected to carry on business with the bank. It is not necessary to deposit any money to formalize the opening of bank accounts.

--To deliver to the bank a copy of the internal regulations of the CPA, previously certified by the municipal delegation of ANAP [National Association of Small Farmers]. The CPA has 90 days after its formation to present its internal regulations.

The internal regulations must include:

a) The closing date of operations for each economic year (annual report) and the term, starting with that date, within which the liquidation of its operations with the bank will take place; and

b) The form and number of the advances which will be paid the cooperative members for work done.

If these data do not appear in the internal regulations, the CPA must bring to the bank a copy of the resolution of the general assembly concerning those matters.

Let us now consider those requirements which the CPA meets regularly in its credit negotiations.

Yearly:

To begin its economic operations, it presents:

--The production and investment plan approved by the CPA's general assembly and by the corresponding office of MINAG [Ministry of Agriculture], or of MINAZ [Ministry of the Sugar Industry] if it involves a sugar production CPA.

--The contracts signed with the state or storage enterprises for the special purchase and sale of agricultural and livestock products.

--The contracts for the purchase and sale of goods and services, signed by the state enterprises which supply them.

In closing its operations for the economic year, it must present:

--The annual report of the results. When the use of contracts is not authorized the CPA will present in place of the same a copy of the plans it has agreed upon with the corresponding state enterprises.

Monthly:

The CPA will inform the bank concerning the development of current production and investment and the termination of same if this should occur during the month.

It will meet requirements which are not fulfilled with established regularity, but rather when necessary; that is, they depend on circumstances.

1. Credit requests

Although the CPA may have presented its production and investment plan to the bank for credit approval, it must request that credit on forms issued by the bank and supplied by the credit branch itself.

Once a credit is approved, the CPA formalizes it by signing the proper form in which the basic data thereof are given, such as the maximum amount, the annual interest rate, the project and the data of expiration.

This concludes the requirements to be met by the CPA in requesting its loan. In upcoming issues of the magazine we will discuss other subjects, with new insights on bank credit.

GUZMAN HAILS ARMED FORCES, POLICE, URGES PRD UNITY

Santo Domingo EL CARIBE in Spanish 13 Oct 80 pp 1B, 8B

[Article by Miguel A. Matos: "Armed Forces and National Police Norms"]

[Excerpt] Cevicos, Cotui, 12 Oct (Special)--President Antonio Guzman today said his government respects the Constitution of the Republic and that at no time "have I strayed from the institutionalism of the Armed Forces and of the National Police."

The head of state said that this is the goal "I have set out to achieve fully during my administration."

Guzman expressed himself in these terms in response to a question as to his view of the statement made last Friday by the president of the Chamber of Deputies, attorney Hatuey De Camps, who said that one cannot speak of this country's Armed Forces as such while efforts are being made at times to convert them "from Balaguerism to Guzmanism."

De Camps said, in a press conference, that the traditional institutions "cannot be Guzmanist," and that they must respond to the state, whether they be the legislative bodies, the executive or the judicial.

In this regard, President Guzman said that "this is a government fundamentally respectful of the Constitution of the Republic, and at no time have I strayed from the institutionalism of the Armed Forces and of the National Police, which is the goal I have set out to achieve fully during my administration."

The head of state visited this community to attend the feast today in celebration of the day of Nuestra Senora del Pilar.

In another regard, President Guzman stated that his "government is channeling its best possible efforts to the benefit of the disadvantaged masses."

"But," he added, "we found a country stripped of all the resources needed to build a government such as we have wanted to build."

Guzman asserted that "we took over a government whose coffers were empty, with none of the resources we had expected to receive."

"Nevertheless," the chief executive said, "as if to punish us, oil prices have risen month by month to the point where, today, production of our principal items of export is insufficient to pay for fuel we are using in the Dominican Republic."

President Guzman pointed out that today the Dominican Republic imports oil only to the extent of around $500 million and that exports barely exceed that figure, inclusive of all the basic products exported by the country.

He said we only "hope that each and every Dominican will make an effort to produce more to bring happiness to all Dominicans, and that to accomplish this it is necessary that the PRD [Dominican Revolutionary Party] continue governing the country."

Guzman made this statement during a visit he made to the PRD local headquarters in this community.

He said that for the PRD to continue governing this country, "you must remain united and continue increasing the strength of the party so that every day there will be a greater possibility of winning another term in power."

The head of state urged the members of the PRD to "maintain the unity of the party and the force its members impart to the PRD, because only thus, all united, can that force increase to the benefit of the PRD membership and of the Dominican Republic."

Guzman said he hopes the PRD "will govern for many years to come."

"The PRD," he added, "must fulfill its commitment, governing for a long time, but for that, it is necessary to unite and that each member of the party be able to attract new members into the party of national hope."

The president asserted that in the members of the PRD "lies the future of the party, whose rise to power has been the culmination of 14 years of struggle by the Dominicans."

ISA DEPUTY DIRECTOR TERMS AGRARIAN REFORM INEFFECTIVE

Santo Domingo EL CARIBE in Spanish 26 Sep 80 pp 1, 4

[Article by Roberto Rodriguez]

[Text] Santiago, 25 Sep--The executive deputy director of the Higher Institute for Agriculture (ISA) said today that the land reform that has been effected in the Dominican Republic has served only to bring uncertainty and insecurity to the farmers and the cattle breeders.

Agricultural expert Fernando Fernandez asserted that this situation exists "because land is distributed to make political converts and not to solve the problems of the man in the countryside."

Fernandez said that since this land reform does not seek to increase the country's agricultural production, "land is distributed just so it can be said that settlements are being made, without taking into account the type of crop for which the land is suitable.

"The result of this land reform, which lacks seriousness and coherence, is that more and more the Dominican Republic will have to import agricultural products that we could grow here," stated Fernandez.

In statements to EL CARIBE, he said that due to this mistaken land policy, "agriculture will continue to get worse, the problems will increase and the result of this situation is unpredictable.

"The most typical example that we can give of the erroneousness of the land policy that has been followed in this country is that by next year we will have to import a great deal of rice to be able to meet the national demand," said Fernandez.

He said that "If this situation exists with regard to rice growing, which we have been struggling with since the time of the Indians, what can we expect with other agricultural products?"

Fernandez added that rice is one of the products into which most funds are invested yearly "and national production still is not capable of meeting our own demand."

He maintained that "The origin of the country's agricultural problems is that attention is concentrated on one area while other areas are neglected.

"Often land is surrendered, but its preparation is neglected. Seeds are not delivered, or when they are, they are not good. Weeds, blight and diseases are not checked, and to complicate the situation, marketing is neglected," Fernandez stated.

He said: "Our authorities have not been able to learn the lesson that in agriculture everything has to be done well."

Fernandez said that the data on the Dominican Republic's agricultural production shows that "correct methods are not being applied in this country.

"All we have to do is look at the figures on the large quantity of agricultural products that we are importing," he added.

Fernandez said that the most deplorable aspect of the whole situation "is that one questions public officials about the country's condition, and what they do is compare our situation with that of other countries.

"We cannot be satisfied with the excuse that other countries are not growing a product that for many reasons we could be producing in sufficient quantity, at least to meet the national demand," stated Fernandez.

Regarding the Dominican Republic's cattle production, Fernandez said: "The country has followed a vague policy in this area."

He said the Dominican Republic cannot develop cattle raising based on concentrates, specifically "grains that we are not producing."

Fernandez pointed out that "One of the limits to cattle development in this country is poor feeding, because we have neglected nourishment based on fodder," with which, he said, milk production could be doubled.

Fernandez said that the same is happening with control of diseases that affect milk production, such as mastitis, which Fernandez explained greatly damages that production.

He maintained that as a result of the incidence of mastitis in the Dominican Republic, "through a study completed it has been established that the cattle breeders are losing about 25 to 30 percent in milk production."

OPPOSITION VICTORIES LOCALLY, IN U. S. NOTED

Need for Opposition

Kingston DAILY GLEANER in English 6 Nov 80 p 6

[Editorial: "Government and Opposition"]

[Text] Everywhere, a political party which gains an overwhelming majority in elections is facing two dangers: first, it may succumb to the temptation to disregard a powerless Opposition, and secondly it may find factions developing in its own ranks.

The two dangers are closely related. The feeling that the Opposition can be disregarded suggests that if the triumphant party does a little internal squabbling, it will make no difference. If some group in the majority takes up a cause which the leadership would prefer to leave alone, or if there is a clash of personalities, there can be serious weakening in Government policy.

The new Government of Jamaica has a gigantic task before it. It needs to avoid cleavages in its ranks, without stifling free discussion within party caucuses. It needs to encourage constructive work among its MPs and to make clear that the task of a backbench MP is as important as that of a minister. Leaders and rank and file alike have the responsibility of holding the party together for the creation of a real working Government. We believe that Mr. Seaga has the ability and the experience to handle the difficult task.

Under the previous regime, certain persons seemed privileged to say what they like in public. The consequence was that some of the wild statements made so frightened the electorate and the party itself that they probably contributed to the retirement from politics of several well-qualified ministers. With the huge JLP majority such a state of affairs would make it possible for party intrigue to begin with a view to building up a sub-party--not to control impropriety in statements, but to exploit such impropriety to harass the leadership.

One can expect there to be irritating and apparently time-wasting attacks in the House by one or two members of the Opposition. But this is in the nature of our system, and should not be crushed by a powerful Government majority. Indeed it will be the task of the Speaker to defend the rights of the Opposition.

There have been rumblings that Mr. Manley may not remain to lead the Opposition. This would be a pity. We hope that for his party's sake and that of Parliament that he will remain and give to his duties as Leader of the Opposition the same enthusiasm as he gave to those of Prime Minister.

For in the words of President Luis Herrera of Venezuela, a democracy accords political leaders various roles, and it is in the efficient performance of each that democracy is strengthened.

U. S. Republicans Win

Kingston DAILY GLEANER in English 8 Nov 80 p 6

[Editorial: "U. S. Turns Right"]

[Text] Mr. Ronald Reagan has been swept into the presidency of the United States on a conservative wave which has given him a landslide in the electoral votes and provided him with a majority in the Senate--the first Republican-controlled Senate in 26 years. Mr. Jimmy Carter now becomes the first elected president since 1932 to be turned out of office after only one term.

It was clear from early in the campaign that the American people had no confidence in Mr. Carter's ability to hold down inflation, to reduce unemployment and generally to turn the American economy around. The size of Mr. Reagan's victory reflects the electorate's total rejection of Mr. Carter's economic policies and would make it appear that such successes as he might have had with his foreign policies weighed little in the voters' decision. It now seems a safe conjecture that even had the hostages in Iran been released before the end of the campaign it would have done little for Mr. Carter.

In giving their massive support to Mr. Reagan the American people must be presumed to have accepted his economic philosophy of less government interference in the economy, reduced government spending and less taxes. How he will reconcile all this with his expressed intention of increasing the arms budget, his support for federal assistance to the Chrysler Corporation and the city of New York and his promise to restrict the import of automobiles and steel, remains to be seen. Of course this apparent contradiction could well be the result of rhetoric dictated by the exigencies of an election campaign; for if Mr. Reagan is to be judged by his record as Governor of California and by the company he keeps, the market forces will be freer to work in the American economy during his presidency.

But it is the United States foreign policy under Mr. Reagan which is the occasion of greatest speculation since his election as president. Mr. Reagan has already served notice that the SALT II treaty negotiated over seven years by three administrations will have to be renegotiated since he says, the treaty should be more favourable to the United States. Mr. Henry Kissinger, one of Mr. Reagan's advisors, has predicted that the Soviets will agree to this after an initial protest, but it might be interesting to speculate what effect this will have on detente in the months to come and whether this signals a harder line with Moscow.

Again Mr. Reagan's openly expressed dislike for the PLO cannot be expected to do much to further the effect of the Camp David accord, one of Mr. Carter's most outstanding achievements; nor will it work to ease the very tense Middle East situation. It is possible that this expressed attitude towards the PLO might have been nothing more than a sop to the Jewish vote and that Congress and the realities of office might induce in Mr. Reagan a more restrained attitude towards the PLO and by extension the Middle East question.

The election of a conservative president and Senate in the United States is of more than a little significance to Jamaica, particularly at this time. It is fair to say that with the removal of the Government of the People's National Party, which was tending further and further left, it is possible for our two countries to have far better relations than could have been expected before the Jamaica Labour Party came to power. With the clearly non-aligned policy recently enunciated by Prime Minister Edward Seaga the country may be less vulnerable to the effects of any East-West row that could develop during the Reagan administration.

'Ridicule' Did Not Work

Kingston DAILY GLEANER in English 7 Nov 80 p 10

[Column by Vincent Tulloch "Blow to Communism"]

[Text] Two men, reviled by their political opponents as dangerous to the world and to their nations, have had surprising confidence heaped on them by a public which is intelligent enough to discard the pompous judgment of the self-righteous. President Carter, during the campaign for the presidency did not miss an opportunity to ridicule Ronald Reagan and point out that if Reagan ever assumed the post of President of the United States, he would be the one to plunge the world into the Third World War. At home, former Prime Minister Michael Manley, who until last Thursday night allowed himself to be misled in believing that he had a divine right to rule this country, tried every conceivable means of discrediting Edward Seaga. Fortunately, the people were intelligent enough to banish him to the political wilderness where he at least will learn to be humble again.

Edward Seaga's triumph is well deserved. He is a man who believes in his people and in strong and will bring to national life the type of firmness and no-nonsense leadership which has been sadly lacking in this country for some time now. The Peoples National Party for its part would be well advised to spend some time taking stock of its programmes. It should try and find out where it went wrong with the people. It is not that difficult, but considering the stubborn attitude of its leaders, there may just pretend not to know that the association with the communists from within and out, was a major factor in their massive defeat.

It is interesting to note that even in the United States the conservatives have taken a close march on the liberals and democrats. For the first time in twenty years or so the Republicans have taken control of the Senate, and in the process ousting well known liberals among them Senators Frank Church and George McGovern, the well known admirer of Fidel Catro's model island. It was also reported that the Republicans have strengthened their hands in Congress, although they still remain in the minority.

Ronald Reagan was not my favourite for the Presidency, not because I believed the rubbish put out by his opponents about his racial bias and other such. I felt that he may probably be too old for the position. But since the American people obviously do not think so, why should I bother. To the Americans, judging by the massive support that he received, he represents their last hope of restoring their great nation to its rightful place in international affairs. The decision of the American people is similar to that taken by the British a little over a year ago when they defied all odds and elected the first woman Prime Minister, whom they thought would be able to stop the decline of the once great nation and restore it to a place of power in the world. No one expects America to play the role of the international policeman, but at the same time, it is unacceptable to see America being pushed about by Russia, Cuba and Iran.

Other factors may have been taken into consideration by the Americans when they decided to dump Carter. The same aims and objectives however I think apply to the Jamaican voters when they dumped Michael Manley and his party. Embodied in Edward Seaga are the necessary skills and ability of leadership which they believe will help the country in this crucial phase of its history. The people wanted a leader to whom they can look for direction, rather than a man who takes orders from a committee or some non-persons sitting on a party board called a national executive committee.

The firm decision of Prime Minister Seaga in expelling Ulises Estrada is just an indication that the man will not tolerate any form of nonsense from anyone. Very soon he will have to move to trim the over-staffed embassies of Russia and Cuba which bear no relation to the work being done there. The Jamaican embassy in Moscow must be closed as it serves no purpose other than offering jobs for the boys. Those members of the Brigadista in Cuba, as soon as their training is completed must be recalled and no more should be sent there. You do not give your enemy "rope to hang you".

Kingston in years gone by was the focal political point in the Caribbean area. There are no reasons why it should not be so now. Our foreign policy must be geared toward a greater role in Caribbean affairs in the near future. Of course this will depend a great deal on the economic recovery of the country.

The upswing of the Republicans at the polls on Tuesday should give Prime Minister Seaga a better chance of tapping private investments from America. It is obvious that the Americans and other Western interests are pleased with the results of the October 30 elections.

The results indicate a strong blow to communism. That does not mean that the communists have disappeared from the scene. The recall of Estrada does not necessarily mean that Cuba will not attempt to meddle in Jamaica's domestic affairs. All that is happening is that they are now taking stock and looking at other strategies to be used in the near future. Jamaica is too important to be abandoned so easily. If the gallant effort of the Jamaican people to crush communism in the country and possibly the region is to be meaningful, the United States and other Western countries, notably Britain, West Germany and Canada must do more to help the new government in its development programmes.

Economics Wins Over Idealogy

Kingston DAILY GLEANER in English 10 Nov 80 p 6

[Article by Carl Stone]

[Text] There is a rather interesting parallel between Ronald Reagan's landslide victory in the U.S. Presidential Elections and the massive popular vote and seat margin earned by Seaga's JLP in our recent parliamentary elections. Both victories represent opposition parties fighting governing parties on bread and butter issues while their opponents who lost tried to defend themselves with ideological attacks against a background of declining and deteriorating economies.

Carter tried to paint Reagan as a right wing, racist war-monger in order to scare American voters from voting for the Republican candidate. The idea was to project Reagan as being an ultra-conservative in a society where liberalism and liberal tendencies have dominated the politics of the country in the post-war period. Reagan kept his attacks on Carter concentrated on the economic failures of his first term and by so doing he mobilised strong support across a wide segment of U.S. society that was feeling the pinch of joblessness, inflation and deteriorating living standards.

The two months I spent in the U.S. as well as my earlier visits over the year left me with the distinct impression that Reagan was a winner. He was twice as articulate as Carter and his focus on bread and butter issues struck chords of working class responses that were disguised by the polls and the hostility towards him in most of the liberal tending mass media.

In the Jamaican case, Manley and the PNP tried to paint Seaga as a right wing fascist who if elected would impose a regime of oppression on Jamaican black people. Seaga like Reagan concentrated on the bread and butter economic issues and was able to convince large numbers of PNP 1976 voters and large numbers of new voters to abandon a PNP government that was moving the country closer and closer to total economic ruin.

Communism fear

There, of course, the similarity ends as Seaga was able to use ideological counter-attacks to great advantage by appealing to the electorate's fear of communism and the deep suspicion of the PNP-Communist alliance.

In our September poll, when we asked voters what were the crucial issues in the election in Jamaica, ideology was ranked much lower than either the economic issues or political violence. That fact, however, disguises the impact of the communist issue in the election.

We found that among urban middle class PNP voters who had defected to the JLP and among rural voters in Portland and in the western parishes (from Manchester to St. James) a significant number of persons switching from PNP to JLP gave fears of communism as the major issue in the election.

WPJ apologists (including discredited pollster Derek Gordon) are, of course, trying to pretend that the WPJ helped rather than hurt the PNP. We know quite well from recent experience just how much some communist voices confuse their own fantasies with reality and how much they distort the truth.

Credibility

As I indicated in my recent article (Why the JLP will win) elections never settle ideological disputes in competitive party system. Our socialists and communists will remain with their ideological beliefs. Those who oppose them will continue to oppose them. The competing ideological tendencies will gain ascendancy when their management of economic affairs and the flow of benefits to the electorate give them a fund of credibility on which to build electoral victories.

If the Jamaican economy were booming, the JLP would not have been able to get any mileage out of the communism issue. More importantly, the JLP will only be able to knock the wind out of the sails of leftism, socialism and communism by demonstrating that a non-leftist approach to economic management can bring better results than the nightmare of increasing poverty and immiseration the Manley socialist government visited on this poor country. I would be very surprised if the new Seaga regime was not successful in achieving that.

The task, however, is much larger than that. It involves the challenge of finding a strategy by which economic progress and long term development can be achieved to the benefit of workers, capitalists and small scale producers and hustlers in a difficult world economic situation. It involves a search for economic strategies and alternatives that can take us beyond not ony the bad years of the Manley government but the better but inadequate progress achieved under the JLP in the 1960's. A mere return to the policies of the 1960's will not meet that challenge.

PNP: SOLVE PROBLEMS BEFORE ATTEMPTING INDEPENDENCE

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 27 Oct 80 pp 1, 2

[Excerpts] Turks and Caicos Opposition Progressive National Party has urged the islands' people to "vigorously reject the dangerous and nonsensical ideas of premature independence."

In its 1980 general election manifesto, the PNP charged that the Turks and Caicos could become a full-fledged Communist satellite if the ruling Peoples' Democratic Movement succeed in taking the country to independence.

"The Progressive National Party is by no means opposed to the concept of political independence, as such," the PNP said in its manifesto entitled: "For A Better Tomorrow."

"We believed that all men everywhere should be free and that a people should have the right to decide their destiny," it added.

The PNP said that freedom demands responsibilities and that the Turks and Caicos is in no position at the moment to shoulder the heavy responsibilities that independence will thrust upon the islands.

"Besides, as parents prepare a son or daughter for the responsibilities of manhood and womanhood so must we, as a people, prepare and make ourselves ready for responsibilities of nationhood which comes with independence," the PNP said.

It said that "those misguided individuals in the PDM Government who are advocating this course of action" are driven by blind ambition, greed and lust for power. "They do not have the best interest of this country at heart," it charged.

"The Progressive National Party believes that the central and most crucial issue facing our country today is that of economic development that would lead to a marked improvement in the quality of life for our people," the PNP said.

It said the question of independence should only be tackled when "we have solved the many social and economic problems now facing us."

"We have no desire of going cap-in-hand to other countries asking them to feed us," the PNP manifesto declared.

It said that independence "must not be in name only, but in substance and when we get it we want to be proud of it."

"History shows that premature independence is a disaster," the PNP said. "We believe that the economic development we seek could be achieved within the existing constitutional framework."

"It is our conviction that a small country such as ours," the PNP said, "with limited natural resources, unable to balance our budget, would prove economically and politically unstable and could very rapidly find ourselves at the mercy of other nations, including those in the Communist camp."

The PNP said it is "adamantly opposed" to the doctrine of atheism and Communism.

"Consequently we are strongly opposing present trends in the PDM government towards closer ties with Communist Cuba and Jamaica," the manifesto said.

"And it is our considered opinion that if the PDM should succeed in taking this country to independence, the Turks and Caicos would very soon thereafter become a full-fledged Communist satellite," the PNP said.

"While our democratic principles behoove us to respect the rights of the leaders of these countries to their brand of politics and economic administration, we of the PNP feel we must guard ourselves and the country against adverse influence by them," said the PNP.

"We of the Progressive National Party, therefore urge the people of the Turks and Caicos Islands to vigorously reject the dangerous and nonsensical idea of premature independence for these islands and to join forces with the Progressive National Party in helping to save our country from further decay and ruin," the PNP concluded.

LACK OF SUCCESS DOES NOT DISHEARTEN RISK-CONTRACT FIRMS

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 26 Oct 80 p 35

[Text] Five years after former President Ernesto Geisel opened the risk contracts and 4 years after the first contract signed with British Petroleum in September 1976, the outcome of 64 contracts made with 23 foreign companies and the IPT [Technological Research Institute]/CESP [Sao Paulo Electric Company] consortium was: 34 wells drilled without any favorable results.

But this does not discourage the foreign companies, which are unanimous in asserting that there are strong possibilities of finding more petroleum in Brazil. Walter Gabardo Horstmann, vice president of Esso, and Mary Bhat, president of Elf, both say their companies will continue exploring in our country, as their geologists have confidence in the resources of Brazil's sedimentary basins.

A detailed study published by the United Nations in 1977 entitled "Petroleum Cooperation Among Developing Countries," reveals that just 10 countries outside the Arab world, including Brazil, India, Mexico and Peru, with a combined population of over 739 million inhabitants, have a reasonable chance of supplying their own needs and becoming petroleum exporters in coming years.

In Brazil production increased 14 percent in the 5 years from 1975 to 1980, but its share of supply fell from 20 percent in 1975 to 18 percent this year due to a 24-percent consumption increase in the 1975-80 period. PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation] officials explain, however, that although the concern about increasing production dates from the oil-embargo crisis of 1973, this joint effort with foreign companies has not had greater impact because consumption has increased more than has production.

Peter Landsberg, president of Shell, and Sergio Santos, vice president of Texaco, reiterate the need for petroleum-consuming countries and companies to seek new discoveries to meet their own commitments and now--more than ever--such companies assert they are committed to oil exploration.

Drilling Report

The 34 wells drilled, none of commercial interest, were done by the following companies: offshore, 5 by Pennzoil, 5 by British Petroleum, 9 by Esso, 1 by Hispanoil, 2 by Elf, 6 by Pecton, 3 by Shell and 1 by Citco; onshore, 1 by the IPT/CESP consortium. Four more wells are now being drilled: one off the Para coast by Esso, one off the Maranhao coast by Citco and two onshore in the Parana Basin by IPT/CESP.

During the same 4-year period in which foreign companies have operated in Brazil, PETROBRAS drilled 1,542 wells with a success ratio of 16.4 percent and completed 671 oil and gas development wells discovered before 1976. For the next 5 years, investments provided for in contracts signed thus far are $400 million, while PETROBRAS has a 5-Year Plan providing for spending $4.6 billion during the same period.

The following fields were discovered by PETROBRAS after 1976: on the Rio de Janeiro shelf, the company discovered the Bagre, Enchova, Cherne, Corvina and Pampo fields; offshore Espirito Santo, the Cacao; offshore Ceara, the Xareu and Curima; and offshore Bahia an as yet unnamed field; onshore, it discovered the fields of Mossoro, in Rio Grande do Norte, and Lagoa Parda, in Espirito Santo.

Risk Contract Summary

What Was Done	Risk Companies	PETROBRAS
Exploratory wells completed	34	1,542
Seismic surveys	61,459 km	108,000 km
Oil and gas wells completed (including wells being developed)	0	671
Success ratio of exploratory wells	0	16.4 percent
Number of drilling rigs in operation	4	75
Planned wells	48 required 60 optional	1,776
Investments made in exploration	$360,926,000	$7.3 billion
Exploration investments planned through 1985	$400 million	$4.6 billion

Esso Remains Confident

"Esso is interested in finding petroleum outside the Arab world and our geologists in Brazil are confident. They are counting upon finding oil here. The expenditures we have made here, about $150 million, without our having found anything, are just part of the bargain. As soon as oil is found, these costs will be paid for," said Walter Gabardo Horstmann, vice president of Esso Brasileira de Petroleo S.A.

To him, the large investments in the petroleum industry are a big bargain. Peter Fletcher, director of the company, explained that Esso, as all international petroleum companies, has its customers and must honor its commitments; hence, it must find more oil, as Arab oil will eventually be depleted.

Exxon Corporation, parent company of Esso, operates in about 100 countries in various activities involving exploration, production and distribution of petroleum, mining, petrochemicals, computers and education. But its main purpose continues to be development and marketing of petroleum. In South America, Exxon is everywhere except Ecuador, Bolivia and Peru, and on this continent its major concern is petroleum exploration, especially in Argentina and Brazil.

In Brazil, Esso has participated in all bid competitions for exploration in the form of providing services with a risk clause. In its 12 contracts signed with PETROBRAS, the company has drilled 10 wells, of which 3 are offshore Sao Paulo, 1 is offshore Rio de Janeiro and 6 are at the mouth of the Amazon, without obtaining favorable results.

But this does not trouble its management, which considers the large capital investment as part of the bargain. The $150 million already spent by the company without the slightest possibility of a return--because no petroleum was discovered--does not discourage Esso management in the least. Vice President Walter Gabardo Horstmann explains that Esso geologists firmly believe there is oil in this country; the problem is to find it.

He considered Brazil's risk-contract arrangement quite improved with the latest incentives given by the government at the end of last year. However, he made certain observations in reference to the areas retained by PETROBRAS for direct development. As a matter of fact, foreign companies in general allege that the Brazilian state enterprise chose the best areas for itself. However, in the petroleum industry, the best area depends upon the viewpoint and analytical criteria of the geologist who is interpreting the data.

Meanwhile, PETROBRAS asserts that if the areas analyzed by it and considered of possible occurrence were to be opened to foreign companies, the service contracts with a risk clause would no longer have this clause, because they would be contracted with virtual certainty, although there is no absolute certainty before discovery.

Peter Fletcher also cited as an important aspect that the Brazilian contracts became more attractive when systemic data of all the nation's sedimentary basins were opened to the contractors. He explained that the companies are thus able to analyze the area as a whole and choose the most appropriate tract. Another change that is no less important is participation by the contracting companies in the production phase which, although the responsibility of PETROBRAS, will be monitored by a joint committee.

Diversification

After the 1973 crisis, Exxon began to diversify its activities, becoming an energy company, not only due to the need to develop other energy sources but also to provide a financial base for the company to sustain the high costs of production development--a very lucrative activity, but one involving much working capital.

Within that concept Exxon participates in various activities besides those directly or indirectly associated with petroleum. To cite just the most important ones in South America, Walter Gabardo Horstmann relates that the company acquired a large copper-mining company in Chile. He said that at the time of the Allende government the copper-mining companies were expropriated, but after the Pinochet government took over these companies were considered uneconomical and were sold to foreign firms. That was the case of Las Disputadas, acquired by Exxon.

Another important activity of the company in South America is in Colombia, where Exxon owns 50 percent of the Carbocol company, (the remaining 50 percent is owned by the government), which is developing steam coal. Investments in this area are about $3 billion, as the whole development infrastructure is being constructed.

In Brazil, besides petroleum exploration and distribution of petroleum derivatives, Esso operates in the petrochemical sector and in lubricants and additives. But one of its major objectives in coming years is participation in alcohol. Mr Horstmann revealed that he has about $10 million available in the next 3 years to develop an entire infrastructure for distribution, storage and other services allied to alcohol. In regard to the alcohol plan, the company's vice president commented that, so far as he knows, foreign companies may not enter the alcohol plan, but he himself believes that this is a problem to be solved by private domestic companies and Brazilian businessmen are responding vigorously to this proposal of the government.

BRASPETRO Discovers Oil and Enhances Supplies

With the same purpose as the multinational companies that operate in Brazil, in search of petroleum, BRASPETRO (PETROBRAS International, Inc) operates abroad. But with a small difference: BRASPETRO, unlike the international companies, does not sell the petroleum it discovers but assures Brazil a supply through its discoveries.

In existence for 8 years, BRASPETRO is now active in seven countries and, of the nine in which it has operated, it discovered petroleum in five: Algeria, Angola, Libya, Iran and Iraq. In the last-named it discovered the gigantic Majnoon field and another slightly smaller one, the Nahr Umr field, in 1973. From April 1972, when it was created, through this September, the company had invested $400 million in petroleum prospecting, exploration, development and production. Its revenues through this year have been $740 million.

According to Joel Mendes Renno, vice president, the company is now working in Angola, Algeria, China, Guatemala, Iraq, Libya and Trinidad and Tobago. Of these countries, it produces oil in Angola and Algeria amounting to 2,200 barrels a day in the former and 900 barrels a day in the latter. In the others in which it discovered petroleum, production is or will be done by the country itself, as in the case of Iraq.

The revenue of $740 million obtained by BRASPETRO is generally paid through supplies of petroleum to PETROBRAS, in the following manner: with the sale of oil produced in Algeria, the company is credited with $20 million, but this amount pays for part of the 10,000 barrels a day that Algeria sends to Brazil; payment of all investments made by the Brazilian company in Iraq in 7 years, about $305 million, will be amortized with the supply of 11,250,000 barrels.

Furthermore, another $166 million represent a differential through receipt from Iraq, at official prices, of 20,750,000 barrels of petroleum as compensation for discovery of the Majnoon and Nahr Umr fields. The BRASPETRO vice president further pointed out that at the time this contract was being negotiated, in December of last year, any extra quantity of petroleum could be obtained only by resorting to the spot market, where prices were about $8 higher than official prices.

Also computed in the $740 million is the $216 million of difference through September of this year represented by purchasing from Iraq, also at official prices, 160,000 barrels of oil a day beginning 1 January. This supply [illegible],000 barrels a day is assured for 13 years in a contract with Iraq.

Elf Believes New Methods Will Show Results

"We are in an epoch of new methods of exploration. It is possible today to have better seismic results than we had previously. For this reason I think Brazil is very likely to discover petroleum, especially in the areas where PETROBRAS did not have results with the seismic survey due to the basalt rock which masks responses," asserted the president of BRASELFA (Elf Equitaine do Brasil), Hary Bhat.

He believes there are strong possibilities of large oil reserves being discovered and especially, in his personal opinion, in the onshore region of Middle Amazonas where basalt rock has impeded greater seismic analyses. He bases his belief on the recent discovery made by PETROBRAS through the Jurua well, where large gas reserves were found.

Having participated in the four bidding rounds held by PETROBRAS other than the second, Elf Equitaine has drilled two wells at the mouth of the Amazon River without successful results but, as all the other foreign firms, this fact does not discourage the French company.

"It is necessary to compare the wells that have been drilled, less than 35, with the size of the Brazilian sedimentary basins. On the continental shelf alone the sedimentary basin is 8 million [as published] kilometers in extent. So we come to the conclusion that the lack of success thus far is not significant," he said.

Mr Hary Bhat also reported that his company developed a seismic prospecting method which it used in Middle Amazonas with much success and which can detect occurrences beyond the basalt layer without masking results. He also pointed out that offshore exploration technology has developed greatly in recent years as well as onshore.

In regard to diversification of petroleum companies since the 1973 crisis, Mr Hary Bhat commented that the crisis served to show the petroleum-consuming world that it should seek new alternatives for this mineral, which in turn should have but one paramount use, which is for petrochemicals. And, from that point of view, he feels Brazil, with the crisis between Iraq and Iran, has now made important decisions with this in mind.

Mr Hary Bhat contends that the current Persian Gulf war demonstrates that petroleum is not a weapon. The consuming world has now gone almost 2 months without two large suppliers and without being "shipwrecked," he said. But in any event, it is important to realize that it is increasingly necessary to discover other sources of supply for petroleum. "That is why I believe in Brazil," he concluded.

Activity Is Big Bargain

From the concession, which was the first method of petroleum exploration by international companies, to the most rigid risk contract, which today is that of Iraq, the search for oil on foreign territory is still one of the best bargains: the second largest source of U.S. revenue is the bonus paid by companies that want to explore on U.S. territory.

The difference between the service contract with risk clause adopted in Brazil and the form used in the United States and Great Britain is, essentially, that if the foreign company does not discover petroleum here it receives nothing, but neither does the nation gain anything by it, whereas in the United States and Great Britain the government would benefit by charging a high bonus.

The first impression is that in these countries the risk of not finding petroleum is much less than in Brazil, where so far no foreign company has found it. But it happens that, for example, in the Baltimore [Canyon] of the United States, where geological aspects are similar to those of the Santos Basin, in 1976 several companies drilled 11 wells and there was only one discovery of noncommercial gas. But the nation, by charging a bonus, made about $1.176 billion.

In the United States, the company enters a bid for the area it wants to explore and whichever pays the most gets the tract. Should oil be found, this company is the owner of the output, paying, of course, all taxes on the profit, which is another form of government revenue. In Great Britain, besides a bonus for exploration rights, the government also charges royalty (12.5 percent), tax on the revenue from the oil (45 percent) and also the income tax (52 percent), representing revenue for the crown of about 70 percent from the sale of the petroleum by the discovering company.

In Brazil the contracts are kept strictly secret but, according to the contract between PETROBRAS and Marathon divulged by reporter Jose de Alencar of DIARIO DO POVO in February of this year, the contracting company will be owner of 30 to 35 percent of the petroleum to be discovered for a period of 15 years. Its cost is to have made an investment of at least $13.5 million in the exploration phase, to have paid $250,000 for geological information furnished by PETROBRAS--in the other countries no geological information is furnished--and a bonus of $500,000 to break a tie with another bidder.

After discovery, Marathon, by the contract's terms, will have to develop the field, which costs at least 50 times as much as the company spent in the exploration phase, but production will be done by PETROBRAS, which will also pay the contracting company all development costs in a period of 5 years, with interest of 1 percent above the Bank of America prime rate.

In Argentina, where the contract is a little more like that of Brazil, the contracting risk company also pays a kind of bonus to explore and, if it finds petroleum, it evaluates, develops and produces it, but this oil is sold to the government at a price of 60 to 65 percent of the the OPEC market price. There, as in Brazil, the contract remains in force for half the lifetime of the field.

This shows that in reality the Brazilian risk contract, in comparison with the mode of exploration adopted in other countries, is attractive to foreign companies, although the companies allege that the risk in Brazil, in comparison to other countries, is greater. But these same businessmen admit that the latest changes in the contract made by the government have improved it.

The businessmen admit that one can no longer demand from a country what, for example, was demanded by the U.S. firm Occidental Petroleum Company in 1970, to explore for a period of 25 years an area of 180,000 square kilometers, to spend only $15 million in the first 6 years and, if petroleum were found, evaluation and development to be the responsibility of PETROBRAS, which, after production, would give 18 percent of the oil to the company free of tax. The multinational companies admit that this type of proposal is "unacceptable."

For most of the 24 companies that have signed risk contracts with PETROBRAS, whether operating alone or in the form of consortia, the greatest change in the Brazilian government's concept regarding risk exploration by contractors is opening the whole Brazilian continental shelf to contracts, with the exception of the areas chosen by PETROBRAS.

Besides this opening, considered by PETROBRAS experts as the greatest concession that can be made while still trying to preserve the vestiges of monopoly, participation by the companies in the production phase in the form of a committee is at least, according to them, a step toward permitting them to share in this phase. But the PETROBRAS legal department proved that to let the companies actually produce petroleum would completely circumvent Law No 2004, which grants to PETROBRAS the monopoly of exploration, production and marketing.

Petroleum Exploration in Brazil

Key: 1. Ares for Contracts
2. PETROBRAS Areas
3. Areas with Risk Contract
4. Areas Being Negotiated

PETROBRAS allocated 4.23 million square kilometers for risk areas onshore and offshore and kept 864,000 square kilometers, which limits will be in force through the seventh bidding round.

DOMINICAN PRESIDENT TO INVESTIGATE ILLEGAL HAITIANS PROBLEM

Santo Domingo EL CARIBE in Spanish 24 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Eunice Llubares]

[Text] President Antonio Guzman yesterday announced the opening of a broad investigation to determine the number of Haitians residing in this country illegally for the purpose of returning them to their own country.

Guzman said that all foreigners, not just Haitians, whose status is irregular must leave the country.

"A massive investigation is being planned to uncover Haitians who are living illegally in this country," the president said at a press conference he held in the offices of the Dominican Revolutionary Party (PRD).

Guzman arrived at the offices shortly after 0930 hours accompanied by high civilian and military officials.

Various nationwide organizations have charged that an alarming number of illegal Haitians are performing farm work to the detriment of Dominican labor.

Several legislators said recently that the "peaceful penetration" of the Haitians has caused unemployment of native labor in agriculture and other areas.

The congressmen demanded the adoption of emergency measures to deal with the situation.

The chief of state gave assurances that the authorities will take the necessary measures to solve the problem of Haitian immigrants, who appear to have invaded the farms and cities of this country.

Guzman said that the government will respect the Haitian border in order that the Dominican Republic "will be respected."

Guzman stated that the authorities will pay great attention to the population along the border in the belief that this is the best way to protect the nation's territory.

The president spoke on the subject in response to a reporter's question. He made it clear that the investigation will not take the form of a census, but will help identify accurately those Haitian nationals who live here illegally.

Haitian immigration has been greatest in the provinces of Valverde, El Seibo and Espaillat, according to charges made by legislators of those areas.

Recently the governor of the province of Espaillat, Remberto de los Angeles, said that almost half the coffee pickers there are Haitians.

The Haitians work for lower wages than the Dominican workers and the plantation owners prefer to hire them.

Guzman said that the investigation will be in charge of the competent authorities.

The chief executive was at the PRD headquarters for a short time and when asked about the reason for his visit, he replied: "I like to come to party headquarters every day."

He was accompanied by the president of the political organization, Dr Ivelisse Prats de Perez.

Guzman was cheered by party rank and file members upon his arrival at PRD headquarters, and they followed him to the second floor of the building where he talked with reporters.

HONDURAN WORKERS UNION WELCOMES PEACE WITH EL SALVADOR

Tegucigalpa EL CRONISTA in Spanish 18 Oct 80 pp 1, 4

[Text] The General Workers Federation (CGT) welcomed the announcement of the signing of peace between Honduras and El Salvador, because it considers that the countries have always desired this, along with tranquility.

This is what Felicito Avila Ordonez, secretary general of the CGT, officially said. He added that as far back as 1969 they had had a meeting with the Salvadoran Workers Federation (CTS) at the Goascoran border point.

It was there that the desire for peace and the desire to maintain it was established by both fraternal countries--a desire that is soon to be definitely realized.

"For the CGT," he added, "the understanding that was reached by both countries is welcome, but we must not forget the basis of the doctrine that was brought about by Honduras, in the terms of the resolution of the seven problems that they stated."

A Just Decision

Avila said that the decision of both governments to agree to peace before the end of the year is a just action for the well-being of the nations.

With respect to whether the signing of the peace may be a strategic measure on the part of the government of the United States, the CGT spokesman indicated that above all it is a matter for the sovereignty of each country.

In short, they do not believe that the United States has set out in search of a "political axis," in the face of the progress of leftist movements in Central America.

"Let us dismiss the idea that we are following instructions from abroad, since we are acting according to our own conscience in establishing whether or not the agreement for peace with El Salvador is advantageous, without considering that it is a guideline from North America," he added.

For the CGT, beyond any foreign interest there is the foremost desire of both countries to establish real peace and tranquility, which will be attained when the points in conflict are settled.

With respect to the possibility that a last minute impasse might emerge because former Salvadoran foreign ministers always said that they would respect, and fight for, the preservation of the irreductibility of their territory, he said that both governments were negotiating.

"In negotiating, there are aspects for which there must be agreement and in conclusion we dismiss the idea that there is any nonpatriot who will offer to give our territory away, or question its irreductibility," concluded the CGT secretary.

SELA COOPERATION WITH ARAB NATIONS DISCUSSED

Caracas BOHEMIA in Spanish 27 Oct-2 Nov 80 pp 53-54

[Text] It is obvious that the Latin American Economic System (SELA) is still an expectation, and is usually viewed with distrust, as if disappointment were surrounding its movements, as has occurred with other attempts at integration the fate of which has not been exactly the best. Possibly because of what has been mentioned, insufficient attention has been given to one of the most important announcements that SELA has made. Not even the fact that Caracas was the site of the aforementioned announcement evoked any great interest in it. But it is only fair to admit that the indifference did not apply to Cayetano Ramirez, reporter for EL NACIONAL. Which announcement is this? Well, no less than an interest in developing financial and economic cooperation with the Arab countries, since the experience of Arlabank, the first Arab-Latin American bank established in Peru 2 years ago, has now proven positive, though still modest.

The secretary of SELA, Carlos Alzamora, gave the press the reasons underlying a proposal that has now made headway. It would take a long time, although it would be worth the trouble, to repeat these reasons. We shall confine ourselves to a few which we deem essential. On the one hand, the potential for Latin American development, comprising all types of resources and a high rate of economic growth, could constitute a preferential option for Arab investors "interested in a strategic dispersion of their investments." On the other hand, the Arab region is also one of great economic growth, and both are the only ones in the world with the valuable distinction of being self-sufficient in energy. There are, in addition, many mutual interests, such as those striving for a reform in the international monetary system and, from a more general standpoint, for more just relations of exchange with the developed world, and also for a new economic order.

We are only in the early stages, and hence the optimism should be tempered. Nevertheless, it is almost obvious that a full development of the aforementioned ties could represent one of the greatest changes in international life that we have in store. It would involve a strategic move destined to support what OPEC has represented, in the international power relations. It would strike at the apex, reducing the power of the highly industrialized countries to impose financial and economic conditions, giving the north-south confrontation a means of accumulating strength on behalf of the latter. One is almost saying the same thing by asserting that there would be an upset in the bases that have been operating in favor of the north, from the standpoint of increasing inequality, despite all the talk to the contrary.

The announcement from SELA means recognition of the possibility of markets and investments that would escape the recycling imposed by the large financial centers of the West, opening the door for equally mutual needs to establish options for development, free from the traditional hegemony. And it would be no exaggeration to assume that, in such basic production areas as food, the backing from heavy investments would ease the shortages considerably, and even the poverty, that affect the two regions so much.

In various international areas and forums it has been said more than once that the attempts for a new international order require greater compactness on the part of the developing and/or underdeveloped world. The accomplishment of this compactness must have sufficient ease to surmount the political differences. But, to tell the truth, the aspiration would encounter different obstacles.

One way of overcoming at least a substantial part of them may lie in an approach to the economic potential represented by certain Third World nations, creating permanent, sound, attractive foundations, with an influence on the international confrontation one of the main areas of which is the economic area. Would that the announcement by SELA might help to bring about justice.

BRIEFS

HONDURANS TO AID SALVADORANS—Tequcigalpa--In order to help the many refugees who are fleeing from the rural areas of El Salvador across the Honduras border, a committee has been formed in the town of Camasca, in the department of Intibuca. Many Hondurans, in a humanitarian spirit, are helping elderly people and mothers with their children who are fleeing as a result of the panic caused by the fierce fighting raging between the guerrillas and the Salvadoran guards in the places where they were living. The International Red Cross is helping with the relief aid for the Salvadoran refugees, who are victims of the internal convulsion of their country. According to reports from refugees reaching Camasca, the insurgents are being attacked by air and ground artillery, and the civilians are being urged to leave the area as quickly as possible, so that the fight against the insurgents, who are apparently members of an international brigade, can be waged with greater success. The refugee aid committee in Camasca is doing everything it can to help the Salvadoran citizens, most of whom are of peasant origin. [Text] [San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 24 Oct 80 p 25] 7679

ROLE OF POLITICAL FORCES IN DEMOCRATIC SYSTEM SURVEYED

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 19 Oct 80 p 10

[Editorial: "Democracy and Political Parties")

[Text] A little less than a year ago, the military officer who will take over as president of the nation in March 1981 affirmed that "in addition to being a reality in the country's structure, political parties are a reality in Argentine history and democracy." For his part, the interior minister said in a recent statement that "democracy is inconceivable without political parties." Both statements agree on the leading role that political forces must play in the full exercise of their responsibilities and rights in an atmosphere of democratic coexistence in which fruitful efforts towards peace are safeguarded by justice and freedom. They are substantive components of the system, and a country's progress hinges on the fair play, lofty goals and public influence of political parties through their representatives. Given this interrelationship, it is understandable that any defect in the makeup or operations of these vital groups in our system would lead to a sort of pathological process capable of tearing at the nation's social fabric and, hence, of triggering crises the gravity of which tends to be in direct proportion to their root cause.

Perhaps because of its vast scope and searing impact, the dark period from which the country is emerging (not unscathed, of course) made a deeper impact than any other on the minds of our citizens. If the experience was not in vain, then the current interregnum, devoid of electoral antagonisms, will, to our advantage, provide an atmosphere for calm and thoughtful reasoning from which will emerge the decisions to resolve the organizational or functional problems of the groups that are to operate as fundamental factors in the development of a real democracy resting on a solid foundation.

In short, a comprehensive democracy is based on the conduct of its component parts. Therefore, party organizations must practice internal democracy, which presupposes the application of unalterable ethical principles; the proper civic training of their members; a methodical study of the country's problems, using a rigorous approach comparable to that of scientific disciplines; setting clear-cut objectives in keeping with legitimate party ambitions that can be reconciled with national interests; the selection of the individuals best suited to holding representative posts, in internal elections as above-board as those demanded of the public authorities when they summon the people to the polls; promoting a changing of the guard from one generation to the next and, among other things, replacing bossism with leadership.

One could argue that in the final accounting political forces reflect all of the shortcomings of their human components, but it is no less true that their status as leadership organizations obliges them to cultivate virtues and eliminate defects. They would thus be performing an exemplary function as schools of patriotism capable of bridging the gap between politics, defined as the art of governing, and political scheming, which is given to fueling envy and using deceptive demogogical promises to win over large segments of society, which are hopelessly doomed to frustration.

The country's history, marked by the interplay of enlightenment and ignorance, offers clear examples of both courses of conduct, and although it did not always make the correct choice, cumulative experience provides the lessons to illuminate the proper path.

AGUADO ON AGRARIAN, POLITICAL ISSUES

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 26 Oct 80 p 14

[Text] Mendoza--Jorge Aguado, the president of the CRA [Argentine Rural Confederations], fielded questions at a meeting with newsmen that marked the culmination of his visit to this province, a visit that included a speech at the headquarters of the Democratic Party and a get-together with farm sector officials in Tupungato.

He attributed the sector's problems to the increase in financing costs, inflation and taxes. He described as truly worrisome the level of indebtedness among growers, which has even placed their assets in jeopardy. He also pointed out that such a situation obtains specifically in Mendoza, "perhaps more acutely than in other regions, because more growers are in debt here than in the rest of the country." He said that the farm sector has received 16 percent of total credit, 85 percent of it from government banks. "A number of growers took the risk of securing loans in dollars, thus becoming allies of the government so that it would not alter current policy."

Volando's Status

When asked for his opinion on the reprimand that the National Government leveled at the president of the Argentine Agrarian Federation, Mr Humberto Volando, Aguado said: "Mr Volando has taken a number of stands and made decisions that we do not agree with. I am concerned about the support that the admonishment prompted, not about the admonishment itself."

With regard to his visit to Valle de Uco and his meeting there with growers and heads of the Rural Association, he recalled that their work stoppage some time ago had served to focus government attention on this situation. "Some sort of program to further these economies is needed," he contended. In connection with President Videla's imminent visit to Mendoza, he felt it showed that the government realizes that this area has problems and that it is trying to find solutions.

Sharing Forums

He said the following about the invitation extended to him by the Democratic Party, through the Provincial Youth Center, which on Friday will sponsor his lecture on "The Agricultural Sector and the Civic Responsibility of Growers":

"It is the responsibility of all sectors to share forums, even political ones. I have accepted invitations from other parties on other occasions. Such exchanges are very constructive and indicative of how political parties are starting to give consideration to our major problems." When asked what he thought of the people in the business organizations in Valle de Uco, he made this final remark: "I think that when young people want to do something, they do it, and they do it well."

No Offers

Aguado had previously denied that any offer had been made to him to serve in General Viola's future cabinet. Aguado flew back to the Federal Capital last night.

RICARDO ZINN COMMENTS ON NATION'S POLITICAL COURSE

Buenos Aires SOMOS in Spanish 10 Oct 80 pp 44-45

[Interview with writer Ricardo Zinn, by Alberto Oliva at the Hotel Pierre in New York; date not given]

> [Text] In 1976 Ricardo Zinn published "The Second Founding of the Republic," a book in which he X-rayed the period during which the Armed Forces took power. In late September of this year, Zinn traveled to the United States to launch "Four Years After the Second Founding of the Republic," in which he continues his analysis of the Reorganization Process and proposes methods of achieving its objectives. Zinn, who has ties with industrial and service firms, spoke with SOMOS at the Hotel Pierre in New York and spelled out some of the more cogent ideas he sets forth in "Four Years After..."

[Question] Why did you write this book, and how does it differ from the first one, which has a similar title?

[Answer] The first was entitled "The Second Founding of the Republic" and was analytical, focusing on the causes that brought us to the situation that prevailed on 24 March 1976. The most recent book follows the same method and proposes courses of action to achieve the desired goals, but above all its objective is to systematize an intellectual contribution to the Process. This is an area where there are many vacuums...

[Question] Are you suggesting that there is a lack of solid intellectuals in Argentina?

[Answer] It is not that there is a lack of intellectuals. They exist, but they are afraid of losing their status in the future if they come on the scene and voice their viewpoints. This fear, or the utopian notion of saving oneself for later, has meant that practically all intellectual activity in recent years has been the exclusive property of the left. Except for people like Sebastian Soler or Federico Pinedo, the democratic platform had no thinkers or intellectuals to speak out and explain and defend it.

[Question] You say that the Process that began in 1976 is the only true military revolution in recent decades. Why?

[Answer] This is one of the three basic concepts in the book. First, because the Process came on the scene when our civilization and culture were threatened with destruction. Second, because it did so at a crucial and turbulent time when the tide was changing due to the enemy's loss of the ideological and political initiative. Third, because its advent marked a definite break with our most recent past of frustration and decadence.

[Question] Do you mean to say that the Argentine crisis is drawing to an end?

[Answer] Argentina is not in a crisis. It is experiencing the tail end of a decadence that has slowly eaten away at the vital centers of its structure. There is a big difference: a crisis is generally an explosion and can be beneficial; decadence, in contrast, is a succession of losses. This succession began for Argentina in 1916 and is now drawing to a close.

[Question] When you talk of domestic feudalism, what are you specifically referring to?

[Answer] Domestic feudalism is one of the factors in Argentina's decadence. The basic characteristic of a feudal society is its tendency towards immobility; once privileges are gained, social efforts are focused on maintaining them and at preventing others from gaining them. By chance, Argentine history also illustrates the conflict between autarchical liberal forces on the one hand and capitalist forces on the other.

[Question] Can you give some examples of this feudalism?

[Answer] There are three feudal cancers that Argentina was unable to get rid of and that contributed to its decadence: the state cancer (the vast bureaucracy spawned by populism); the economic cancer (with a protectionist state that provided subsidies) and the union cancer (whereby many unions had more economic power than many large companies).

[Question] Why do you think Argentina gradually drifted away from the group of countries with a higher level of development and technological progress?

[Answer] Precisely because of the lack of a geopolitical vision, which is another upshot of feudalism. Let's not forget that at one point Balbin admitted that he was happy that he had never left the country, and an identity can be defined only through relationships. When Peron wanted to put us back on the international scene, he placed us in the Third World. Feudalism was not only a fashion; it altered our roots as a society as well. Economically speaking, it caused our society to organize in units, and politically, on a federal level...

[Question] You say that Argentina has a bad memory. What will happen, then, with Peronism?

[Answer] I approve of political decentralization, and regional leaders will be groomed as time goes by. Peronism could be a threat if the forces concentrate in Buenos Aires and go for broke, but decentralization is the best way to offset Peronism.

[Question] We hear it said that Argentina's leadership class is dozing off, that young people are not interested in politics and that people are forgetting about the past. What do you think?

[Answer] That's changing. It so happens that ideology has been left in the hands of the enemy for a long time. Young people from 25 to 30 are getting interested in politics now, and an example of this is that many universities have started political sciences departments, which are getting more and more enrolment.

[Question] Now that we are nearing the end of the decadence that you spoke of earlier, what impact would an election have now?

[Answer] There is no chance for elections soon. In 1984 there will likely be more participation, and there might be elections in 1987. Holding elections now would mean returning to the revenge tactics of the past, and no one wants that except the populists and Peronists.

[Question] What do you think of the political dialog?

[Answer] I think that it is being done well. But we have to realize that there cannot be as many ideas as inhabitants. There comes a time when a polarization has to take place.

MSGR ARAMBURU EVALUATES CHURCH-STATE RELATIONS, OTHER ISSUES

Santiago ERCILLA in Spanish 29 Oct-4 Nov 80 pp 29-32

[Interview with Cardinal Juan Carlos Aramburu, primate bishop of Argentina, by Jose Miguel Armendariz, in Mendoza; date not given]

[Text] Mendoza--Slightly stooped, with a lean countenance and white hair, wearing his bishop's attire, Msgr Juan Carlos Aramburu (68), former bishop of Tucuman, and current archbishop of Buenos Aires and cardinal primate of Argentina, stopped saying his breviary prayers to receive ERCILLA.

Evangelizing is one of his preeminent passions, among other reasons because, in his view, there is still "an erroneous notion spreading about the mission of the Church." He says: "There are some who consider it just another group." In his opinion, those sectors overlook the fundamental position held by the presence and the action of the Holy Spirit in the Church.

When hearing him speak, one would say that his pastoral spirit even grows when he confirms the effort of some to make the authority of the Church's teachings in matters of faith and morals something relative.

With his feet on the ground ("I have asked my parish to cooperate more with those living in the urban slums"), and with his gaze fixed on God ("by appealing to the Most Blessed Sacrament, peace will be insured between my country and Chile"), the high-ranking prelate conversed with ERCILLA an hour before thousands upon thousands of Catholics brought the National Marian Congress to a close in the Mendoza provincial stadium.

With great affability, and as if no worrisome commitment were awaiting him, Cardinal Aramburu answered all the questions unhesitatingly. There is no doubt that discussing his diocese and the Argentine Church in general brought him great satisfaction.

During the interview, he appeared very exuberant. There was a reason in the surroundings: "All our estimates were exceeded. This Congress served its purpose, aimed at spiritual affirmation of the Christian people, in its entirety."

A Change of 'Spectacle'

[Question] Monsignor, the national press has noted "a Catholic renaissance in Argentina." With regard to this Congress, it has commented that "the Church has proven to be the preference of the youth." To what do you attribute this phenomenon, which appears to be something novel, owing to its massive aspect?

[Answer] In the past, we have had a crisis in coexistence and harmony. And it seems to me that this has caused more maturity, particularly among the youth which is seeking wholesome things. Perhaps they have observed a previous spectacle (also involving the youth), with dedication to mistaken ideals. So now they are reacting to put on another spectacle on behalf of loftier values.

[Question] In this context, what signficance to you attach to the political stability that has been achieved?

[Answer] Well, the reaction from the youth still predates the progress in the direction of order that has been attained. They began to react at the very time of the struggle and the subversion, certainly prompted by that other spectacle which was occurring. Perhaps they are becoming secure now. We are in a position to reflect increasingly better; so they do not want to be mistaken in the ideals that they pursue and for which they are striving.

[Question] What is your opinion of the response from Catholics with regard to the frequency of receiving the sacraments, and attending Mass and Confession?

[Answer] Faith, which is embraced by everyone, is one thing, and the results in life and religious practice, is another. Although we fill the churches on Sundays with the various Masses that are celebrated, the percentage is always low in comparison with the total number of inhabitants who claim to be Catholics.

However (Cardinal Aramburu continues), it is obvious that we are at a positive time. It is common for the young people to go to Confession. Before the International Eucharistic Congress held in 1934, men usually were absent from Church services; now they are not. And sometimes there are more men and young people than women. So, this is common, and no one is surprised at it.

Episcopal Concerns

[Question] Monsignor, if you could make an assessment of the pastoral concerns, what would you say were the issues most often discussed by the Argentine bishops?

[Answer] For several years, we have been working on the priority of marriage and the family, which are in such a state of upheaval the world over. We have attempted to support this and, fortunately, work is being done in the same direction, generally, externally and socially. Then we have another concern, namely, the youth. We are in agreement with the tasks assigned to us by the Holy Father in Puebla: the family, youth and vocations. In the latter respect, we have improved considerably after a period of crisis. Now I have my Villa Devoto seminary filled with young men who want to devote themselves to the Lord in the priestly life.

[Question] How often do the Argentine bishops, or the Episcopate as such, speak out on current matters that are more closely related to the political realm?

[Answer] In this regard, what is being done is commenting on concrete events in a manner that is not current nor political, but rather meant to enlighten them with the Gospel doctrine. The Episcopate never comments on the technical or economic leadership. We are careful not to participate in activities of political sectors, groups or parties. We are very distinguished in this regard.

[Question] What were your reasons for referring, in a recent statement, to the attitude that Catholics should have upon acting within the civil society?

[Answer] Perhaps for the purpose of opening the dialog, the government asked the Church for its views; but not in the sense of expressing opinions on the technical aspects of the dialog.

[Question] Monsignor, what are the usual reactions when the bishops make a declaration?

[Answer] The voice of the Episcopate is followed and expected here. Since it is known that the Episcopate is not committed to any group, but is, rather, seeking the general welfare of the human being, it is very seldom that a controversy occurs.

[Question] Nevertheless, I have recently heard that they are often criticized for remaining aloof from the political leadership.

[Answer] Of course. Some yearn for that support, and demand it, because they know that the Episcopate has an authoritative voice, and that it is heard and publicized by the news media. But, in fact, the Argentine bishops have never meddled in matters that are sectorial or partisan.

Church-Government

[Question] How would you describe the relations between the Church and the government?

[Answer] Very good, and cordial. The government respects the autonomy of the Church, and its spiritual realm enlightening Argentine life. And we respect its autonomy; all of which represents action originating from the civil authority on the population. There, at times, certain things have occurred which might appear to be a certain amount of interference...

[Question] Interference by the Church?

[Answer] Of course, related to the view that we need not comment on the technical aspects of the economic or social temporal leadership of the country. But that has disappeared promptly.

Cardinal Aramburu explains that since the Gospel is truth, and the truth is usually uncomfortable, "occasionally contrary reactions occur." But he stresses that the teachings of the bishops are well received. He remarks: "Even the sector of authority seeks the Church's word. They realize that, when they are taking the proper direction, they will find support."

In this connection, the monsignor underscores the moral civic education that is given in the state schools. "Without proposing it as a matter of the Catholic faith, there is instruction in ethical principles which are influenced by the Gospel."

And perhaps because it has become another constant factor (this time, an overwhelming one), the monsignor is impressed even more by the massive outcry that is occurring at present concerning the desired peace between Chile and Argentina. In fact, it was he (4 months ago in Buenos Aires) who celebrated Mass and led the long Corpus Christi procession to pray for the successful conclusion of the papal mediation. Since something similar had been organized in Chile that day as well, Cardinal Aramburu cited the significance of the event to the thousands of faithful gathered on the Square of the Two Congresses.

He told them: "Thus, there has been held the unique spectacle of a mutual massive position of two Catholic peoples, converting the extreme southern part of America into an immense sanctuary, like two sacred vessels demarcated by the Andean cordillera, wherein the prayers of millions of human beings rise to heaven, seeking peace in a human, fraternal and Christian solution."

In his opinion, "The great influence for bringing about human action of real value lies in the humility of prayer addressed to God."

The monsignor reacted to the recent shows of religious spirit that the Argentines gave in Mendoza:

"We are making a very good examination for the forthcoming visit of the Holy Father to our country."

He knows that this will materialize if the mediation achieves a result accepted by both sides; and that this objective depends largely on the continuation by the Church in both countries of its influence on the peaceful desires of the respective peoples.

The interview with the cardinal primate of Argentina was reaching an end when ERCILLA (going beyond the bilateral issue) asked him about the relations of the Argentine bishops among themselves. His response was categorical:

"Unlike what certain news media claim, depicting differences and opposition to cause an impact, I would like to tell you that there is no opposition, resistance or anything between us. The Argentine Episcopate has never been divided. We have always had a great priestly brotherhood.

[Question] Doesn't it often happen that certain bishops disagreee after a collective statement?

[Answer] No, no, no. At times there have been differences which are not substantial. Once, when commenting on a text for catechesis, someone described it as leftist (how should I know?), but the Episcopate per se made its statement and the matter ended. The monsignor concluded by saying: "I might add that, naturally, we have absolute autonomy in all expressions of opinion; and there have even been different views of the Church's action. But insofar as teachings are concerned, we have always been in agreement."

JOURNAL ANALYZES CHURCH ATTITUDES, COMPOSITION

Buenos Aires ULTIMA CLAVE in Spanish No 500, 14 Oct 80 pp 3-5

[Text] Situation in Argentina

The purpose of everything said thus far has been to embark, albeit briefly, on a consideration of the status of the Catholic Church in our country. But its positions cannot be understood if we separate them from the Latin American context. Let us begin by acknowledging that, in our country, the virus of "liberation theology" was only caught, with any intensity, by a small group of priests (no more than 100), who then became combined in the so-called Movement of Third World Priests. The group's subjugation to extreme leftist elements, radicalized Peronists or actual Montonero elements is a sufficiently well known fact to make further details unnecessary. One need only mention that, in the incident considered to have unleashed the homicidal violence in the country (the kidnapping, torture and assassination of General Aramburu), Father Carbone was implicated and was actually convicted by the courts; thus giving a complete idea of the group's activity. Today, that movement is greatly reduced: Some have given up its principles, others have left the priesthood and quite a few, with varying fates, have directly joined the Montonero Peronist movement.

But the conduct upheld by the Argentine Episcopate was and is different. First, during the period from 1973 to 1976 it assumed a cautious attitude that was reflected more in what it failed to do than in what it did: For example, we recall an exemplary condemnation of Father Carbone, who is still head of a parish today. We do not find in our records a direct criticism of the Peronist government when it intervened in the national universities and turned them over on a silver platter to Marxism, to indoctrinate the youth. It remained silent when freedom of education received a fatal wound in 1974, with the passage of the law for immobility of the professors and teachers in private schools. And, in particular, it did not explicitly repudiate the orgy of violence unleashed by populism in its various forms.

Therefore, one could not be surprised that, since March 1976, the Argentine Episcopate continued to keep that silent attitude, this time perhaps as an expression of a guilt complex. This did not prevent it, in its annual meetings, from leaking criticism of the economic or social policy of the process, in a respectful tone that we must cite as a positive fact.

What are the reasons for the current behavior of the Episcopate? In our opinion, there are three:

a. In the first place, because, starting in 1978 with the election of John Paul II as head of the Church, the general atmosphere in the Catholic world changed fundamentally. There has been a certain return to a Church line, in contrast to the previous increasing desacralization. To be sure, the Pontiff's position does not imply (and his sermons and addresses on his tours of the American continent or in the so-called Third World are proof of this) a dissociation from the social or economic problems of our time. But now it is being handled on a more spiritual level, more entrenched in the Gospel message.

b. Added to the foregoing is the fact that, after the dangers experienced by the Argentine society between 1973 and 1976, the hierarchy assumed a more realistic attitude toward the progress of extremist ideas. This was even demonstrated during the Bishops Conference in Puebla (Mexico, in 1979), at which our country's delegation assumed a conciliatory position, and was a factor for balance in the deliberations.

c. And, finally, it should be noted that, when one studies the present composition of the Argentine Catholic hierarchy, one notes a large majority of prelates with a moderate outlook, training and activity, in contrast to the "progressive" movement (with its various nuances). This is evident in the recent documents and in the public image of the Church in the country today.

An Overall Tally

So that our readers may obtain an approximate idea of the ideological position of the members of the Episcopate, it seemed fitting to us to make a division into large groups, wherein we include those dignataries with more or less similar ideas. We are not unaware that this is always difficult, and that we might even make some mistakes or omissions. But we think that this is an approximate X-ray, an overall tally, of the views whereby the Argentine Catholic hierarchy is divided. Let us observe:

Here we include those who assume moderate positions, but also those with more conservative and, in some instances, nationalist ideas: Heraldo Marotti (auxiliary bishop of Rosario), Emilio Bianchi de Carcano (auxiliary bishop of Azul), Guillermo Bolatti (archbishop of Rosario), Victorio Bonamin (military provincial), Pedro Boxler (bishop of Gualeguaychu), Miguel Augusto Cardenas (auxiliary bishop of Buenos Aires), Desiderio Collino (bishop of Limas de Zamora), Blas V. Conrero (archbishop of Tucuman), Alcides Casaretto (bishop of Rafaela), Adolfo Gerstner (bishop of Concordia), Jorge Gottau (bishop of Anatuya), Manuel Guirau (bishop of (Oran), Agustin Herrera (bishop of San Francisco), Justo O. Laguna (bishop of Moron), Juan R. Laise (bishop of San Luis), Jorge Lopez (archbishop of Corrientes), Manuel Menendez (bishop of San Martin), Jose Maria Montes (auxiliary bishop of La Plata), Enrique Pechuan Marin (bishop of Cruz del Eje), Carlos Mariano Perez (archbishop of Salta), Raul F. Primatesta (cardinal, Cordoba), Antonio Quarracino (bishop of Avellaneda), Adolfo Servando Tortolo (archbishop of Parana).

We list here those who have more emphatically expressed democratic convictions, while at the same time maintaining a line of pastoral action with a renewing, but orthodox orientation: Antonio Maria Aguirre (bishop of San Isidro), Juan Carlos Aramburu (cardinal archbishop of Buenos Aires), Rodolfo Bufano (bishop of Chascomus), Arnaldo Canale (auxiliary bishop of Buenos Aires), Carlos Cremata (bishop of Santo Tome), Octavio N. Derisi (auxiliary bishop of La Plata), Alfredo Esposito (bishop of Zarate), Jose M. Lorenzo (vicar of Devoto), Jose M. Medina (bishop of Jujuy), Gabino Romero (auxiliary bishop of Lomas de Zamora), Estanislao E. Karlic (auxiliary bishop of Cordoba), Domingo Castagna (auxiliary bishop of Buenos Aires).

These are the bishops who have assumed more radicalized or populist positions in the social and economic area. In some instances, they have assumed overtly political stances, at all times associated with positions which in ecclesiastical terminology are known as "progressive": Miguel Antel Aleman (bishop of Rio Gallegos), Alberto P. Devoto (bishop of Goya), Romulo Garcia (bishop of Mar del Plata), Carmelo J. Giaquinta (auxiliary bishop of Viedma), Miguel E. Hesayne (bishop of Viedma), Juan J. Iriarte (bishop of Reconquista), Manuel Marengo (bishop of Azul), Jorge Novak (bishop of Quilmes), Jaime de Nevares (bishop of Nuequen), Vicente Zazpe (archbishop of Santa Fe).

We repeat, there are undoubtedly some omissions on the preceding lists. The most obvious is perhaps that of Msgr Antonio J. Plaza but, owing to his contradictory positions, it was difficult for us to categorize him. We leave the task to the reader...if he can.

PAZ ZAMORA WEIGHS FOREIGN INTEREST IN DEVELOPMENTS

LD061631 Brussels LE SOIR in French 5 Nov 80 p 2

[Interview with Jaime Paz Zamora, Bolivian Opposition Leader, by "J.-P. M.": "Democracies Must No Longer Be Left Defenseless"--date and place of interview not specified]

[Excerpts] "Bolivia represents a demarcation line between democracies and dictatorships in South America," Jaime Paz Zamora speaks deliberately. "It is a dividing line between geopolitical interests which look toward the Pacific and those which center on the Rio de la Plata Basin." This former Louvain University student knows what he is talking about when democracy and strategy in South America are discussed. Jaime Paz Zamora, who, together with Hernan Siles Suazo, founded the People's Democratic Union [UDP]--a moderate left coalition--in 1978, has striven for many years to democratize the Bolivian regime, and each time the UDP has won a presidential election--in 1979 and 1980--he has had to contend with a military coup.

The intervention of troops led by General Meza Garcia in July 1980 was both an attack against Bolivian democracy and an act of aggression against the democratization process in Latin America. "Argentina helped to organize the coup," Paz Zamora told us. "Argentine experts advised the intelligence services and officered repressive bodies to rationalize them and make them more scientific."

The EEC countries and the United States have resolutely shown their disapproval of the coup in Bolivia. "American diplomacy in Latin America is Janus-like," Jaime Paz Zamora explained. "It is antidemocratic in El Salvador and democratic in South America. As for the USSR, it adopted a positive attitude at first but in the end recognized the military regime 6 weeks after the coup. The Soviets have economic interests in Bolivia, especially in the mining sector. Their relations with the Argentine regime, which organized the coup, are very intensive and they have been trying to take advantage of the cooling of relations between the United States and dictatorships in the southern part of the continent. Nor should we overlook the fact that the USSR has long-range plans for Latin America. We understand this attitude and we do not want to use it as a motive for anti-Sovietism, but we do not accept it," Jaime Paz Zamora concluded.

BRIEFS

DEATH SENTENCE LAW--La Paz, 12 Nov (LATIN)--The Bolivian Catholic Church has pointed out to the military government the need to jointly analyze the scope of an impending state security law which will extend the death sentence to drug traffickers and extremists. Religious sources have confirmed that the church initiative was conveyed to Foreign Minister Gen Javier Cerruto Calderon by Cardinal Jose Clemente Maurer. Cardinal Maurer told the press last night that he had voiced "the church's concern over the state security law project" and explained that the episcopal hierarchy feels a dialogue is necessary before the law is promulgated. Pointing out the current "normal state" of relations between the church and military government established on 17 July, Cardinal Maurer added that "we must analyze it (the project) to avoid misinterpretations." [By Rene Villegas] [Excerpt] [PY140100 Buenos Aires LATIN in Spanish 1733 GMT 12 Nov 80]

TIN SALES INCREASE--La Paz, 13 Nov (AFP)--Authorities of the mines and metallurgy ministry disclosed here today that unlimited U.S. tin sales on the international market will cause incalculable damage to the Bolivian economy. The United States has decided to increase its tin sales since its decision to sell 500 tons of its tin reserves every 2 weeks failed. The authorities pointed out that Bolivia will suffer the consequences should the price of tin on the international market drop since this is its main export product. An editorial in the Catholic daily PRESENCIA points out that tin offered for sale by the United States was bought from Bolivia, who, as an ally, sold it at a low price during World War II. It then states that this fact adds to the increasing cost of tin production in our country, to inflation and to the high cost of machinery and technology within the framework of the Bolivian economic crisis which is reflected in a balance of payments that shows an increasing deficit. INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION UP 8.44 PERCENT IN 9 MONTHS

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 12 Nov 80 p 26

[Text] Rio de Janeiro--Brazilian industrial production from January through September showed a significant revival, with the increase reaching 8.44 percent and confirming the survey made by O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in October which diagnosed an acceleration of industrial activity in the major sectors surveyed.

According to data reported here yesterday by the IBGE [Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics] Foundation, in September, for the first time this year, the increase for the latest 12 month period reached 7.64 percent. With an increase of more than 1 percent over August, there were clear signs of a distinct acceleration in industrial activity. In September, growth of the minerals extraction industry (16.96 percent) and of converting industries (8.19 percent) influenced the 8.44 percent rise in industrial production.

The IBGE Foundation also revealed that the sectors contributing the most to the favorable performance during the January-through-September period were plastic materials, minerals extraction, machinery, food products, rubber, pharmaceuticals and metallurgy. Meanwhile, growth from August to September was reported in all industrial sectors but two: minerals extraction (crude petroleum) and paper and paperboard.

Employment and Energy

The indicator of personnel employed in production also rose in the January-through-August period, with an increase of 3.44 percent over the same period last year. The cumulative increase of employment in the last 12 months was 2.9 percent.

Electric power consumption, in turn, declined slightly through August, with the rate of increase falling to 9.16 percent after having risen as much as 13.43 percent in other periods. The indicator of electrical energy consumed also showed a lower cumulative rate of increase during the last 12 months, with a rate of 9.66 percent, according to the IBGE.

SPECULATIONS BEGIN ON SUCCESSOR TO FIGUEIREDO

Possible Candidates Mentioned

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 26 Oct 80 p 5

[Article by Carlos Chagas: "The Palace Believes It Is Too Early, However Speculation on Succession Has Begun"]

[Text] For the government, or rather for the palace group which handles the controls of government, it is still too early to raise the question, or much less coordinate it, of the successor to General Figueiredo in terms of names or candidacies. The principal presidential aides maintain that the process of succession, which will take place in 1984, will be by political parties. This would mean that Joao Figueiredo will have been the last of the generals made president by the imposition of the force of the revolutionary movement (read because of the desires of the military themselves). This does not mean that another general or brigadier or an admiral (do they not allow colonels?) could not be appointed by means of the political party mechanisms or channels, provided they are presented, processed and defined within the framework of the political parties, a theory which has not yet been confirmed in recent practice.

That is what official forces say officially and publicly because behind the scenes or confidentially, they go a little further. The government does not pay any attention to the subject of succession, but nothing prevents the press or the political sectors from speculating on the subject on their own. Those sources, with reserve and informally, list some obvious names within their own forces to be entered at the proper time. They even go as far as to assert that inevitably one of them will become the successor: Aureliano Chaves, Delfim Netto, Octavio Medeiros, Costa Cavalcanti, Mario Andreazza, Jarbas Passarinho, Antonio Carlos Magalhaes, Ibrahim Abi-Ackel, Paulo Maluf, Ney Braga, Delio Jardim de Mattos, and a list of perhaps only vice presidential timber: Marco Antonio Maciel and Virgilio Tavora.

What is important, presuming that the palace group will still be the decisive force in the process because it will be led by Gen Joao Figueiredo, is to learn which of those names really enjoys its support and will conclude by being "offered" to the PDS [Social Democratic Party] National Convention, which if it maintains a majority in 1982, will formally appoint the new president 2 years later. Therefore, it is worthwhile examining the possible presidential candidates and their chances one by one:

Aureliano Chaves, the present vice president, has administrative ability, political skill and even a certain desire to get there since "he does not exclude himself from the preliminary conversations when the time comes." He would be in a position to wangle party support but his problems began when it was learned that among themselves the group cannot stand him, believing him to be "out of line" or too independent.

Delfim Netto will be (or would be) an unbeatable candidate if he could curb inflation to reasonable levels, abolish the climate of crisis and reestablish credibility in public opinion...

Octavio Medeiros should really not be on the list of political party presidential hopefuls and perhaps here lies the real key to everything. As chief of the SNI [National Intelligence Service] and an active duty general officer, representing the so-called system more than any other, he would only be selected as the PDS candidate if his name were to be "suggested" to the PDS with a thousand and one arguments about extremist dangers, the need for the dynamic revolution to continue, and so forth. Because of all that he is a strong possibility, even if up to this time he has not shown the slightest public desire to become a candidate.

Costa Cavalcanti runs on the outside, strategically protected by technial functions (the presidency of the Itaipu Binational and ELETROBRAS [Brazilian Electric Companies]), but as a former federal deputy and former colonel in the army, he would have the attributes for getting there. A personal friend of General Figueiredo, with contacts with the main leaders of the PDS and strong bonds with the military, up to now he has been a rising star.

Mario Andreazza would certainly be a preferential nomination by the president, less because of the close bonds between them than because of the image he projects of a man who does things on the social level, and despite difficulties, manages to attain some of the goals he set for himself in the Ministry of Interior. He may not please the group or part of it, but he could counterbalance that with the excellent relations he maintains with Congress. After all, to the legislators of the government, he is one of the few ministers they can accompany on junkets to their regions of origin and to the inauguration of projects without the danger of frictions.

Jarbas Passarinho up to a short time ago was not included in the list of possible candidates, however, suddenly, the Palace of Planalto perceives a sort of secret of Polichinello in him. He is one of the rare political revelations of the revolution, perhaps the only one of its legislators who talks equal to equal with the opposition and he has enough imagination and rhetorical power to confront the adversary forces. Argumentative, with a short fuse, he has military origins like Costa Cavalcanti, although he has spent 16 years in politics.

Antonio Carlos Magalhaes, governor of Bahia, does not hide his desires and presents himself as another essentially political possibility. He is from the northeast. His power to rally forces around him and his leadership is undeniable. It has been a long time since the opposition has had a turn in his state, even in direct elections. He has a decisive influence in the PDS and he has easy access to the Palace of Planalto.

Ibrahim Abi-Ackel may have even felt some surprising encouragement to succeed Petronio Portella in everything, that is, in the Ministry of Justice, which he now occupies, and as the unbeatable political party candidate which the deceased minister was. He exposes himself as the political coordinator of the government, but in turn he has the approval of the group which even considers him "The great political personality of the time." A week ago he was responsible for that new phase in speculations about the successor when he said in Sao Paulo that he would support Paulo Maluf if the Sao Paulo governor were to be nominated as candidate of the PDS. More important than knowing whether he was or was not trying to "burn" the competition, is to ask whether Maluf will not be forced one of these days to declare that he also will support Ibrahim if the party selects him...

Paulo Maluf, of all of them, will be the one who will be engaged in a campaign, traveling, coordinating and seeking to gather a following within the present Congress and the party. Despite the fact that logic indicates that only by a miracle could he arrive at the third floor of the Palace of Planalto, it is well not to forget that the same thing was said when in a daring coup he challenged Olympus and became the candidate to the governorship of Sao Paulo the same way.

Ney Braga, after the "launching" of Maluf, lost his timidity and admitted that he may also run. The recent operation to which he was subjected did not cool his ardor and like Cavalcanti and Passarinho he was a military man, who long ago became a politician.

Delio Jardim de Mattos describes himself as the general officer most integrated into the process of the political opening of President Joao Figueiredo. He has close ties within party circles. If a "transitory" successor were to be necessary, chosen or adopted by the political class, there would be none better than he despite the fact that he came out fighting 2 months ago when an unnamed state legislator dared to publicly mention him as a candidate.

All those mentioned, still pursuant to the opinion of the palace group, have the qualifications for reaching the Presidency of the Republic. They could also be suitable for the vice presidency. It is in this aspect that the names of Virgilio Tavora, the governor of Ceara, and Marco Maciel, governor of Pernambuco, are mentioned, both in the hypothesis of being candidates on the slate of whoever is nominated for the presidency.

Everything is done up to here under the supposition that if it is not the Revolution by force, at least the PDS, as an instrument of the Revolution, will run the show. This means that it will maintain a majority in the electoral college destined to elect the new president. In case official forecasts of victory in the legislative elections of 1982 are upset by the popular will, however, what has been said will be replaced by what has not been said, or better yet, what has been speculated will be replaced by what has not been speculated. With the supremacy of opposition parties in the future Congress, anything could happen from the election of Ulysses Guimaraes, Paulo Brossard, Tancredo Neves or another from the opposition, or even a regression lead by some military chief or group ready to put an end to the game and close the opening, placing himself or itself in power more or less like Castello Branco, Costa e Silva, Garrastazu Medici, Ernesto Geisel and...and Joao Figueiredo also.

Succession Speculation Continues

Rio de Janeiro MANCHETE in Portuguese 8 Nov 80 pp 132, 133

[Article by Murilo Melo Filho: "Who Comes After Figueiredo?"]

[Text] There are still four and one-half years to go until the end of the Figueiredo government, which up to now has completed only a fourth of its term. The debate on succession was opened and put into the streets precisely by the political minister of the government itself. At a PDS rally in Sao Paulo, asked by a reporter what he thought about Governor Paulo Maluf as a candidate to succeed President Figueiredo, Minister Abi-Ackel answered: "If he were to be the candidate approved at the PDS Convention, he would have my vote." Analyzing it coldly, the reply by the minister of justice could not have been different. He conditioned his vote to the prior approval of the party convention. There was no lack of malicious comments saying that such an advanced announcement of a candidacy was destined precisely to burn the candidacy of the Sao Paulo governor. The truth is that the statement by Minister Abi-Ackel unleashed the process of succession, with the subsequent rise in natural speculations around several other candidates. Who are they?

Delfim Netto--The candidacy of the minister of planning is going to depend a great deal on his actions as the all-powerful official in charge of the finances and economy of the country. If he manages to curb inflation to reasonable levels and balances the trade balance in the next 3 years, he will have obtained a very great margin of services and votes needed for his presidential candidacy. However, it is a matter of two goals whose attainment is becoming more and more difficult and Minister Delfim Netto himself is the first to acknowledge those difficulties, as imported inflation, stimulated by increases in the prices of petroleum, is aggravated by the existence of inflationary factors caused by the domestic economy. Having been responsible for the Brazilian boom of the Medici administration, Delfim Netto allowed himself to remain as Brazilian ambassador to France during almost the entire Geisel Administration, from which he returned to assume the terrible tasks of guiding the Brazilian economy in the difficult days it is now undergoing. As the bonds of his friendship and closeness to General Golbery intensify, the minister of planning will see the possibilities of being the dauphin, heir to the Figueiredo Administration, grow.

Aureliano Chaves--As the occasional substitute for the president of the republic in all his absences from government, the vice president naturally becomes a potential candidate for his definitive succession. As a former federal deputy and former governor of Minas, the present vice president has had ups and downs in his standings. He was somewhat down when he declared that trying to hide the victory of the MDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement] in the last elections was like trying to shut out the sun with a seive, but he recovered when he was nominated by the president of the republic to preside over the National Energy Commission, thus becoming a sort of energy czar for the country. At the head of that commission, and faced with very difficult problems, he has been acting with sensible balance. On his performance in that job will depend the strength of his presidential candidacy. His base of support, naturally, will be that of the old UDN [National Democratic Union] of Minas Gerais led now by Governor Francelino Pereira.

Costa Cavalcanti--His selection to head ELETROBRAS, replacing Mauricio Schulmann, and his remaining as chief of the Itaipu Binational, naturally caused his name to be among the top names in the speculations on the successor to President Figueiredo. A mixture of civilian and military (reserve), Costa Cavalcanti will have his great electoral banner in the Itaipu Dam, the largest hydroelectric plant in the world, which he is building and which will be completed precisely in 1984 when the presidential succession will be an important item. By then his skill as an administrator will have been established, skill which has already been put to an important test when he passed through the Ministry of Mines and Energy. As a personal friend and classmate of President Figueiredo, he had already refused an invitation by the president to become part of his cabinet when it was organized. He preferred to remain in charge of Itaipu, a job he has in addition to having the responsibility for heading the entire sector of electric power production in the country.

Paulo Maluf--The launching by Minister Ibrahim Abi-Ackel only came to confirm the speculations which have already been made for several months: the aggressiveness and drive of the Sao Paulo governor cannot hide or disguise his presidential ambitions.

Having won at the Sao Paulo ARENA [National Renewal Alliance] Convention, thanks to a dogged work of enticement of delegates, after becoming governor of Sao Paulo he began a diligent effort to obtain the support of the greatest number of legislators of the present legislature, who although they are not necessarily members of the Electoral College responsible for electing the future president, since many of them will not be reelected in 1982, they represent a respectable amount of support for the desires of Paulo Maluf anyway. His trips into the states of the north and northeast are also serving as electoral trips. With absolute control over the PDS of Sao Paulo, he will greatly need to elect a candidate he can trust completely as governor of the state to succeed him if he wishes to keep his presidential ambitions alive, ambitions which will be strengthened if he manages to find petroleum in Sao Paulo.

Octavio Aguiar de Medeiros--He will become a general of the army precisely in 1984 at the time of the presidential succession. His present job as chief of the SNI provides him with the credentials as a successor to the president of the republic, since it will be recalled that two chief executives, Generals Medici and Figueiredo, came precisely from the National Intelligence Service. Discreet and calm, he has remained close to power, with great power and influence as one of the household ministers who has daily meetings with President Figueiredo and Minister Golbery do Couto e Silva. He does not even allow talk about his candidacy, although his name today figures on all presidential lists. His military status, which in other times would be a favorable aspect for his nomination, became a negative influence as of the time that the government appeared to be engaged in carrying out a political opening to its final consequences, with the transfer of power to a civilian.

Antonio Carlos Magalhaes--The name of the governor of Bahia appears with the credential of being the leader of the greatest number of federal deputies in the PDS. He needs to confirm and consolidate that position in the legislative elections of 1982 so as to be able to nourish his presidential ambitions in the elections of 1984. He also needs to elect a loyal successor to the government of Bahia and he will be able to increase his chances in the degree that he can come up with a name and a program for the northeast. His leadership over the Bahia PDS was consolidated even more by the appointments to the new state executive committee of the party.

Ibrahim Abi-Ackel--Up until a few months ago he was an unknown legislator from the old Minas Gerais PDS, who later joined ARENA and then the PDS. The death of Minister Petronio Portella, however, opened up a great future for him on a national level. Raised to the Ministry of Justice by appointment of General Golbery, he has performed well there as the main political spokesman for the government. A slate consisting of himself for vice president and Governor Paulo Maluf for president in the Minas Gerais-Sao Paulo axis could grip the attention of the PDS Convention.

Marco Antonio Maciel--The skill with which he has been conducting himself as chief of the government of Pernambuco and his free access to the Palace of Planalto give him the credentials for being vice president on the PDS slate. He has even managed to disarm the radicalism of certain opposition areas such as that led by dom Helder, for example. His candidacy could also emerge as a demand of the government legislators from the northeast.

Ney Braga--As a good orator and popular candidate, the present governor of Parana may bring much sympathy and prestige to the PDS slate. His candidacy, which has had many nominations in the past, is once more being considered, particularly for nomination as a good candidate for vice president of the republic. His great test will be in the direct elections to succeed himself in 1982, when his present government in Parana will be subjected to an important test at the polls.

Delio Jardim de Matos--The present minister of air has been characterizing his activities by a liberal and democratizing tone. His last order of the day on the day dedicated to aviators was a hymn to the political opening and to the support the Brazilian Air Force should give to the policy of President Figueiredo. Pronouncing himself against all radicalisms of the left or right, he naturally attracted to himself the votes and solidarity of a great strata of Brazilian society.

Aureliano Chaves — vice-presidente da República.

Ney Braga — governador do Paraná.

Délio Jardim de Mattos — ministro da Aeronáutica.

Octavio Aguiar de Medeiros — ministro-chefe do SNI.

Delfim Netto — ministro do Planejamento.

Antônio Carlos Magalhães — governador da Bahia.

Paulo Maluf — governador de São Paulo

Marco Maciel — governador de Pernambuco.

Ibrahim Abi-Ackel — ministro da Justiça.

Costa Cavalcanti — presidente da Eletrobra

JUSTICE MINISTER DEEMS MALUF EXCELLENT CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENCY

Comments by Abi-Ackel

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 19 Oct 80 p 12

[Text] Sao Paulo--In an interview held after a heavily applauded speech in which he voiced great praise for the Sao Paulo governor, the minister of justice, Mr Ibrahim Abi-Ackel, stated that he considered Mr Paulo Maluf "an excellent candidate for the presidency of the republic," and gave assurance that, "if he were the PDS [Social Democratic Party] candidate, he would have my vote and my effort."

The minister delivered the most heavily applauded address at the PDS' major festive event at the Convention Palace in Anhembi Park. After he finished speaking, with the applause of nearly 3,000 people standing up, Mr Ibrahim Abi-Ackel raised the governor's arm, and the ovation was transferred to him. At the end of the function, the Rhythm Title-Holders ensemble, accompanied by a school band, played the PDS anthem, while the minister of justice gave out autographs.

Praise

In his speech, the minister did not spare praise for the governor of Sao Paulo. At one juncture, he remarked:

"In Sao Paulo, it could only be someone like Paulo, who had the force of the state's expansion and the courage of Saint Paul,his patron saint, that could back President Figueiredo's plan for openness in the land of Piratininga. Governor Paulo Maluf: the Saint Paul who had the necessary courage to write letters to the Corinthians and to win over the infidels."

He also attempted to defend Mr Paulo Maluf, commenting at one point: "It does not matter that he has suffered taunts and abuse, or that he may possibly have been subjected to overt manifestations of displeasure. This only means that, once again in the history of mankind, a gun was never loaded to kill a bird, and a thunderbolt never fell from the heavens to strike a head of lettuce. The great gunfire is aimed at the big fortresses, and the great thunderbolts seek out the big blooming, shaded trees atop large trunks which provide shade, fragrance, light, fertility and beauty to the landscape that they adorn."

Figueiredo

He also defended President Figueiredo, "who is attempting to construct a regime in the country which will say no to the leftist ideology, no to the right wing ideology and no to the ideology upheld by those who read a little and yet suffer from a great mental indigestion, and confuse the two things without knowing exactly what they seek."

He called upon the members of the PDS to find out, "in the national program, which is so much the target of criticism from our opponents, who stood up to assume responsibility for leading the people during that intensive phase of participation in the government; who has taken responsibility, assumed the burden and guaranteed Brazilian democracy, if not President Figueiredo. If we want it to be as good as possible, it is incomprehensible that there should be a desire to weaken the president, who is the anchor supporting our democracy."

He added: "We want the legal system superimposed on everyone. We want respect for judicial decisions which we should never dispute in the final appeal, because a judicial decision that has gone through the judicial process is not disputed; it is complied with."

He commented on the matter of the prerogatives of Congress: "We want a democracy in which the congressman is endowed with the necessary immunity to defend his constituents and voters, which will not deter him from using the platform with the necessary courage that sets him apart from the votes to be delivered, and that backs him in the positions to be assumed, but that does not serve as impunity for attacking the honor of citizens with whom he may perhaps disagree."

PDS

In another part of his speech, the minister of justice said:"PSD does not want to be a soothing party, accustomed to accepting the social situation that it inherited, bowing to the difficulties of the future, or a party willing only to attract voters, without giving anything to the voters that it attracts."

PDS "wants to be a party of the future, which will make a better distribution of the income from the common holdings of the Brazilian nation, so that the poor will not suffer so much from their poverty, and the rich will not squander so much of their excessive, despicable wealth."

Mr Ibrahim Abi-Ackel expressed confidence, and said that the party would attain its goals, "because in Sao Paulo the PDS banner is in the hands of this mixture of industrialist, pioneer, farmer, political leader, orator, and unassuming, sincere and valiant man of the people, like the hero of old, Saint Paul: namely, Paulo Maluf."

Interview

After the festivities, the minister held a brief interview:

[Question] Upon raising the arm of Governor Maluf, after praising him, didn't you think that you were consolidating his candidacy for the presidency of the republic?

[Answer] What I intended, in raising the governor's arm, was to transfer to him the applause that I received for my statement.

[Question] Do you think that he is a good candidate?

[Answer] If Maluf were the PDS' candidate for the presidency of the republic, he would have my vote and my effort. He is an excellent candidate.

[Question] With your speech, did you launch his candidacy to succeed President Figueirado?

[Answer] The malicious conclusion is yours, because the presidential succession is not yet being contemplated in the government. You are trying to set a trap for me, but you must not forget that I have been an observer for 30 years and, as a lawyer, I also know how to ask questions.

[Question] What is the Planalto Palace's view of Governor Paulo Maluf's activity?

[Answer] Governor Paulo Maluf's strength and power of unification are being viewed very favorably in Brasilia.

[Question] Will the government receive leaders of PCB [Brazilian Communist Party] to hold dialog and discuss the party's legalization?

[Answer] No, because PCB is a party that cannot have a legal existence, according to the text of the Constitution. We have nothing to discuss with its leaders in that regard.

[Question] In the past, the DOI [Department of Domestic Operations]-CODI [Internal Defense Operations Center] achieved success in combating terrorist acts. Why has not the DOI been called upon to help investigate the latest terrorist attacks?

[Answer] The Federal Police are in charge of the investigations, and only those responsible for the probe can cite the need for other arrangements.

Maluf Refuses to Comment

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 22 Oct 80 p 4

[Excerpt] Brasilia--Contrary to his habit of granting an interview on political matters when he visits Brasilia, yesterday Governor Paulo Maluf declined to comment on the mention of his possible candidacy for the presidency of the republic made last weekend by the minister of justice, Ibrahim Abi-Ackel.

In all his contacts with the press, Maluf evaded questions about politics, and particularly his alleged candidacy. Every time the conversation turned to this, the governor quickly took leave of the reporters, or said that there were "more important things to be discussed."

At Planalto

Upon arriving at Planalto Palace in the morning, where he spent over 3 hours with the minister-chief of the military household, Maluf had one of his advisers announce that his stay in Brasilia was "solely and exclusively to deal with administrative matters."

After his meeting with the minister of education, Eduardo Portella, he was asked whether the launching of his candidacy was not premature; whereupon the governor withdrew and, without answering, entered the private elevator.

On another occasion, he said that what was more important than his candidacy was the construction of the airport at Cumbica, in Sao Paulo, for which he had signed agreements with the minister of air, Delio Jardim de Mattos. The minister, for his part, said that there had been no discussion of politics during the luncheon with the governor.

GENERAL GOLBERY'S THOUGHTS ON NATIONAL SITUATION

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 19, 26 Oct 80

[19 Oct 80, p 152]

[Text] General Golbery do Couto e Silva, chief of the Civilian Household of the Presidency of the Republic, gave a "classified" lecture at the War College on 1 July, in which he defended the thesis that Brazil experiences cyclical periods of centralization and decentralization of authority, and that the time has now come for a more open approach as "the only choice." He analyzed the present political situation in Brazil, criticized the individualism of politicians and asked, "on the military front, for a halt to undesirable statements which may be interpreted as an indication of the weakness of the government or division in the armed forces." This is the first part of his lecture.

An Analysis of National Policy

It is a great pleasure for me to see this school again, where from 1952 to 1955 I spent some of the most gratifying periods in the whole of my life, now long, as a military man, adviser and director of associations or private businesses and public servant in technical and political posts.

Here then I felt the infectious quivering of the creativity which inspired this school, in the original drafting of a doctrine of national security which was brand new in historical terms and in fact indigenous, although in no way alien to what had been formulated until that very moment in the most progressive strategic laboratories in the world. Competition with them brought a strange sense of fullness and exaltation, rarely seen indeed in cultures heavily and traditionally dependent, like ours, on outside centers of creativity.

Under the guidance of men such as Juarez Tavora and Cordeiro de Farias--the one with an involved and visionary spirit, and the other with a pragmatic and subtle intelligence--military men such as Ernesto Geisel, Mamede, Herrera, Rodrigo Octavio and Dorval Reis, diplomats such as Jose Eulalio and Lauro Escorel, and technicians such as Fabio Macedo Soares Guimaraes slaved side by side for hours on end, even working through the night, under the stimulus of association with students with the stature of Mario Pedrosa or Jose Honorio Rodrigues, to mention only the names of those who have been removed from us by the dissociative circumstances natural to dynamic revolutionary periods, always impassioned and always dramatic, and almost never just.

We believe that the legacy we of that generation left behind here during our passage will have proved valuable, a substratum on which successive classes of students have built the whole structure of a consistent and inspiring doctrine, with regard to which, if there is something to be desired, we would hope that it does not rigidify, but rather renews itself and updates itself day by day, in order the better to guarantee the constant and safe progress of the country.

This is what falls to you, the new students who have come here year after year, contributing promising seeds of knowledge and civic responsibility for the good of our fatherland.

1. Systoles and Diastoles in the Life of Nations

Welcoming the new governors-elect at the Planalto Palace in 1975, President Ernesto Geisel saw fit to stress:

"Brazil, since the establishment of the republic, has been a federative nation in which state autonomy has been respected and cultivated, just as the advantages of creative municipalism have been proclaimed and recognized. However, with this necessarily abstract and generic formula, it has not been possible to resolve the dilemma, always present and with a continually changing balance, involving administrative centralization and decentralization. The master Oliveira Viana, in studies of the development of Brazilian political institutions, clearly showed the eternal oscillation between the two poles, more rigid centralization and more flexible decentralization, said to have characterized successive periods in national life, and in a geopolitical view of these historic facts, he pointed out the importance of the factor of 'circulation' through the extremely vast physical base."

The magistral lesson of the classic work "Development of the Brazilian People" is well known, and can be summarized in a few brush strokes:

"In view of the 'age-old rhythm' which, with the unitary system of government, extended from Tome de Souza to Mem de Sa, caused the duality of governors to continue for 5 years, followed then by a new period of unity until the arrival of the first viceroy in 1640, interrupted only by the short divisionist lapse between 1608 and 1612, it is important to realize that 'the dominant thinking of the colonial statesmen was the concept of unity; double government was always a temporary solution, an exceptional situation, which they sought to end as quickly as possible."

In view of the proliferation of new states and autonomous governments both in the North and in the South--the state of Maranhao, the new general government of Para, encompassing Amazonas, that of Pernambuco extended to Bahia, the viceroyalty established in Rio, suffering in turn from the amputation of Sao Paulo, with the successive dissociation of Goias and Mato Grosso, and Rio Grande isolated in the South, the following conclusion is indeed pertinent: "During the colonial phase, the geographic environment did not splinter and disseminate society alone, but also the political authority, gradually subordinating it to its inexorable and inevitable dispersive force."

Thus the great problem came to be "reconciliation: reconciliation of the principle of unity of government and the regionalist and dispersive trend arising out of the extreme breadth of the geographic base of the population," and what is still more serious, "an absolute maximum of physical base with an absolute minimum of social and political circulation."

Already under the empire the formula would be very different: " . . . ever-greater freedom from this inevitability and the close sense of the political activity of the statesmen of the imperial period," " . . . the need to maintain the political unity of the country takes first place on the level of its constructive thinking" --"a heroic and continuing struggle for national unity and against the formidable scattering action of the geographic factors."

Therefore "the catalytic action of the real person" as a "centrifugal force," a political expedient which occurred here by pure "accident," at the mercy of "an upsurge of Napoleonic imperialism." would in the end "give the builders of our nationality the key to the solution of the tremendous problem of our political unity," thus allowing them to "offset the scattering effect of geographic factors and to maintain the unity of the nation during the two empires."

"The regency period would serve as a review of this powerful action of the presence imposed by the person of the monarch on the national mass," since it was for this very reason "the epoch of the most intensive exacerbation of the provincial spirit." And, finally, "to prevent the fragmenting of the country it became necessary to turn to a coup d'etat through a majority movement."

But "in truth, the organizers of the powerful centralizing mechanism of the empire would not resolve the preexisting problem of the scattering of the social mass. The geographic factor, with its disintegrating and fragmenting action, had only been compressed or disguised: it had not been eliminated" (last three words underlined by the author). "The catalytic prestige of the sovereign apparently counteracted its dispersive effect, but it continued to do its subterranean work. It remained latent until the end of the empire; bursting forth from time to time it revealed itself, causing small local ruptures in the formidable superstructure of the united monarchy." The "Balaiada," "Cabanada," "Sabinada," etc. were nothing in fact but manifestations of that "retaliation by the geographic causes limited in their action" of which Vidal de la Blache spoke. "To establish a maximum of political unity on a maximum of physical base, without the indispensable maximum of circulation means obviously to violate the natural conditions of political-administrative activity. Without the prestige of the monarchy . . . the conservative statesmen would not have achieved it."

The concept of decentralization, however, "was working feverishly and tenaciously to shape the new political institutions." This was the reason for the efforts toward "decentralization through municipalism," sought by the Procedural Code of 1832, and "decentralization through provincialism," promulgated by the celebrated Additional Act, which was not however to survive the great conservative reaction of 1840, with its demolishing interpretive law. The discredit of the monarchic formula, which was then a target for renewed attacks from all corners of the globe, and also the weakening of its high priest in Brazil, the monarch-philosopher, wise and austere, now aged and infirm, were to be expected. The republic would then develop, without major hindrance, before the eyes of an alienated and dumbfounded people, to try again, within the framework now of improved circulation, to achieve the old colonial equation--maintaining the "integrity of the nation by the fragmentation of authority," as the master said.

"With the federative republic precariously established, the forces of dispersal, ill-contained initially due to the circumstance of the military dictatorships of Deodoro and Floriano, and subject furthermore to the deviation, although brief, caused by the so-called "saddling," were in the end to lead to the "tormented period of civil revolution." Soon, however, the state authority would dominate and absorb the municipal authority, while at the same time the hegemony of the executive branch over the other two branches, legislative and judicial, was confirmed in each state, in a new intermediary stage of centralization, now on a regional basis.

Oliveira Viana's analysis was to end with that historic moment which provides such a contrast to our eyes today, which he defined as follows: "The constitutional limitations and the political contingencies make of the central authority, under the present regime, a power dependent and weakened, subordinated to 20 state situations." We had hardly embarked on the third decade of the century. But this did not prevent the great sociologist and student of politics from noting the "pettiness and inadequacy of the administrative action of the local authorities" and "the ever-more-widespread sense of the incompetence of the state administrations." This was the reason for the just prediction with which he closed his brilliant essay: "Everything seems therefore to guarantee the definitive triumph of the central authority in the future over the centrifugal forces of provincialism and localism."

There were still to come, in the course of the long period of intermittent revolutions which began again in 1922, the improvised and brief dictatorship of 1930 and the long phase of the 1937 New State, already riding the new authoritarian and strongly centralizing wave which would sweep over the whole world, leading it in the end to the tremendous holocaust of World War II.

In the wave of liberal intoxication which was to follow the Allied victory, the ultra-centralizing structure of the Getulio Vargas New State was to collapse and the 1946 constitution would endorse the old decentralizing and autonomous ideals, with drastic limitations of the executive branch in comparison to the legislature and the reduction of the central power of the union, bringing to an end many other factors and also substantially contributing at the same time to the near-anomie in 1963-64.

The 31 March revolution, without any intention of centralization or authoritarianism--as after all it did not expect to last beyond a short redemptive moment--was to be gradually forced to espouse them, to assert them and to reassert them, initially merely as temporary expedients essential to the maintenance of the recently-established public order itself, to the reorganization of the highly inflated and weakened economy, and shortly afterward, to the irrational attacks by urban-rural terrorist movements without any commitment to the national reality.

Slowly, these mere expedients were reinterpreted as elements essential to national reconstruction and, finally, to the creation of the great power emerging from our dreams.

Already, by then, other weighty factors were playing a role in the centralization-decentralization dilemma, and President Geisel did not fail to stress them in that address of his quoted above:

"The incessant proliferation of modern ways and means of transportation, along with the development of complexes of almost instantaneous electronic communication, covering the greater part of the national territory"--a maximum of circulation of goods, persons and ideas permeating the vast territorial base; and, on the other hand,

"The era of state planning, which no nation from then on could do without if it wanted to avoid collapse into stagnation and poverty, preferring to make an effort to promote the integral development of the nation in the political, psychosocial and economic realms. This is planning which in any case demands in its drafting and implementation a large measure of coordination and control, the greater the less developed and therefore the more vulnerable to foreign pressures the nation involved may be."

And he added:

"Thus, although modified by the much-increased potential offered to it by modern systems of communication and transportation, shortening distance and leaping obstacles, the Brazil of our day entered, already some years ago now, into a period of indisputable supremacy for centralization over decentralization, with the shaping in this direction of the concept of federalism and state autonomy, which were not betrayed thereby."

And he concluded with what was almost a warning:

"We have been able, thanks to God and the flexibility He gave our people, to adapt ourselves with agility since the remote colonial era, through the days of the empire and the first republic, to this constant oscillation between centralization and decentralization which has so clearly characterized the development of the Brazilian people.

The New Era of Open Approach

Five years has passed, and without a doubt, a new period of openness and decentralization is facing us.

The fact is that this seemingly interminable succession of the phases of centralization and decentralization emerges as a characteristic always present in the development not only of Brazil, but of all modern states, although they do not have the rigidity of a regular rhythm either in the breadth of the oscillations or in the duration of each phase. Rather one can recognize limits--ceilings and base levels--which are defined, although also very loosely, by other factors, many of them only temporary or situational. Each of these phases will include moreover deviations and regressions--more or less pronounced or enduring, shaping the surface of the underlying tendency of a more general rhythm which can be counted in decades. Apart from this, each historic epoch, with its specific parameters of space and time conditioning any circulation equation and, thus, both the permeability of the physical base of the state to the diffusion of ideas, to the exchange of goods via horizontal processes among individuals and social groups, and above all, to the effective scope of command and control activities, will permit a maximum and a minimum of centralization or decentralization inherent in it and thus in fact inevitable.

In any case, we are far from the much richer and more objective conceptualization of historical periodicity, in which this additional data, inferred from an analysis of the facts of harsh reality, cannot fail to be included.

No one of these phases has a clearly defined beginning or end. Instead a continuing and inevitable fluidity of cumulative processes dominates here. It would perhaps be easier to note their maximal point or climax, at a perhaps unimportant moment within a long and diffuse period of maximalization.

In reality, the life of the state is multiform, extending to the actions of promotion, control and prevention or coercion in varied fields and multiple sectors, all interdependent in fact and ill-suited to confinement in any of the traditional categories which are only didactic--political, economic, psychosocial and military fields for example. Even accepting the hypothesis of any one of these, the truth is that centralization or decentralization, as a process being pursued unequally in an anisotropic medium, despite the successive acceleration and deceleration characterizing both, one in opposition to the other, moreover, like the front and back which are aspects of a given reality and nothing more--there will not fail to be, from one field to another, advances and lags which are more or less pronounced, all moreover always varying. At each moment, the process of centralization (or decentralization) will be farther ahead, for example, in the political field than in the economic sector--now much more advanced, and again a little less so. And this corresponds to the concept of "cultural lag" with which the sociology of Ogburn deals.

This being the case, how can one say that the process as a whole is even farther ahead today than it was a year ago, since no value assessment fits into more than one field, and these are moreover ill-defined and never stationary? At best it will be possible to do this in some configurations, in only a relative fashion, with a limited degree of certainty and accuracy.

The phenomenon of cultural lag, being manifested within an integrated and by definition systemic complex, with the functioning of a recycling feedback mechanism and regulation of a homeostatic nature, carries with it the notion of a catastrophic potential for the rupture or upset of the system and, therefore, the concept of limits imposed on the magnitude of that lag. On achieving that certain dimension, it is obvious that it will begin to act as a factor in the slowdown and halting of the process as a whole, with repercussions in other sectors. Unless the process developing is so vigorous as to launch reviving impulses in the lagging sector, thus being no more than a delaying difference in phase.

This is the reason why in general the centralizing process, like that of decentralization, will advance, if it does, like any undulatory movement, which therefore never progresses in linear fashion, through all the fields in which, although artificially, reality, in itself integral and indivisible, appears to be splintered.

I advise statesmen, strategists and planners to avoid disruptions in the system and the threat of a break, taking care that the process, whether it be centralization or decentralization, is not excessively delayed in any one of the fields in relation to the others. On the other hand, they should promote rather powerful incentives in the most promising field, pursuing the old tactic of following the line of least resistance in order to encourage or ease progress in other more lagging or resistant sectors as well. Or, on the contrary, they can establish clearly visible blocks or limits in the most permeable field, to hold back the forces exerting greater pressure there which might interfere with the progress of the whole.

We appeal now for a dialectical view, Marx excluded if you wish. Interlinked as they are, the front and back of a single process seen from opposite sides, thesis and antithesis participating in a synthesis which is what the existence of the two will naturally yield--centralization and decentralization are both present at each moment in the developmental process of either one of them, leading inevitably to the upsurge of intrinsic factors in the other which are thus the product of the former, generated within it and fed from it, increasing until they assert themselves and finally reverse the terms of the equation of permanent balance reflecting the existence of the two in their inherent opposition.

In the stage in which centralization is ascendant, there are therefore produced the seeds of decentralization itself, hindrances which begin immediately to oppose that centralization, but without the strength to hinder it, much less halt it. This continues until centralization reaches its climax, and as of then, the factors in opposition or obstacles begin to outweigh and slow the process of centralization increasingly, until it is reduced to an inoperative state.

Thus, for example, the bete noire of Robert Michels, in reviewing the well-known typology of Max Weber, that much-decried and feared bureaucracy which, with all its inefficiencies, develops and flourishes increasingly in the process of centralization in the life of states--like any other social institutions, be they large businesses or churches of any denomination, in the end serves as a decisive brake on their very growth, coming to constitute an insurmountable obstacle because of the difficulties it creates and, day by day, multiplies, much more concerned with itself and its petty disputes for power and prestige among various influential groups, its own preservation and continuity, than the very process of rationalistic and planned centralization itself, to which it owed its birth and the preponderance of its diffuse but omnipresent power. And this is, moreover, even comforting.

With bureaucracy expanding, aided by the ever-greater sophistication of communications and reproduction means, the spread, storage and immediate recovery of information and documents, everything develops as if there were a speedy increase in the entropy of the system, with the losses due to parasitic currents in the vast essential web of the control and command network (C3). What would be needed then for the decline, not only of the West as prophesied by Spengler, but now of all the post-industrial societies in the classification of Raymond Aron and Daniel Bell, all of those pursuing the attractive model of superproduction, planned obsolescence and the encouragement of inflationary "consumerism"?

The salvation will lie, then, in decentralization. And what on the other hand can be said about the development, full of tremendous portents, of the relations among nation-states, since the Treaty of Westphalia gave the main protagonists on the historical stage, first of Europe and then of the world, a forum?

In a well-known study widely diffused at this school in my day, Klineberg noted, with full supporting data, the succession of the phases of introversion and extraversion in the activities of nations on the international scene. The most outstanding example of the United States of America, now withdrawn, engrossed in the American fortress, according to the traditional advice of Washington, and again plunging into dangerous redemptive crusades in distant lands, would be most instructive in this regard.

Not even centuries-long trends, like the persistent and always-unsatisfied expansionism of the Muscovite empire, or that of China, eternally fixed in that central position which would earn it the title of the Middle Kingdom, serve to invalidate this historical interpretation, since in its dynamic context, they reflect only the dominant behavioral characteristics.

This is certainly not the place for any more detailed analysis of this pendulum movement which, with greater or lesser clarity, could also be discerned in the lives of other countries. It suffices to mention it, merely in order to pose the question as to how it would be adapted to the successive stages of centralization and decentralization we believe we detect in the evolution of each state. Does the period of introversion correspond to a centralizing stage, and that of extraversion to the reverse, to decentralization, as it would perhaps be suggested intuitively? If we realize, however, that a state with a centralized government is in fact better equipped to pursue decisive and well-coordinated actions abroad, a doubt immediately arises as to this possibly hasty conclusion. Only a careful comparative analysis of numerous historic examples, along the lines of the studies by Richardson and Quincy Wright on war, could enable us to deduce something consistent in this connection.

Let us therefore content ourselves with the preceding image, more general and much more flexible, of a succession of phases of centralization and decentralization in the internal life of nations, proof of which it would seem easy to find through the historical facts, in the Brazilian case in particular.

This is how the living heart of the state beats, in an interminable sequence of diastoles and systoles, and subject as such to arrhythmia, ischemia, infarction, bradycardia and tachycardia, if not highly dangerous fibrillation.

[26 Oct 80, p 132]

[Text] In the second part of his lecture at the War College, the chief of the Civilian Household of the Presidency of the Republic defined the political tactics to be used by the Figueiredo government to achieve the "institutionalization of a more perfect democratic system." The need was "to consolidate and expand its own forces, keeping the opposition front always splintered" by means of "priority attention" to one group or another "to the detriment of the others." A "skillful enrollment maneuver," he added, could further serve as a base for the establishment of a "new balance of political forces."

2. The Brazilian Present (1980)

Now as we have already said, Brazil entered almost imperceptibly, with the 1964 revolution, into a phase of accelerated centralization which would permeate all the fields and sectors of state activity, from the political to the economic and vice versa, in a reciprocal strengthening movement, with gradual seepage to all corners of national society suggested at a distance, if not in fact remote-controlled, by the central government. The federative structure, already much weakened in itself, lost strength, and municipalism would never again be more than a mere concept to which homage continued to be paid, emptied now of any more solid content. In the name of state planning, now proclaimed as required to be democratic and merely indicative, and the national security, which was sporadically threatened in fact by unexpected terrorist outbreaks, the process of political-administrative centralization would advance by large strides as new inflationary impulses and recurring difficulties with the balance of payments, even though they derived in great part from uncontrollable foreign factors, again threw the economic system out of balance, under intolerable pressures.

Political and administrative centralization, openly and cumulatively escalating, would in the end concentrate the sum of public power in the federal union, and within that, the executive branch. Thus it could not longer be affected by small distant uprisings, many of which were simply ignored, while more serious or closer challenges would always merit agile and decisive repression.

The paternalist state machine, to which there was ever-more-frequent recourse for intervention in all circumstances and from the most remote corners, could be seen to expand daily to meet these requirements, as well as the demand for constant and efficient control of its growing tentacles and branches. A powerful bureaucracy, almost never properly oriented or enlightened, was to expand, functioning in many cases in disguised rebellion or persistent passive resistance for its own exclusive profit.

This regrettable reality was to take on serious dimensions, above all with the proliferation of obviously fictitious foundations and, in the indirect administration, the development of new public or mixed economic enterprises, both federal and state, all provided with privileged bylaws and a large measure of autonomy, and not, moreover, entirely visible. This was the reason for the need for the multiplication of new centralized tools for control. And the natural reaction to excessive centralization would thus come about in the name of efficiency requiring immediate and just decisions on the executory level, and demanding decentralization which would lead in a vicious circle to the inevitable strengthening of the chain of control itself.

In the social sector as well individual or community undertakings, in themselves so rare, weakened, all languishing for lack of their own resources and always begging at the doors of the national treasury and its budget for limited aid funds, entirely insufficient, always uncertain, contingent on interminable requirements and delays. Furthermore, there would be in competition with them the multiple organizations established by the state on a national basis, each of them with its own flourishing and costly structure, and also competing vigorously among themselves.

The hypertrophy of the executive branch would in the end cancel out the legislative activity of the congress, almost reduced to rubber-stamping projects proposed by the greater authority, if not standing aside for them. In decisive matters, the executive branch even took the place of the judiciary in judging and punishing those who rebelled against it, having recourse for the purpose to state-of-emergency documents.

Within this framework of increasing centralization, the inertia inherent in the state administrative machinery would increase day by day, slowing the very process of decision-making--ever more complex and with more widespread, serious and distant repercussions both in time and in space, and cancelling out the efficiency of controls in the process of multiplication and, to a large extent, even contradictory among themselves.

There was an unconscious movement toward maximal centralization along with maximal inefficiency, in a concentration which could perhaps be compared in the final analysis and ironically to the "black holes" detected by modern astronomy, which exercise an immeasurable gravitational pull from which life cannot escape.

And so matters developed and would have continued, if forces in opposition, generated by the dialectical dynamics of the system itself, had not come to manifest themselves and to operate with ever-increasing intensity, slowing the process, according to the mechanism described previously.

In the middle of the 1970s perhaps, the summit of political-administrative centralization had been achieved. Beginning then, conscious efforts by the federal government were added to those hindering tensions arising naturally within the system itself. The awareness of an already-alarming phenomenon, on the other hand, would gradually spread to the various strata of the population from their leading cadres, thus awakening initiative, protest and reaction in favor of decentralization which could not clearly be glimpsed then, but which was to strengthen day by day. Given this picture, debureaucratization would be a natural banner.

The sector which was visibly most backward and where there would soon develop reactions, some even ideologically inspired, against the easy target of increasing and unconcealed authoritarianism, was the political sector, above all that part of it on the boundary with the mass media. Press censorship, extremely difficult, almost impossible to manage, which is at the same time required to be intelligent and efficient, was to attract the almost intolerable pressure of the most vehement attacks, mobilizing widespread sympathy and multiple support, some of it crushing and productive.

It is not surprising then that the deliberate decentralizing effort of the government should take the form of a democratizing, more open political approach, adopted precisely through the gradual relaxation of censorship control. Nor is it surprising either that this initial stage of the process should require a rather long period and vigilant and active leadership so that it would not escape all control. And it was naturally necessary to limit the inevitable excesses, setting more or less clearly defined limits to permissiveness. And on the other hand, to win, despite the inevitable lapses into coercive power, a sufficient degree of credibility as to the intentions as such and then as to the future of the whole liberalizing process.

This would become the more urgent the stronger the pressures coming from the other sectors continued to grow: the economic sector, under dramatic threats of serious crisis, as a result of the renewed inflationary impetus and insurmountable lack of equilibrium in the balance of payments, cruelly affected by the constant multiplication of imported oil prices; and the psychosocial sector, under increasing tension, above all in the explosive outlying areas of the large population centers and the regions in the interior suffering the most from successive weather catastrophes. These pressures would all work intensively in the direction of greater centralization, because they would require greater rigidity in the whole social control system, and would point in alarm to the danger of disruption and breakdown in the social structure, subjected to intolerable tensions within the framework of the centralization-decentralization binomial.

The cards have been dealt, however. Decentralization, through the liberalizing of press censorship, as the first step, and the open democratic approach, is not yet completed today, but what will almost inevitably follow will be its establishment in decisive fashion in the political sector, foreshadowing its spread, sooner or later, to the other sectors in which rather strong resistance was still evident, above all the critical economic sector.

At the outset there was truly a doubly bipolar situation--government versus opposition, revolution versus antirevolution--vulnerable at all times to dangerous radicalization, always difficult to eliminate or neutralize. It is not that these polar extremes always coexisted in a single dilemma. The government would be by definition the revolution in power or the institutionalized and legal revolution. The opposition, with two fronts, would theoretically, whether right-wing, headed by those who claimed to be legitimate revolutionaries--the eternal "pure," the "hawks," the "Jacobins," the hard line, or left wing, cover a wide, highly variegated band in which the subversives, the challengers, the dissatisfied and those yearning for the past would take their place. But although ideologically or strategically opposed, these two groups would frequently serve each other's purposes in practice, showing once again how much closer the left wing and the right wing are to each other than to the center sector in this spectrum of political trends, which is in no way rectilinear, but rather follows a pattern of an almost closed circle. There could be alliances, most often tactical and at the same time tacit, making it possible always to give differentiated treatment to this or that component. Treatment which would in some way always contribute to keeping them separate.

Thus the obvious maneuver available to the government, in a strong central position between two groups of opponents, is to keep them separate whenever possible, alternating efforts at containment, if not counterattack, between one and the other, thus guaranteeing for itself ever-greater maneuvering room, and thus greater freedom of action for the implementation of its own political goals, without disastrous or disturbing interference. Merely a defensive maneuver, it may be said, but one which though only instrumental would create the conditions necessary and adequate for the greater activity of political construction which would follow in triumph. A strategic maneuver to the benefit of the political maneuver, superior and creative.

The elimination of one or the other of the groups, strengthening the bipolar structure, would therefore lead to the definition of a single opposition front, continuous and not susceptible to control, against which, from then on, nothing would be possible but ordinary maneuvers involving simple frontal thrusts, or a process of wearing each other down.

This would be the strategic problem with which the government found itself faced after the decisive episodes involving the resignation of General Frota, minister of army, the removal of Gen Hugo Abreu, chief of the military household of the presidency of the republic, and the vitiation of the opposition candidacy of Gen Euler Bentes Monteiro. The undeniable success was reflected in the final, calm completion of the succession process. But it would raise a new question: how then to move ahead against a single opposition front? Strategy would suggest, as the very intent of democratization would moreover require, a prompt dismantling of the opposition system, encouraging the emergence of multiple and different fronts, with regard to which it would again be possible to pursue an expanded form of the same maneuver in a central position which was the guarantee for the success achieved in the earlier phase.

The innate heterogeneity of the opposition would facilitate the achievement of this goal, which was not for all that any less essential either to the advance of the very cause of democracy and liberalization so insistently urged by the most articulate sectors of the national elite, long imbued with individualistic and liberal ideals. In political terms, there would be available there the vigorous multi-party system thesis, finally established by the reforms late in 1979.

Such is the political situation confronting us today—the multi-party system developing; legal affirmation on the one hand; and permeation of the entire national society, from north to south, on the other, in search of definitive and solid roots in municipal and state foundations.

Meanwhile, in the economic sector, the vast battle against inflation and the serious lack of equilibrium in the balance of payments continue tirelessly, without any assurance yet of promising results in the second half of this year, although there are some objective elements justifying renewed hope.

In any case, the cultural lag between the institutional advance toward democracy, which it is thought should be more progressive and liberal and participational, and the rigidity of the economic front, which for its part needs greater breadth and efficiency in government control, is widening.

What then will we do?

3. Difficulties of the Present--1980

In view of the firm intention of the government to pursue the liberalizing democratic approach--irreversible moreover, from every indication--with a view to extending this decentralizing process to the economic and psychosocial fields in a second phase, it is necessary to emphasize, almost in recapitulation of what has already been said, the main difficulties of the period in which we find ourselves:

On the one hand, the contrary pressures, persistent and strong, coming above all from the economic field, where the stubborn struggle still being waged against inflation and the serious trade and payments balance problems; and

On the other hand, the trends toward dissociation and the self-assertion impulses, both individual and on the part of small and large groups, being manifested now with singular enthusiasm, after such a long period of repression, and which are not unfortunately limited to the opposition area--which would even be unnatural--are making the pursuit of any political maneuver increasingly difficult due to the contagious lack of discipline permeating the much more numerous but no less heterogeneous government ranks.

Doubtless it seems a strange paradox to want to carry democratizing liberalization forward from the political sector just now when the conditions prevailing in the economic sector are so negative, insistently demanding broader and more effective control, and thus a centrally coordinated discipline with profound effects on the governmental and social structure as a whole.

More favorable moments in the past were not seized, for reasons which we need not go into here. But in any case, this cannot justify delaying further this decentralization process, long since demanded as necessary and urgent. Otherwise, pressures in the other direction, strong and almost intolerable today, would again accumulate speedily, putting the durability of the entire system in danger in this tremendous pressure-cooker into which, as has already been seen in times past, the national body turns after a decade and a half of increasing compression.

Furthermore, for those who see the "participation" factor, creative and dynamic, as a much weightier and more critical factor than the full guarantee of freedoms, however basic they may be, there is great confidence that with the passage of time, and not too much of it, the very process of democratic improvement now in progress will in the end awake an understanding and new energies which will contribute decisively to the arduous effort of housecleaning and recovery which great pains are being taken to carry out in the economic sector.

Nor should the threat of dissociative lack of discipline within the government party frighten us, much less paralyze the indispensable and unpostponeable decentralizing and democratizing actions.

Within the indefinite picture preceding the formal and definitive registration of the various political parties and thus the reestablishment of new and effective bonds of loyalty, lack of discipline may well function more energetically in the opposition sector, already splintered into various parties, unless we on our part refrain from exerting certain types of pressures which could have a counter-productive effect, creating solidarity against common dangers.

As can be seen, this era is still one of instability and multiple concerns, requiring uncommon mastery in political leadership, a large dose of tolerance and the capacity to negotiate.

4. Guidelines of a Strategy for the Executive Branch (1980 + 5)

With the polarity previously dominant destroyed thanks to the breakup of the opposition front, new prospects are now developing for the governmental strategy with a view to the further advancement of a more progressive and democratic style of life.

What was sought through multi-party dissociation was a better characterization and individualization of the political forces, through more homogeneous and more authentically representative parties, offering them the hope of a just monopoly on political action shared among them and them alone, for which they are by right the only specialized tools. Earlier, because of their lack of definition in a single extremely heterogeneous party and the precarious nature of certain isolated actions, the opposition political forces were in the end submerged in broader conglomerates, ranging from religious and semi-religious organizations involved in a confused pastoral practice limited in utopian fashion to the political realm, to business and even pseudo-philanthropic organizations, seemingly uncommitted. The true agents in the political field came to be these conglomerates to a greater extent than the single opposition party itself. And because of the traditional prestige and protection they could offer, the religious and semi-religious organizations were to assume an important, almost hegemonic, position among these conglomerates.

The resurgence of party life, not only recognized as legitimate, but protected and even heeded by the government itself, will, in the end, it seems likely, restore to the parties their original role as the main protagonists in the political field, such that the many non-political bodies which had strayed from their functional areas, spuriously usurping that role as party substitutes, will return to the channels of their rightful activities.

Until then, however, the opposition political picture will continue to be a miscellaneous complex in which one can distinguish an ever more clearly defined and specialized multi-party front, apart from various auxiliary fronts which still remain active, with varying degrees of autonomy and involvement, in the religious sector, the trade union sector, the mass media agency field, intellectual circles, etc. The lesser radicalization and greater liberalization of the regime and tolerance by the government will contribute greatly to the emergence of strong trends toward splintering of the opposition front.

This leads to the possibility of a new type of maneuver, the internal features of which immediately bring to mind the famous strategic planning provisions with regard to beseiged Mantua, and the well-articulated dynamics in terms of distance and time on which Bonaparte built his masterly Italian campaign in 1796, to defeat the enemy forces in successive glorious campaigns.

It is a question in our case of maintaining and expanding a central maneuvering area, essential to the advancement, in tranquillity and security, of our political goals, through the striking, in irregular succession, of unexpected blows against various surrounding fronts, each one by itself. In this way an effort would be made to establish immediate limits to the adversary actions allowed, with gradual expansion subsequently of our area of security and to maneuver. This will even be a pedagogical situation in the Skinner conditioning pattern, strengthening the identification of that which guarantees valuable compensation, in opposition to counterproductive or suicidal attitudes.

In truth, we need to reeducate ourselves for democratic coexistence. This could be done as follows, for example: on the military front, an immediate end should be put to the undesirable statements which can be interpreted as an indication of the weakness of the government or of division in the armed forces; then on the trade union front, it is necessary to liquidate a vigorous strike movement which, preferring the revolutionary option of confrontation to the democratic choice of negotiation, has strayed into a dispute of a political nature, discrediting the key leadership and also the heads of auxiliary bodies who, leaving their legitimate and legal fields of action, interfere without justification in the matter; later, on the student front, bodies which are not legally representative, peculiar alliances of teachers and students, and any challenging pressures with regard to the measures announced by the competent authorities should be denounced or calmly phased out; then, on the parliamentary front, aggressive and improper demonstrations should be halted, with recourse to the proper legal provisions; and finally, on the communications front, illegal actions by the media should be prosecuted with the means offered by the law. And we should continue in this fashion until a relative atmosphere of calm, lending itself to the advancement of the basic goal--the institutionalization of a more perfect democratic system with an inherent capacity to perfect itself still further--is achieved. To do this, care must be taken to consolidate and, if possible, to expand the forces of the regime itself, always keeping the opposition front splintered, which is now also being done by priority concern for the claims of this or that party or group to the detriment of the others. And this will be ever more feasible, the more our sincere efforts at democratizing liberalization encompass many of the aspirations of other parties or groups which are closer to us and whose cooperation or support could be won through the skillful and enlightened maneuver of enlisting one or another.

This will on the other hand be essential to the establishment of the new balance of political forces, both in the federal sector and on the level of the federal states, and impulses such as to allow encouragement, in a successful and timely fashion, of the parallel advance of decentralization in much more resistant sectors, such as for example the economy, as well. Until that is achieved, it is to be hoped that the main inherent obstacles can be removed or at least overcome.

5. Conclusion

By way of conclusion, let us say only that at this point in the year 1980--June-July--and with 5 years still ahead of it, the Figueiredo government can without false optimism aim at the satisfactory fulfillment of its announced goals:

Perfecting of the democratic system, making it capable in itself of perfecting itself still further, guaranteeing the healthy enjoyment of individual and collective rights and ensuring the current and efficient exercise of participational action by all the citizens and social groups in the making of the major decisions of interest to the national collective;

Suitable decentralization of the government system, guaranteeing the federated states and municipalities greater responsibility and broader initiative, and increasing encouragement of community activities;

Reform and strengthening of the economic sector, with better protection against adverse pressures coming from abroad and the establishment of a solid infrastructure, both for the greater grandeur of Brazil as a 21st-century power and for the flourishing of a society with more just distribution of income, much greater wealth and less vulnerability to exhausting periodic crises;

Cultural expansion of the country both in the sector of science and technology and in the arts, with the national profile more firmly structured and by then safe from harm from any and all forms of contacts and exchange with other cultures overseas or elsewhere on the continent; and

A greater projection of our nation abroad, not only in the realistic and objective defense of our national interests, but further in the collective advancement of peace in solidarity and the advance of mankind.

And this is what we hope for, with patience and faith.

AUTHORITIES FORESEE NO CHANGE IN U.S.-BRAZILIAN RELATIONS

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 6 Nov 80 p 17

[Report on separate interviews with President Joao Figueiredo and Foreign Affairs Minister Saraiva Guerreiro in Brasilia on 5 November: "Figueiredo Says Relations Will Not Change"; name(s) of interviewer(s) not given]

[Text] Brasilia--President Joao Figueiredo, in an interview granted yesterday morning, stated that the election of Ronald Reagan is an internal American problem about which he would not comment. He also said that the Republican candidate's victory will alter "absolutely nothing in relations between Brazil and the United States."

Figueiredo said he went to bed Tuesday night without waiting for the first returns and was informed only yesterday morning about Reagan's victory. "Were you surprised by the result?" a reporter asked. Figueiredo replied: "I wasn't concerned about the results. I root for Fluminense [soccer team]."

Figueiredo granted the interview as he was leaving the FENAME [expansion unknown] book depository after having presided at the ceremony for national distribution of MEC [Ministry of Education and Culture] textbooks. The interview:

[Question] What did you think of the election of Ronald Reagan?

[Answer] I thought he won.

[Question] In your opinion, is it good or bad?

[Answer] I don't have anything to do with that. My problem is here in Brazil. That question should be asked of Americans, not of me.

[Question] And for Brazil, do you think it is good or bad?

[Answer] I don't know. It makes no difference to us. It's their problem.

[Question] Don't you fear that Reagan, with his warlike views, may threaten world peace?

[Answer] No, I'm not afraid of that. It will be up to him. He is going to take office now and he will show what kind of person he is.

[Question] Could anything be changed in relations between Brazil and the United States?

[Answer] No; absolutely nothing.

[Question] Is this because Brazil now has greater weight in international relations?

[Answer] This is an internal American problem. I went to bed at my usual hour and I awoke this morning to the news that Reagan won.

[Question] Were you surprised?

[Answer] No. I wasn't concerned about the result. I root for Fluminense.

Smiling, Figueiredo closed the interview and went to his car.

Saraiva Guerreiro

Foreign Affairs Minister Saraiva Guerreiro said yesterday that he sees "no reason for Brazil-United States relations not to remain at an excellent level during the Ronald Reagan administration." According to the foreign affairs minister, the general tone of relations between the two countries is good and both parties want to avoid deterioration, although he pointed out that "this does not preclude some differences of opinion.

"We have a foreign policy that is determined by circumstances arising from Brazilian needs. Our policy is guided within certain established principles, which does not prevent it from coinciding with that of other countries on one point or another. But it is a Brazilian policy," asserted Saraiva Guerreiro, in assuring that there will not be a policy of accommodating to U.S. interests, no matter how amicable Reagan's position may be in relation to Brazil.

No Labels

After hesitating to comment upon statements of another country's president-elect, the Brazilian foreign minister said he did not understand what Reagan meant when he spoke of his desire to maintain privileged relations with some countries of Latin America, Brazil among them.

"I don't use labels, I avoid adjectives and I don't know what privileged relations are," he commented.

Saraiva Guerreiro also completely dismissed the possibility of renewing the military agreement with the United States renounced by Brazil in 1977, but he did not wish to comment about the position of the Brazilian military on the subject.

The foreign minister said further that he would not concern himself with analyzing whether the new U.S. administration will have protectionist inclinations or whether it will exert pressure on Brazil in this respect.

REPORTAGE ON PMDB STATUS IN RIO, SAO PAULO

MR-8 Seeking Control

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 22 Oct 80 p 5

[Text] Yesterday, in Rio, a group of PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement Party] leaders started mobilizing in an attempt to prevent the claim that remnants of the MR-8 movement exist in the party from creating problems for its organization and hampering even the process of openness.

One of the most active urban guerrilla groups in 1968, MR-8, according to reports published in the press, is attempting to gain control of the PMDB boards of directors in the 17th and 18th electoral zones in the capital, in Rio, in opposition to the so-called liberals and independents in the party. In the former zone, the slate backed by the movement, headed by engineer Ramalho Ortigao, went so far as to hold an extra convention, which was later challenged, to obtain the majority of the board of directors, making its existence in the PMDB public for the first time.

Yesterday, one of the main leaders of PMDB admitted that the situation could lead the party to be faced with "serious difficulties," and encourage "the hardest elements" in the regime to demand a shutdown, with the excuse that the party is harboring "terrorists." And he also recalled a warning attributed to President Figueiredo, to the effect that party reform was essential to isolate the radicals then contained in MDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement].

That same leader thinks that the crisis will be resolved within PMDB, with the position of the moderate, large majority, capable of keeping MR-8 under control, prevailing. This group is generally described as "a small faction of youths who, without any commitment to the Brazilian reality, are convinced that they are the enlightened people's vanguard for the struggle that is approaching. In short, they are insignificant."

Although no one ' party overtly admits the presence of MR-8, some think that this element has assumed a position capable of readily identifying it with the conduct of the group, as expressed most commonly in the newspaper HORA DO POVO.

Their presence in PMDB has for a long time been creating obstacles to the party's growth in certain areas. A PMDB politician said that a sizable portion of PDT, comprised of leftist intellectuals, has refused to join the party, "fearing the radicals."

The informant remarked: "They act rashly, selling HORA DO POVO as the PDMB newspaper and, in the schools, are submitting their slates as if they were those of our party."

The so-called independents and liberals in PMDB deny that they were the ones who denounced the movement led by engineer Ramalho Ortigao as being affiliated with MR-8. They claim that its own methods were what gave it away.

In the case of the 17th electoral zone, they are contesting the command of the board of directors and the executive body, with the slate of former Minister Helio de Almeida, who reportedly promised originally to give them eight of the 21 seats on the board of directors and one of the five in the executive body. The proposal was refused. In a note to the press yesterday, Helio de Almeida claimed: "Our slate registered 342 out of the 520 members in our electoral zone, while the dissidents had only 178 members, 50 of whom were using the name of Deputy Delio dos Santos who sent me a positive statement today lending full support to our official slate."

He also said that it has the complete backing of Senators Nelson Carneiro and Saturnino Braga, of Federal Deputies Delio dos Santos, Marcelo Cerqueira and Modesto da Silveira, of State Deputy Heloneida Studart, and of Councilman Helio Fernandez Filho.

If they do not reach an agreement, the two slates will go to another convention in the 17th zone, on 2 November.

MR-8 Infiltration Denied

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 17 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] Yesterday, Senators Nelson Carneiro and Roberto Saturnino, and Deputy Marcelo Cerqueira, of the Rio PMDB, denied reports that there is a crisis in the party owing to the infiltration of the extreme leftist organization, MR-8, particularly in Rio. Nelson Carneiro, regional president of PMDB, said: "We do not ask anyone for credentials of their ideology."

Like his colleagues in the party's legislative group, Nelson Carneiro thinks that it is all nothing but probing, in an attempt to affect the party, "which is growing throughout the state, and has been very successful in holding its municipal conventions." He added that all the members have assumed the commitment to follow the PMDB's program line, "and that is sufficient."

According to Roberto Saturnino, the reports to the effect that MR-8 is infiltrating PMDB cannot be proven, "because a clandestine organization does not identify its possible members."

And he stressed: "They are excuses found to affect PMDB. They said previously that the party would not be viable in Rio because nearly all its members would join the PP [Popular Party]. The proof lies there, with the party in first place in the public opinion polls. So, it must be affected, and hence that excuse of radical infiltration."

In the opinion of Deputy Marcelo Cerqueira, PMDB is a party, not a "front", with a definite program, manifesto and statutes; and, as he remarked: "It will not be made into a tool by any movement within it, and those movements will by no means be subjected to discrimination with any excuse."

He also said: "It is extremely upsetting to the authoritarians that we give daily evidence of tolerance for diversity and democratic coexistence."

Deputy Ulysses Guimaraes prefers not to attach importance to the reports of MR-8 infiltration in the PMDB. He claims: "This type of thing is an old story. It does not impress us any more, nor does it undermine the party's image."

Sao Paulo PMDB Head

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 22 Oct 80 p 5

[Text] Federal Deputy Alberto Goldman will be the secretary general of the Sao Paulo PMDB, on the slate of candidates for the regional board of directors which will be submitted to the party convention on 23 November. The presidency of the party has also now been determined, and it will go to former Federal Deputy Mario Covas.

Goldman's name was selected after several meetings of the PMDB leaders, at which there was also a discussion of the names of the president of the Sao Paulo Assembly, Robson Marinho, and state Deputy Franco Barusseli who, it was noted, were also candidates for the post, which is the second in importance in the party's leadership. The other names on the slates are to be determined today, although the deadline for establishing them does not expire until tomorrow.

Today, the chairman of the Regional Provisional Commission, Mario Covas, will examine the names of the candidates of the state's 10 administrative regions, the mayors of Greater Sao Paulo and the zones of the capital (north, south, east and west), the workers, students and youth departments, and the federal, state and municipal legislative groups.

Tito Costa

However, the process of making up that slate is not to the liking of certain party sectors which have remained aloof from the discussions. The mayor of Sao Bernardo do Campo, Tito Costa, who was at the Assembly yesterday, said that the mayors elected by the old MDB are dissatisfied with the conduct of the regional leadership. He claims that the mayors (about 32 in the state) were not called to the meetings organized by the provisional leadership, nor were the criteria to govern the composition of the slate discussed and established.

Tito Costa declared: "Thus far, no one has yet talked with me, nor with any mayor from the interior. This matter, unfortunately, is still being handled only at the top, although the chairman of the provisional commission himself has admitted the importance of the last municipal convention in Sao Bernardo, which was one of the most controversial ones."

Nevertheless, Tito Costa does not think that there will be any defection from the party, such as the launching of a dissident slate: "At most, there may be a scrape; but those matters will certainly end up being corrected during the process of forming the new board of directors; because there is no more time for any discussions in this regard."

'Purge'

Yesterday, in Brasilia, Deputy Lucia Viveiros (PP-PA) criticized the statement by the president of PMDB, Deputy Ulysses Guimaraes, to the effect that the party has undergone a "purge" and cannot merge with opportunists and corrupt persons who have left its cadres. Lucia said that, in Para, "by coincidence, the opportunist and corrupt person is the PMDB representative, Deputy Jader Barbalho."

The deputy went on to say: "At a time when PMDB has become an angel, I would say that there are no conditions for the merger, precisely because there are in PMDB egocentric persons who will never be able to become refined or affirmed in a civilized fashion." She also expressed regret at the "rudeness and unfairness" with which Deputy Ulysses Guimaraes has been behaving, when he said with regard to former party colleagues that "many of them were even persecuted and exploited within the former MDB."

PT LEADER ADVOCATES MILITARY PARTICIPATION IN POLITICAL PROCESS

Brasilia CORREIO BRAZILIENSE in Portuguese 22 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] Yesterday, the national president of the Labor Party [PT], Luis Inacio da Silva, "Lula", said that the Armed Forces as an institution must participate in the country's political process; but he reaffirmed his most complete disbelief in President Figueiredo's plan for openness, recalling that, "if the hand outstretched in reconciliation were sincere, I would have been allowed to speak at the War College."

According to "Lula", a dialog with the military according to the terms set by several deputies, including the candidate for leadership of PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement Party], Fernando Lyra, is not valid, because it would not be anything other than meetings at which trivial topics were discussed. In this regard, he recalled the period of dialog headed by the then president of Congress, Petronio Portella, when, he claimed, the latter "was not interested in delving into any objective discussion with me."

Since that time, according to the metal workers leader, the process of redemocratization has not changed in any way for the better, or in a way that would warrant expressions of optimism. He said that, on the basis of this observation, it is valid to state that the theory claiming Figueiredo's political openness to be a farce is true. He also considers a mere rapprochement with the military unnecessary, because he does not think that there is a possibility for progress in the most pressing social demands "unless there is a list of established common objectives, such as an actual discussion of the issue of agrarian reform, and the revising of the wage policy, and, in particular, a clearcut determination of what the military want of the civilians and what the civilians want of the military."

When asked about the main items on that list refused by Petronio Portella, "Lula" quickly replied: Labor union freedom and autonomy; revision of the systems which govern the Guarantee Fund and job stability; agrarian reform and a pertinent discussion of land holding, both in the urban and rural areas; housing and education; revision of the wage policy, including the setting of a minimum wage that can meet the real needs of the workers and their families; freedom of party organization, so that the country may have the various trends of political thinking organized; a sliding wage hike, based on the real rise in the cost of living; the right to strike, and "burial of the present National Security Law," among other things.

The PT's national leader also remarked that the Armed Forces will not be fit to participate democratically in the Brazilian political process until they are involved in the political parties, depending on the various trends of opinion that they hold. He claimed that there are many members of the military willing "to solve Brazil's problems," and that there must be a determination of objectives in order to promote the publicized dialog. He said:

"What cannot be desired is the repetition of what the business owners did to me since 1975; that is, sit at a table to discuss the most superficial and even trivial things. This incident was repeated with the late Petronio Portella. For example, I want to talk at the ESG [War College] but, apart from the civilian and military bosses and authorities, the only union leader heard there is one named Ary Campista." He asked: "Then where is the dialog?"

Merger

According to "Lula", the theory about the merger of the opposition parties does not make the slightest sense. He (preferring not to discuss the position of Senator Teotonio Vilela, of PMDB-AL, the main coordinator of the process) thinks that the merger might be summarized as the unity of the opposition parties on the most essential issues of the political process. However, as he explained, this does not authorize any action to promote what he described as a "legal merger." Also in this regard, he explained that the abolishment of two or more parties to form just one, based on the regrouping of their members, "is an internal matter for each one."

He said: "The merger already exists, in reality, day by day. Now they claim that the merger is the only way of opposing the regime. I think that it already exists. But the merger on paper: that is nonsense."

Constituent Assembly

"Lula" also does not think that the notion of convoking a National Constituent Assembly should be encouraged now. He claims that the time for holding a forum of debates for the purpose of devising a new Charter will come only after it is known exactly what that Charter should comprise. He explained that PT has assigned studies on energy, education, housing, the land issue and other controversial and divisive matters, in order to "organize the people over and above this." Not until after these studies have been debated on the national level, among all the movements, will it be possible to head toward the convocation of a National Constituent Assembly. According to the PT leader, it is for this very reason that the party has not yet taken a stand on the participation in the demonstrations organized by PMDB and PP on 15 November, when the date of the national struggle for the convocation of a Constituent Assembly will be set.

PT Now Requests Registration in TSE

At 1400 hours today, the Workers Party, with extensive documentation attesting to the organization of 676 municipal commissions in 14 states of the Federation, will file an application with the TSE requesting provisional registration, adding the records relating to the regional commissions of another four states: Sergipe, Paraiba, Parana and Bahia.

The national president of PT himself, Luiz Ignacio da Silva, "Lula", will submit to the TSE the request for provisional registration. Yesterday, he chose not to comment on the possibility of the Electoral Court's denying the petition (as rumored), based on the argument that the PT has all the features of a classist organization.

According to the leader of the metal workers, there is no logical reason for the Court to refuse it the initials. He noted that he would not dwell on that supposition, because PT "is not a workers party and does not require a worker's identification paper of those who want to join it."

The PT president summarized by saying: "We requested the registration with the conviction that we shall obtain it."

Today, PT will submit to the TSE records of commissions formed in the following states: Acre (12), Rio de Janeiro (26, with 15 zonal and 11 municipal); Rio Grande do Norte (29); Rio Grande do Sul (51, with 6 zonal and 45 municipal); Ceara (35, with 4 zonal and 31 municipal); Minas Gerais (200); Santa Catarina (45); Mato Grosso de Sul (17); Maranhao (30); Piaui (27, with 25 municipal and 2 zonal); Espirito Santo (14); Sao Paulo (130 , with 22 zonal and 108 municipal); Goias (45); and Amazonas (15).

MODERN FEATURES OF ARMORED VEHICLES USED IN IRAQ, TALKS DENIED

Cascavel , Jararaca Types Described

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 19 Oct 80 pp 1, 7

[Text] In the war against Iran, the Iraqi Army is using the most modern version of the Brazilian armored vehicle, "Cascavel EE-9", manufactured in Sao Paulo by ENGESA (Specialized Engineers Inc). It is a highly advanced model which incorporates all the technological improvements made on the vehicle since its introduction about 10 years ago; so much so that the present model is actually considered to be "the new Cascavel" in the company's research area. With electronic systems, a more powerful engine, automatic transmission, operating facilities and a high degree of firing power, according to an officer of the Second Army associated with motorized units, the EE-9 "is one of the three best of its type in the entire world. It is certainly superior to any Soviet product of the same size."

According to the vice-president of ENGESA, Jose Guilherme Ribeiro, that efficiency will increase further still during the next few years, when the car comes off the assembly lines at Sao Jose dos Campos with the option of a computer on board for firing control. It will be the first light armored vehicle to use that optional equipment, which is now limited to the very sophisticated, super-heavy (Soviet) T-72, (American) XM-1, (British) Chieftain and (German) Leopard II battle tanks, that are in the divisions comprising the backbone of the ground armed forces of each of the producing countries.

Computer

The data processing system, essentially, has caused a reduction in the index of error to insignificant levels. It consists of a set of electronic sensors which collects information on general external and internal conditions that might interfere with successful firing. The artilleryman has a television monitor, and his position is, in fact, almost passive: He merely has to put the target between the lines on the monitor. All the other calibrations are automatic and, starting with the first shot, the target is followed automatically. In the view of the specialists, that infallible power of destruction "is highly desirable;" after all, the results of the latest joint NATO maneuvers held in 1979 showed that, in reality, the useful life-span of a conventional armored vehicle in battle is currently under 2 hours."

The future stage of sophistication to be attained by the "Cascavel" will be the culmination, during the 1980's, of a long process of improvement. For example, the version sold to Iraq retains the same basic features involving weight (11 tons) and size (6.22 meters long, 2.36 tall and 2.59 wide), but it is still greatly improved. Externally, the first evidence is the pair of headlights, which are now built into the chassis. Installed in the turret, which carries the ENGESA 90-millimeter gun, is an independent cupola for the car commander, giving access to a 500 mm rapid-fire Browning machine gun. For the three-man crew, there are innovations on the redesigned panel, which now contains the pressure control for the six bullet-proof tires, and the automatic fire prevention system (for the compartment and engine), plus the air-conditioning adjustment unit.

The engine of the EE-9 was also changed: It is equipped with a 220 hp 6V53 Detroit diesel (the former system was a 174 hp Mercedes-Benz); and the Allison-640 automatic transmission has replaced the mechanical five-speed system.

Driver, gunner and commander have individual access to the night vision system, and the laser telemeter for adjusting the sight has received semi-conductor silica glass circuits, increasing the safety margin. All the wheels are double circuit brake types, and the power system has an electromechanical drive mechanism to allow for shutting off the radiator so as to permit its use under conditions with maximum temperature changes, such as in the desert, for example, where the maximum during the daytime reaches 45 degrees centigrade, and the minimum at night is about zero degrees. The radio transmitter-receiver on board operates on modulated frequency, hooked up to an internal intercommunicator system with selective operation.

Superiority

The "Cascavel" is also an armored vehicle with strategic superiority from the standpoint of its weapon system. The 90 gun fires eight shots per minute, and can use five different types of ammunition: HE (explosive charge), HEAT (antitank explosive charge), HESH (killer explosive charge), training and smoke. On the side, increasing the firing power of the artillery piece, is the infrared casing for night activity: the mere light from a cigarette would suffice to illuminate the enemy target. In the backup, there is a NATO 7.62 millimeter coaxial machine gun and six smoke-producing grenade launchers. The armor consists of welded plates with a special composition. The outer sections are much harder than the inner ones. The front ones are 16 millimeters thick, which is sufficient to guarantee complete safety against 12.7 caliber fire, with a direct impact or at an angle; the side and rear armor plate is over 8 millimeters thick, sufficient to afford protection against automatic firing of up to 7.62 millimeters. The average range of the EE-9 is 700 kilometers. Its maximum speed is 100 kilometers per hour.

In the Persian Gulf theater of operations, on the strip itself, the equivalent adversary is the British "Scorpion", of which Iran has 250 units. It is a fast armored vehicle on treads, developed for reconnaissance and limited attack missions, but one which would have serious difficulties in showing ideal performance in the desert, where the bearings on the treads suffer abrasion from the sand. It is light (7,960 kilograms) and uses an self-reloading 76 millimeter gun. It carries a NATO 7.62 machine gun, and its range is limited to 400 kilometers, even when operating at a reduced speed of 80 kilometers per hour. It also poses another problem: The pace of the gunfire is necessarily slow, because of the type of steel used in the construction. In the case of the "Cascavel", the material supplied by Eletrometal, in Sumare, is similar to that used in the XM-1 guns, the United States' latest heavy tank. It is a fine material obtained from the "electroslag" process, wherein a metal ingot, steel or superalloy, produced in a conventional fashion, is progressively recast, passing through a liquid slag. The smelting of the metal occurs as a result of the heating caused by the passage of the current in the circuit of the metal to be refined: slag/metal/refined. The result is a product with optimal performance, which is nearly devoid of inclusion and which retains considerable resistance features. With a mobility similar to that of the Brazilian EE-9, Iran has the BTR (40/50/60 series) series supplied by the Soviet Union. Nearly all the 500 made available are troop transports, but there are models with rather unconventional features, according to the records of the London Institute of Strategic Studies, which note the presence of squadrons with 20-millimeter double guns, 14-millimeter quadruple machine guns and 37 millimeter mortars. They are odd vehicles, which come from the factory with ordinary truck tires (always of the "whitewall" type), and they have plating of such varying thickness that in some points the difference is as much as 13 millimeters.

EE-3 'Jararaca'

Jose Guilherme Ribeiro is of the opinion that ENGESA will only make a drastic change in its line of products "if the market demands a turnabout." According to him, "Although both the 'Cascavel' and the 'Urutu' are models discovered nearly a decade ago, they are in the vanguard of the type, and they will not be discontinued. On the contrary, they will gain more sophistication as the need arises." Over the short term, the model that will receive the largest number of innovations is the newest one in the group, the "Jararaca." Designed to cover an area with great demand at the end of the 1970's (that for superlight, fast armored vehicles), the EE-3 was introduced in 1978, but it was not manufactured for the first time until late 1979. Used at first for reconnaissance missions, it can act as a mobile command post or backup vehicle for motorized patrols. The "standard" weaponry is a 12.7 millimeter M-2 machine gun, but the three-man compartment can carry a 60 millimeter mortar or, in the most daring undertakings, a "Milan" antitank missile launcher.

Access to the interior is provided by three hatches or two side entryways. The driver is protected by a molded plate with three see-through panels. In the rear, there is the 102 hp Mercedes-Benz water-cooled engine, hooked up to a five-speed shift box, with hydraulic steering, and observation sensors for electrical failure. It has a maximum weight of 5 tons and a speed of 120 kilometers per hour, with a range of 600 kilometers, a maximum lateral pitch of 30 degrees, a vertical obstruction of 40 centimeters and an open trench of 80 centimeters.

It is, in fact, a high-performance jeep which, in the missile launching version, may be of interest to the Brazilian Army, Iraq and Chile, although that report has not been confirmed by the manufacturer. In the efficiency tests, the results are said to have proven that the "Milan"-"Jararaca" combination is positive.

The EE-3 is ENGESA's lowest-priced model, costing about $90,000. The "Cascavel" is more expensive: the unit price starts at $300,000 (with all the options) and can amount to as much as $500,000; whereas the "Urutu", a multi-purpose amphibian type (troop transport, ambulance, command car, gun carrier, mortar launcher or missile launcher) is priced in the middle range: $250,000.

ENGESA Denies Iraq Negotiations

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 21 Oct 80 p 20

[Text] Sao Paulo--The presence of the president of ENGESA, Jose Luis Whitaker Ribeiro, in Iraq at present does not mean that he is negotiating for the sale of other weapons to that country, according to an announcement made yesterday by company sources. They added that all the Brazilian "Urutu" and "Cascavel" combat vehicles, including the new EE-9 model, were exported before the war with Iran started.

The sources also stated that the actual results of the use of the products exported there, which are at the height of action against the Iranian Army, "are not yet known."

The "Cascavel", used in the war by Iraq, is considered superior to Soviet armored vehicles.

The "Jararaca", of the "fast armored vehicle" type, is the model which will receive more innovations.

TRADE BALANCE DEFICIT HITS $2.8 BILLION THROUGH SEPTEMBER

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 1 Nov 80 p 20

[Text] Brasilia--The deficit in the balance of Brazilian trade from January through September of this year was $2.891 billion, the largest deficit in the first 9 months of a year since the height of the petroleum crisis, when, during January-through-September 1974, the trade balance recorded a deficit of $3.781 billion.

The definitve data, indicating imports of $17.291 billion and exports of $14.400 billion from January through September this year, were reported yesterday by the Finance Ministry. During the same 9-month period last year the deficit was $1.499 billion. In September alone this year the deficit was $424 million compared to $207 million in September 1979.

As government authorities believe that Brazilian exports will reach $20 billion by the end of this year, foreign sales of goods and services during the last 3 months will have to be $5.600 billion, or about $1.866 billion per month. If the estimates referring to October reported the day before yesterday by Benedito Moreira, director of the Foreign Trade Department of the Bank of Brazil (CACEX) are confirmed--he said exports last month were $2 billion--it is possible that such an ambitious official goal may be reached. But the desired equilibrium will not be achieved, as imports--despite all the effort made to restrict them this year--will be over $22 billion.

Exports

Despite the difficulties of the world economy, Brazilian exports are continuing to grow at a 30 percent rate. Brazil exported $11.069 billion of merchandise from January through September 1979 and $14.400 billion in the same period this year. Coffee sales in the first 9 months of this year increased 37.1 percent and those of other products increased 28.9 percent. Brazil's coffee revenues were $2.153 billion, compared to $1.570 billion from January to September 1979.

Exports of industrialized products continue to have a better performance than that of commodities, increasing 33.9 percent from January through September in comparison to the same period last year, while foreign sales of commodities increased 28.9 percent. Revenues from commodity exports were $6.113 billion, while those from industrialized products were $8.287 billion, of which $6.541 billion came from manufactured goods and $1.746 billion from semi-manufactured goods.

Should Moreira's forecast be confirmed, this will be the first time in the history of Brazilian exports that they will have overcome the $2 billion-a-month barrier. The closest to this was recorded in May of this year--$1.936 billion, when for the first time since April 1978 the trade balance showed a surplus, with a balance of $10 million. The September result of $1.802 billion is the second highest this year, whereas the lowest was $1.325 billion in January.

Imports

Petroleum was responsible for 44.8 percent of the nation's total imports from January through September this year, costing $7.762 billion compared to $4.174 billion in the same period last year, an increase of 86 percent over January-through-September 1979. In September alone Brazil spent $942 million on petroleum, the highest monthly amount so far this year. The lowest was $660 million, recorded in February.

The nation is also spending substantially more on wheat imports this year than last. They cost $703 million from January through September, compared to only $379 million in the first 9 months last year, which represents an increase of 85.5 percent. Imports of other products increased 10.1 percent and, in total, imports increased 37.6 percent from January to September, since they were $12.568 billion during January-to-September 1979.

AEB SEEKS REDUCTION OF DOMESTIC SALES IN FAVOR OF EXPORTS

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 26 Oct 80 p 35

[Text] Given normal market conditions, exports of $20 billion this year are assured, in the opinion of eight businessmen and authorities in the foreign-trade area. But new measures will be needed if the $26 billion goal for 1981 and the $40 billion planned for 1985 are to be reached, according to Laerte Setubal Filho, president of the Brazilian Exporters Association, and such measures should include restriction of domestic consumption through lower installment sales, he says.

IBM do Brasil--Industry, Machinery and Services, Ltd, for example, hopes to export 75 percent more this year, reaching $165 million, compared to the average national expansion of 30 percent. Its president, Robeli Libero, remains optimistic about the foreign market, even when analyzing the possibility of simultaneous inflation and unemployment in the United States and Europe: "The fight against inflation creates new opportunities for data processing, new markets for our products."

Final Effort

Tomorrow the director of CACEX (Foreign Trade Department of the Bank of Brazil), Benedito Moreira; the president of the Center for Foreign Trade Studies Foundation, businessman Pratini de Moraes, and its research superintendent, Roberto Fendt, Jr; and the representative of the Foreign Affairs Ministry, Tarcisio da Rocha, will meet at the Finance Ministry in Rio de Janeiro. They will decide upon the sales strategy for the 10,000 potential importers of Brazilian products to be approached with messages referring to the Brazil Export Fair 80 that will be held from 14 to 23 November in Sao Paulo.

And the president of the Brazilian Association of Trading Companies, Humberto Costa Pinto Jr, mentions that the nation has reserves of sugar, soybeans, agroindustrial products and textiles that assure espansion of foreign sales at an increasing rate through December:

"The goal of $20 billion for this year is assured."

Antonio Carlos Magalhaes, director of Econtrading of the Economic Group, exports coffee from Bahia, lumber, orange juice and refractory material, mainly to Latin America. He also is confident: "We will reach the $20 billion. And to the extent that the coffee being harvested in Bahia gains acceptance in the foreign market, our business will increase even more."

In the South, Carlos Sehbe, director of Alfred Trading Company, sees the better prices obtained by certain products in the domestic market, as in the case of textiles, as a hindrance to exports, but even so he has no doubts about the goals set by the government. Besides advance buying of consumer goods, mainly ready-made articles, provoked by resurgent inflation, Carlos Sehbe fears competition from Asiatic countries such as South Korea, which uses abandoned military barracks to install hundreds of persons employed in the textile industry being paid on an hourly basis without any labor-law protection. "It is our good fortune that their products, although cheap, are of poor quality," he added.

Roberto Carvalho de Castro, vice president of Werco Trade and Industry, Inc, believes Brazil will reach $26 billion of exports next year more easily than the $20 billion goal set for this year. This is because the country is rapidly diversifying its product line and its clientele. "In the area of capital goods, our main business, we are confident of having new exports of equipment for the thermoelectrical and cement industries, at times in association with other countries, such as France, that offer excellent financing and require minimal participation by their manufacturers. India, Pakistan, Iraq, Chile and Venezuela are expanding markets for capital goods industries such as Brown Boveri, with whom we have had more work."

Carlos Geraldo Langoni, president of the Central Bank of Brazil, is another who feels the major demands of the exporters have been met for reaching the goal of $20 billion. "I believe in the capability of the business community," says Langoni, author of the main ideas discussed at the Fourth National Exporters Conference, "and I think we will make it; but I cannot say how large the trade deficit will be, because that will depend upon petroleum purchases."

In the opinion of Roberto Fendt Jr, research superintendent of the Center for Foreign Trade Studies Foundation, by December iron ore and other minerals and sugar will make up for reduced exports of cocoa and soybeans. But in view of problems such as higher wheat prices--Brazil must import $1 billion--he says the trade deficit will be more than $2.5 billion.

"U.S. gross domestic product is no longer falling. That is an important factor. But reports from Europe are that the slowdown has begun. Fortunately, our manufactured exports, which represent about 60 percent of our total, are being diversified with new products and markets. The so-called 'Other Products' in the statistical tables are those growing the fastest," Mr Fendt concluded.

Installment Sales

According to the president of the Brazilian Exporters Association, Laerte Setubal Filho of the Itau/Duratex group, the stagflation shown by the United States and Europe will be ended through the measures being taken by the U.S. military-industrial complex, which is preparing to equip an army of 500,000 men: "They will need everything from aircraft carriers to canned soup. And we can always furnish something. I still believe we will export $20 billion this year, and maybe a little more, and $27 billion in 1981."

GALVEAS PREDICTS 70 PERCENT INFLATION RATE IN 1981

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 30 Oct 80 p 20

[Text] Brasilia--Finance Minister Ernane Galveas yesterday acknowledged as "reasonable objectives" for 1981 rates of 70 percent for the General Price Index (inflation) and 60 percent for the cost of living. These figures, he noted, would be compatible with monetary expansion between 55 and 60 percent which is likely to be projected by authorities for next year.

The finance minister confirmed that, to permit better execution of monetary policy in 1981, the National Monetary Council should discuss before the end of this year reducing subsidies granted for agricultural credit by increasing the monetary correction embodied in the financing, now varying between 40 and 70 percent of the ORTN (Indexed National Treasury Bonds) readjustments.

Difficult Year

Galveas disagreed with the CACEX [Foreign Trade Department] director, Benedito Moreira, who thinks it will not be possible to balance the trade account, whose deficit this year has reached $3 billion, until 1983. According to Galveas, balance will be possible as early as next year, as a result of the government effort to reduce imports, mainly of petroleum, and to increase exports.

Galveas believes 1981 will be a difficult year, "as this year has been difficult for the administration and the monetary authorities." The difficulties of recent months, however, he said, "were not felt by the system as a whole, because there were no major problems for wage earners and business, for example."

Upon being asked whether the trade-deficit problem would not cause the government to work with a more realistic exchange rate next year, Galveas replied that "government policy is to come closer to all the indices," trying to reduce the current gap between monetary and exchange correction and inflation.

Galveas said that the policy of setting limits on credit expansion should be continued next year. In the case of the Bank of Brazil, it will continue the policy of compensating in other areas for excess investments in the agricultural sector.

In regard to raising rates on agricultural credit, the finance minister asserted that "the government already has the policy of ending subsidies to consumption, as in the case of wheat and petroleum, and gradually reducing credit subsidies."

Although the changes must be decided upon by the end of this year, he said they should not jeopardize the coming crop year, "because by the time the changes go into effect everything will have been planted and all contracts will have been signed."

COBEC

The finance minister justified the idea of restricting activity of the Brazilian Warehouses and Trade Company (COBEC) to warehousing, saying that "the network of warehouses that the company now has permits it to concentrate on that activity."

However, Galveas said that nothing prevents the company from operating in the area of commodities, "as it now has a sufficiently large structure for doing this."

DETAILS OF INTEREST IN PURCHASE OF GUNS FROM KOREA

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 19 Oct 80 p 25

[Text] Brasilia--Within the next few days a Brazilian military mission will visit South Korea in order to ascertain whether it would be possible to purchase about 40 155 mm guns manufactured with North American technology. The delegation is headed by military engineer Div Gen Mauricio de Freitas Moraes, chief of the Salvage Directorate of the Ministry of Army's Ordnance Department.

The mission was scheduled to depart on 13 October, according to the presidential authorization published in DIARIO OFICIAL. According to a diplomat, the delay was due more to internal decisions in Korea. The purchase of guns of that caliber has been on the list of imports of ordnance for the Army for nearly a year, and the negotiations will be carried out on the basis of the equilibrium in the trade balance between the two countries, with a deficit of $12.190 million for Korea.

155 mm Howitzer

The 155 mm howitzer is an artillery piece that is not yet manufactured in Brazil, despite its use since World War II, as equipment for the FEB's [Brazilian Expeditionary Force] Fourth Artillery Group. The Army has several units using the 155 gun, and is attempting to buy more.

In this connection, a military mission visited Europe several months ago, to purchase them. However, owing to some unexplained problems, the mission returned without the guns. The preference for the 155 mm guns is due to the fact that their firing precision is 50 times greater than that of the 105 mm howitzer.

Now that the mission headed by Div Gen Mauricio Moraes and comprised of two majors has been appointed, it is possible that the order will be made. South Korea is currently one of the largest manufacturers of ordnance, producing light and heavy weapons with North American technology. A large volume of its production is directed toward the army (mortars, combat vehicles with wheels and treads, missiles, guns, etc.).

The Trade Balance

The trade balance between the two countries has shown an appreciable deficit for South Korea since 1976, except for 1977, when Brazil had a deficit of $3.232 million.

In 1978, Brazil recovered, and attained a surplus of $19.807 million; in 1979, South Korea's deficit amounted to $32.936 million; and, during the first half of 1980, according to CACEX [Foreign Trade Department], Brazil's exports totaled $13.794 million and its imports, $1.604 million, making a surplus of $12.190 million.

Ordnance does not rank among the leading products in the trade balance. This is the first time that either of the two contractors has included weaponry on the negotiating agenda. Brazil has exported: soybean flour, henatite, chemical wood paste, bleached soda and sulfate, pig iron, iron and steel slabs and largets, raw coffee berries, iron and steel blooms and billets, uncarded and uncombed cotton, and a central processing unit.

It has imported: parts for computer machines, natural, smooth polyester continuous fiber, apparatus for measuring electrical volume with single fuse, synthetic fiber fabric for tire manufacture, electronic microstructures, printed circuits, gold or silver finished base metal wrist watches, rustproof, unplated steel alloy sheets measuring less than 3 mm.

THIRD QUARTER ECONOMIC PERFORMANCE EXCEEDS EXPECTATIONS

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 19 Oct 80 pp 46, 47

[Text] The surprising strength of the Brazilian economy in the third quarter completely confounded the pessimistic expectations expressed by most businessmen consulted at the middle of the year, when the business world was completely dominated by a climate of uncertainty due to persistent inflation, the prospect of credit restriction and the poor results of the second quarter.

But once again facts refuted forecasts, with some sectors even recording outstanding results, among them automobiles, where 316,953 vehicles were produced, surpassing all goals of the assembly plants--despite higher prices, credit shortages and higher fuel costs. Also worthy of mention are the performances of the electro-electronic, machinery, retail trade and animal-feed sectors, among others, which not only improved upon the April-June period but also showed results more characteristic of a boom period.

Although the figures of the past quarter cannot be projected as a trend, they seem to indicate that 1980 will not be such a bad year for the Brazilian economy, which could show a growth rate greater than expected, despite coping with restrictive policies such as reductions in state-enterprise expenditures and controlled expansion of the money supply.

Recovery of the durable consumer goods sector resulted from a combination of factors, including the semiannual wage-increase policy and the presence of inflationary expectations simultaneously with the disorder occurring in financial markets (where rates of return were controlled and even penalized by preestablished monetary and exchange correction). Without sufficent incentive for investing their savings, consumers let themselves be persuaded by the grasshopper's slogan of "buy today, because prices will be higher tomorrow."

The background for the economy was the rate of inflation, which continued rising through August but fell in September for the first time, establishing an annual index of 104.4 percent. This genuine victory pleased government officials and businessmen, but the party did not last long, as the war between Iraq and Iran caused a return of panic and the prospect that the nation's petroleum supply may be interrupted. Rather than rationing, authorities chose another increase in prices of gasoline and other derivatives in order to restrict consumption, accelerating the pace of inflation.

Besides inflation, the short-term problems continued to be the trade deficit and the difficult balance-of-payments situation. Through September, the trade deficit was $2.9 billion. Unless there is a recovery before the end of the year, the current account in the balance of payments could have a deficit of over $13 billion.

Discouraged by the barriers raised by CACEX [Foreign Trade Department] to restrict imports and the controls of the CIP [Interministerial Price Council], business sought to avoid expenditures, hiring personnel only when necessary. Employment offers declined more in all categories other than production, which indicates that business has avoided increasing indirect labor, giving preference to those directly involved in production (see graphs).

Automobile Industry

Production: The quarter was excellent for this sector, which recorded an increase of 35.6 percent over the April-June period. There were 316,953 units assembled, surpassing even the result of this year's first quarter, when production totaled 286,973 vehicles. The sales recovery occurred mainly in the months of August and September, when announcement of price increases caused consumers to buy sooner. It is a surprising performance, in view of credit shortages, higher maintenance costs and higher gasoline prices.

The excellent reception of alcohol-fueled vehicles was the great surprise of the quarter, but manufacturers missed this opportunity to increase sales because production of alcohol-powered cars is still quite limited. In the July-September period, 65,081 units of this type were made, including passenger automobiles and light commercial vehicles. The result of this insufficient production has been formation of waiting lists in dealer showrooms (see "Commerce" heading).

The sector's outstanding recovery in the quarter may be threatened by the recent price increases for vehicles and for gasoline, but the manufacturers' marketing directors hope to overcome these problems by supplying a greater number of alcohol-powered cars to the market.

Exports: Including both assembled and knocked-down vehicles, there were 39,532 units sold abroad, compared to 33,947 in the April-June quarter.

Prospects: All companies expect a large increase in demand for alcohol-powered vehicles, but credit difficulties will continue through the end of this year because of the 45-percent limit on credit expansion. Besides, credit institutions have given preference to financing home appliance and other goods of less value, which are more profitable.

Trucks

Production: There were 29,903 units manufactured, compared to 18,044 in the April-June quarter, an expansion of 65.7 percent in the quarter, which was very good for this sector.

Tractors

Production: Preliminary information indicates that the subsector of wheeled tractors still faces difficulties. Production fell in recent months (in September

5,330 units were built, compared to 5,471 in August and 6,909 in July, which was the best month in the last 3 years). Nor is the situation good for harvesters, production of which has been declining this year, despite the manufacture of 537 units and sale of 477 units in September. Lack of financing for purchasing machinery is the main cause for this situation. Production of caterpillar tractors and bulldozers remained stable during the last quarter as compared to the April-June period.

Exports: Sales of wheeled tractors continue to expand (in September 846 units were exported).

Problems: Reduced profit margins resulting from CIP control; delay in imports of components due to slow release of licenses by CACEX; supply difficulties for steel, bearings and sinterized disks.

Prospects: Inasmuch as production of wheeled tradtors was 46,000 units through September (compared to 39,000 the previous year), the sector should close out the year with better results, but inventory accumulation of light and medium-sized tractors (models most in demand by small and medium-sized farmers) by manufacturers and dealers is of concern to the industry.

Electro-Electronics

Production and Sales: According to preliminary estimates, the rate of activity in the January-through-September period had a better overall performance than in the same period of 1979. Total sales of consumer goods, which includes portable electronic gear, household electronic apparatus, air conditioners, stoves and refrigerators--after reaching between January and May 1980 their highest growth rate (31.5 percent) in comparison with the same period of the previous year--in the months of June, July and August 1980 showed cumulative expansion of 30.2 percent, 28.7 percent and 22.7 percent.

However, in cumulative sales performance for the latest 12 months there is a decline in the growth rate which, after reaching an increment of 25.4 percent in June, fell to 23.2 percent in July and 21.1 percent in August.

In the subsector of telecommunications equipment, orders booked through September remained far below production capacity. Moreover, reduction of TELEBRAS [Brazilian Telecommunications, Inc] investments further increased idle capacity, which is now over 50 percent.

Investment cuts, together with delays in scheduled investments and cancellation of current contracts, have been crippling production of equipment for generating, transmitting and distributing electrical energy, with an appreciable reduction of the order backlog. Hence, should this situation persist, production in this segment is likely to show a significant decline in coming months.

Performance for the third quarter of this year in some major segments of the sector, as well as prospects for the fourth quarter can be seen in the table below.

Evaluation of Sales Indicators and Prospects

Exports: Foreign sales have been showing greater growth than in the January-through-September period of 1979. Current prospects indicate that sectoral exports will reach about $800 million by the end of the year, which represents a 40-percent increase over total foreign sales made in 1979 ($570 million).

Problems: Companies of the electro-electronic sector continue to have serious difficulties in obtaining import licenses from CACEX and are subject to strict price control by the CIP, which has reduced profitability. High financing costs and credit problems, especially for small and medium-sized companies, also cause concern. Meanwhile, in the capital goods area, cuts and delays in government investments have been reducing the level of activity.

Slow payment by direct and indirect agencies of public administration has caused an increase in business debt, due to the lack of working capital.

Sectoral exports are suffering from delays in exchange devaluations, which currently are not enough to cover the difference between domestic and foreign inflation. As a result, our heavy electrical equipment is losing ability to compete in international bidding.

Exports are also hampered by difficulties in obtaining import licenses from CACEX, aggravated by Resolution No. 638 of the National Monetary Council. After this resolution was passed, issuing of licenses almost came to a halt, due to lack of official interpretation.

Employment: The number of persons working in the sector increased 5.1 percent over August of last year and 4 percent over December 1979.

Machinery and Equipment

Production: The production machinery goods industry recorded a production increase of 8 percent and a real sales growth of 10 percent.

Exports: Export volume was the same as during the third quarter of 1979.

Favorable Factors: Orders from the agricultural, textile, plastics and minerals extraction sectors, which permitted good results--despite inflation, restricted credit, exchange rate behavior and difficulties in buying domestic and foreign raw materials.

Employment: Total personnel employed in manufacturing production machinery increased about 1 percent during the third quarter over the same period last year.

Prospects: The cooling of the economy imposed by monetary and exchange policy, as well as the reduced rate of activity that usually occurs in the last part of the year, will probably--according to sectoral sources--hamper sectoral performance in the last quarter of this year.

Auto Parts

Production: Several companies of the sector recorded production and sales increases of over 50 percent, surpassing the performance of the final-goods manufacturers. The replacement market also seems to have been good during the quarter.

Exports: Some companies have suffered the consequences of the slowdown in the U.S. auto industry. In one large company, this factor plus an unfavorable dollar/cruzeiro exchange ratio caused a 40 percent drop in exports.

Favorable Factors: The outstanding performance of assembly plants during the quarter.

Problems: Loss of profitability caused by CIP price control; supply crisis in supplies from steel mills, steel scrap, foundry sand and materials in general; insufficient devaluation of the cruzeiro against the dollar.

Prospects: Several companies expect to increase production in the last quarter of this year, whereas others foresee a decrease during the last 3 months of 1980. Should the cruzeiro not be devalued more rapidly, there is a risk of drastically lower exports.

Foundry Work

Production: Available data indicate an increase of 7.5 percent in the June-to-August period over the the preceding 3 months. Foundry parts are made to order, so production is virtually equal to sales. Sources in the sector assume production has been expanding moderately, in view of current conditions of the Brazilian economy.

Problems: The difficulties encountered by companies of the sector were caused by higher prices for the main foundry inputs, including pig iron, scrap iron, nonferrous alloys, ferroalloys, nickel, zircon, coke, fuel oil, diesel fuel and sand. There also were problems in importing raw materials because of high prices.

Prospects: Continued difficulty in passing through costs, with impact on profitability. Fortunately, orders continue to perform reasonably well.

Railroad Equipment

Production: The third quarter was the worst of the year for the freight-car sector. Only 250 units were manufactured, compared to 539 in the April-June period. These production levels may be considered quite unsatisfactory, since capacity is 2,250 cars a quarter. This means that about 76 percent of the industry's capacity is idle. Locomotive production was also very low, although somewhat better than that of the April-June quarter. With a capacity of 55 locomotives per quarter, only 13 were produced, which means that 76 percent of capacity was idle. There was also a decrease in passenger-coach production in the quarter compared to the April-June period, with 68 units produced, although installed capacity is 200 coaches per quarter (65 percent idle).

Exports: Because the two largest buyers--RFFSA [Federal Railway Network] and FEPASA [Sao Paulo Railroad, Inc]--did not place orders this year, the foreign market assumed greater importance. However, preestablishment of exchange-rate correction at less than the rate of inflation influenced exports negatively.

Problems: Due to lack of orders from the railroads, the sector may produce less than 2,000 freight cars. The previous quarter's problem for the passenger-coach sector continues: deliveries are being postponed because of lack of roadbed repairs, which have been delayed due to interruption in the flow of funds. The cars are ready, but the railroads are not able to take delivery due to lack of funding.

Employment and Investment: Personnel layoffs resulted from the slowdown of freight-car production.

Prospects: The announced emphasis on the railroad sector may actually materialize during coming months, due to the Middle East conflict. However, actual results would not appear until 1981, under the best of circumstances. This means that the sector will not change for the better during the next quarter. Quite the contrary.

Food Industry

Production: This sector's diversity makes its performance hard to monitor. The little information available indicates that production continues to be considerably less than demand despite the reduced consumption of beef and dairy products reported during the period, according to some sources consulted. The sector benefited directly from the semiannual wage-increase policy, which increased demand for food from low-income groups.

In the soybean complex, a major firm had a production decrease of 18 percent in meal and 14 percent in oil compared to this year's second quarter. Soybean meal exports decreased 9 percent and soybean exports increased 8 percent.

Availability of raw materials was helpful to the soybean oil industry, but the ceiling prices on it and on soybean meal at levels below international parity caused a reduction in volume of purchases, inasmuch as the price of soybeans kept pace with international market prices, thus raising the cost of production. Besides this problem, higher prices for packaging and other inputs further reduced profit margins in the sector. Price increases granted for soybean oil and soybean meal did not make up for higher costs.

Commerce

Activity: Although definite third quarter data are not available, it appears that retail trade recovered considerably over the previous quarter. This trend could already be seen in July, when sales increased 11.1 percent over those of June in the Sao Paulo metropolitan region, after discounting inflation.

There was thus an accentuation of the sector's main characteristic this year: fluctuating sales, with good results in the first quarter, appreciable reduction in the second quarter and satisfactory performance in the July-September period.

Department stores and construction-materials dealers continued to do well. The department-store results can be attributed to promotional campaigns, simplified credit procedures, product diversification and especially use of their own funds for financing, even for the long term, very important factors in view of prevailing restrictions.

Vehicle dealers also reported reactivation of sales, contributing heavily to favorable trade results in the quarter because of their large share in total retail sales.

This activity's good performance during the quarter was mainly due to advance buying motivated by the announcement of higher prices for vehicles and also the good reception alcohol-powered vehicles have been given, resulting in order backlogs at almost all authorized dealerships.

But continuation of these results will depend directly upon the situation of financial institutions, which are limited in permissible expansion of credit. Financing companies now prefer to work with department stores, construction materials and domestic appliances because, according to their executives, profit from financing vehicles is less than that from transactions involving lower-cost goods such as electrical appliances and furniture.

In any event, it is not known whether the volume of financing available will be sufficient to meet holidat demand at the end of the year.

Investments: Limited credit is also influencing the retailer's investment in end-of-the-year inventory. There is more uncertainty about debt capacity, since in this very period trade is hard put to meet demand, due to a number of commitments that substantially reduce availability.

Supermarket sales increased between 2 and 3 percent after inflation in the third quarter. Wage policy, which increased consumer purchasing power, and the limited attraction of the most popular types of savings, along with high inflation rates, benefited sale of nonfood products. The sector was hurt by the shortage of consumer credit and especially by uncertain economic horizons that inhibited new investments.

Prospects: Caution in building up inventory due to credit restriction and uncertain sales possibilities generated by end-of-the-year holidays.

Truckers Disappointed With 'Superharvest'

Trucking

Activity: As in the previous quarter, the highway freight fleet continued to be used to full capacity. The freight market remained at about the same level, as the expected excess demand for crop transportation did not materialize. Billing increased an estimated 6 percent over the second quarter.

Problems: A 63 percent increase in operating costs between January and September. This is the sector's major problem, due to the lag between verification of such increases and adjustment of freight rates. Despite this difficulty, highway transportation accounts for 80 percent of the nation's total freight shipments.

Employment and Investment: In the last quarter employment increased 1 percent and investments were unchanged.

Prospects: Increased shipping demand due to end-of-the-year holidays. However, the sector's businessmen expect lowered profitability because of expenses such as the 13th-month wage and other factors (including lack of liquidity due to restricted banking credit, which will hamper receipt of revenues).

The sector is quite uncertain about planning investments, due to fuel problems. The progressive increase of diesel-fuel prices affects all other component items of operating costs. Government agencies have not yet made a decision about replacing diesel fuel, the price increases for which require the companies to have more working capital inasmuch as this input must be paid for with cash.

Advertising

Activity: The sector's behavior in the third quarter was not much different from that of the second. Advertising expenditures did not increase as much as inflation, whereas agency operating costs continued under inflationary pressure. Some agencies, however, have managed to maintain billings within forecasts due to obtaining new accounts. In the aggregate, however, there was a real [inflation-corrected] drop in publicity expenditures.

Favorable Factors or Problems: The picture remains the same: advertisers' indecisiveness, very short-run campaigns and slow payment. In view of these problems, the agencies have not been able to make adequate arrangements or to organize their cash flows. This situation reduces income from financial transactions, the current source of agency profits.

Thus, most agencies face uncertainty, impossibility of making reliable plans and disproportionate increase of operating costs, which have required an effort to reduce expenditures.

Employment: There is a clear trend of unemployment in the sector.

Prospects: The last quarter is always benefited by Christmas buying, which should bring some encouragement to the advertising business without, however, altering the fundamental situation.

Real Estate Market

Production: Available information about new units under construction, finished units and used real estate for sale continues to be deficient. Sector sources say that real estate construction continued to expand. Sales also increased over the previous quarter.

Favorable Factors: Inflation greater than monetary correction; production less than the market's real needs; government measures to discourage financial speculation; apparently lower inventories; and previously-repressed demand.

Employment and Investment: Employment in the real estate sector continued to expand. There were no manpower (bricklayers and hod carriers) shortages only because the public works sector has not been growing satisfactorily, freeing labor for the real estate sector. Investments appear to have increased during the quarter.

Prospects: Prospects for the October-December period tend to be the same as or worse than those of the past quarter, depending upon resources to be allocated for the sector and upon the rate of inflation. According to the manager of a large firm in the sector: "We already see a lack of middle-class purchasing power. However, construction should continue to increase because there are investors in the market who are not satisfied with the income from various financial investments. On the other hand, frequent increases in costs and prices will prevent access for many would-be home owners. It is felt that the end of the year will mark the transition from a period of exacerbated demand to one of a more normal real estate market."

Banks

Activity: Demand deposits increased 5.1 percent in July, 2.5 percent in August and 4.5 percent in September. For the entire third quarter, expansion was only 1.6 percent, a small change in relation to the same period last year, when demand deposits increased 9.3 percent.

Total loans by commercial banks increased 11 percent in the July-September period, compared to 17.8 percent in the previous quarter. Loans subject to the 45 percent limitation decreased 2 percent in July and increased 1.7 percent in August. During the same months, loans not subject to the 45 percent limitation increased 7.8 percent and 5.5 percent, respectively.

Liquidity: In terms of average liquidity performance, the third quarter was the worst of the year. Liquidity borrowing was at its peak in September.

Interest Rates: Remained unchanged during the quarter as a consequence of Circular No. 458 of the Central Bank dated 6 September 1979, which established the maximum rate for various kinds of transactions. However, the over-the-counter money market flourished during the period, with borrowing rates of 71 to 75 percent and lending rates of up to 15 percent a month, according to a study by the Banking Association.

Nonetheless, according to business sources, despite the existing limit on interest rates, several commercial banks found ways to charge higher real rates by requiring compensating balances of as much as 50 percent. In other words, for a loan of 100,000 cruzeiros, some banks would have required an average account balance of up to 50,000 cruzeiros.

Animal Rations

Production: The sector of rations and concentrates had a production increase of about 11 percent in the quarter due to large investments in poultry raising, with hundreds of new coops in areas where poultry raising is completely integrated, as is the case in the states of Santa Catarina and Rio Grande do Sul. Expanded exports of chickens to the Middle East and Argentina also stimulated the rations sector.

Exports: The sector had been exporting in an experimental way, as this year (the first in which foreign sales became possible) some opportunities arose, but CACEX decided to suspend such sales when restrictions were established on exports of soybean meal, the domestic price of which is less than the foreign price, so that sales on the international market would represent a transfer of advantages created by the government for the domestic consumer. A similar thing happens with imported corn, bought by the government at international prices and sold domestically at the lower price of the domestic market. Thus, exporting chickens is perhaps the best way for rations to be exported indirectly.

Favorable Factors: Soybean-meal quotas and corn imports. Businessmen of the sector believe the quotas will remain until 1981 in order to adjust the market, under pressure from higher prices abroad.

Employment and Investment: Full employment is a reality, mainly in the regions where new investments are being made, located in southern Goias, Mato Grosso do Sul, the Minas Triangle, the Sao Paulo "mogiana" [translation unknown] zone and Parana, which are the corn-producing regions. Growth of the rations sector in this area is considered irreversible, for sound reasons. New investments for raising poultry and hogs should also gravitate to such regions.

Prospects: The greatest concern for the last quarter of the year is the war in the Middle East, where more than 80 percent of the nation's chicken exports are shipped. Should the Persian Gulf ports be closed, the frozen chickens now refrigerated in Brazilian ports will have to be sold on the domestic market at competitive prices, threatening the normal market for frozen chickens, which is unstable and growing timidly, due to the habits of consumers, who are not consuming more poultry despite the high prices of beef.

Animal Protectants

Production and Sales: Despite the buying mood of the market, the constant shortage of raw materials for producing crop and livestock inputs has occasioned a shortage of many essential products. These shortages are caused by the intentional slowdown by CACEX in issuing import licenses. Its "Operation Turtle," besides causing enormous delays in production, also results in order cancellations due to the higher prices usually charged for such raw materials abroad during the period the license is being held up.

Another limiting factor was withholding of several medicines from the market due to unwillingness to sell at the prices set by the CIP. The frequent price rises of imported raw materials and the high cost of selling and shipping, which are not supervised by the CIP, forced companies to remove several items from their product line, most of them very important from the viewpoint of protecting animal health.

Exports: The sector exports little, due to the problems mentioned above and the fact that domestic production is often insufficient to meet domestic demand.

Favorable Factors: The emphasis the government has been giving to the agriculture and livestock sectors and the greater interest of businessmen in livestock.

Problems: Businessmen of the sector have asked the CIP for treatment different from that given pharmaceuticals for human use, but the delay caused by making studies of the situation is causing important vaccines and medicines to be withheld from the market.

Prospects: During the October-December period the shortage of many products and reduction of sales to some sectors, including poultry, will continue. Increases in sales of products for hogs and instability in products for cattle are also expected.

Paper and Cellulose

Production: There were 877,797 tons of paper produced in the third quarter, an increase of 4.6 percent over the April-June period. Domestic sales increased 4.7 percent and foreign sales, 1.2 percent, reaching 693,672 and 42,580 tons respectively. Production of cellulose totaled 775,918 tons, 7.7 percent more than in the preceding quarter. There were 229,464 tons of cellulose exported, 1 percent less than in the preceding quarter.

Employment: The number of employees in the sector increased from 71,899 in June to 74,642 in September.

Favorable Factors: Domestic and foreign markets are buying.

Problems: Limited supply and high cost of fuel oil; shortage of cellulose for non-integrated paper mills; rigid price control by the CIP, which established increases less than the rise in cost of inputs.

Prospects: Continued demand in domestic and foreign markets; gradual replacement of fuel oil and diminished problems of cellulose shortage due to the announced "privatization" of RIOCELL.

"Quarterly Economic News" is a survey made by the Economics and Business Section of O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in collaboration with businessmen, trade associations and professional groups. Essentially, it is an attempt to get an advance view of the economy's performance, based upon information provided by the private sector. Some figures are preliminary, but they are acceptable indications. We are grateful to everyone who assisted in this effort.

BRIEFS

DEVALUATION OF CRUZEIRO--Brasilia--Yesterday, the cruzeiro became devaluated again with respect to the dollar, this time, by 2.256 percent, the largest exchange devaluation this year, as part of the policy of mini-devaluations which, to date, have not exceeded the index of 2 percent. Also unlike the previous intervals (14 to 16 days), this decline occurred 13 days after the last mini-devaluation, on 8 October. Thus, the North American dollar will be bought, at the official exchange rate throughout the entire country, for 59.595 cruzeiros, and sold for 59.795 cruzeiros, in the 17th devaluation of the cruzeiro in 1980, raising the cumulative index since 31 December 1979 to 40.787 percent. The margin of variation in exchange that the monetary authorities still have, to keep the variation in the North American dollar within their forecasts for this year (50 percent), has now reached 3.133 percent; and it is agreed that the possibility of a maxi-devaluation has been precluded. ENGESA 1980 EXPORTS--Brasilia--Jose Luiz Whitaker Ribeiro, president of ENGESA [Specialized Engineers, Inc] announced yesterday at Army Headquarters that the Brazilian armaments industry will export about $300 million this year and intends to have annual exports of $1.5 billion by the end of the decade. Whitaker said the performance of Brazilian ordnance in the Persian Gulf war will contribute to raising the nation's exports. In his first interview since returning from Iraq, he further pointed out that the Brazilian armaments industry was the only one to remain in that country after the Persian Gulf war broke out. "We manufacture five combat vehicles a month," the businessman added, "and we are definitely in a position to compete in the international arms market." He said that manufacture of the 155-mm gun may begin within 1 year, which will transform Brazil from an importer to an exporter of military hardware. ENGESA now has capacity to produce sixty 90-mm guns per month and one of the company's objectives is to produce other types of guns to strengthen its position in the international market. STEEL PRODUCTION UP 8%--Brasilia--Steel production by the seven government-owned mills was 7.8 million tons from January to October of this year, representing an 8 percent increase over the same period last year, when a littles less than 7.2 million tons were produced. Through October the SIDERBRAS [Brazilian Iron and Steel Corporation] subsidiaries achieved 82.1 percent of their production goal for this year, which is 9.5 million tons. Last year 8.71 million tons were produced. The presidents of the three largest iron and steel companies of the SIDERBRAS system (COSIPA [Sao Paulo Iron and Steel Company], USIMINAS [Minas Gerais Iron and Steel Mills, Inc] and National Iron and Steel Company) will meet today with Industry and Commerce Minister Camilo Penna to discuss steel prices. According to SIDERBRAS, steel is sold in Brazil at a price that averages 50 percent less than that charged in other producing countries. These prices would also aggravate the situation of the Sao Paulo Iron and Steel Company (COSIPA), whose operating deficit already amounts to 2.2 billion cruzeiros. REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT FROM 1974-1978 SURVEYED

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 26 Oct 80 pp D-6, D-7

[Text] There has been a growing concern in recent years over the development of regions, both for their own sake and the sake of the nation. Comparisons of regions are always interesting even though difficult to make because of the lack of adequate and timely statistical information.

EL MERCURIO has made such an effort for the purpose of taking a quantitative look at the relative development of the regions. Despite the limitations inherent in this type of work, it is possible to obtain a general view of the trend that emerged between 1974 and 1978.

The idea was to establish a ranking based on the economic and social progress of the regions. For this purpose, seven indicators were chosen because they were deemed to be representative of the following aspects:

Economic development: The per capita regional product was taken and assigned 40 percent of the total figure.

Social development: The three indicators used are the infant mortality rate, the number of housing units per inhabitant and the trend of school enrollments. Each of these indicaters was assigned 13 percent of the total figure in an attempt to give approximately the same importance to economic and social development.

Other indicators: The number of motor vehicles was taken as representative of the level of consumption, investment in public works as a reflection of the development of the infrastructure and per capita deposits as representative of the financial development of the regions.

Final Ranking

With respect to each of the aforementioned variables, the regions were ranked, with first place going to the area that had the greatest progress, and so on, until all 13 were placed. The last region had made the lease progress.

By using the seven partial rankings and assigning them the relative importance previously mentioned, a final order was established concluding that the greatest progress, based on these indicators, was in Region 2, while the least progress noted was in Region 1.

The per capita product [following table] is a rather revealing indicator of the economic activity of regions. While on the national level, the per capita product dropped from 2.48 to 2.46 pesos between 1974 and 1978, most of the regions had increases. The exceptions were regions 2, 5, 12 and the metropolitan region. The figures are expressed in 1965 pesos, which until a short time ago were normally used in national accounting. By way of reference, a 1965 peso is equal to approximately 21,000 at present. The region with the greatest increase was Region 7 (22.7 percent), which went from 1.87 pesos per person in 1974 to 1.93 in 1978. In addition, the region whose product dropped the most was Region 1. In 1974, it amounted to 3.73 pesos per person and by 1978, the figure had dropped to 3 pesos, which is equivalent to a reduction of 19.5 percent.

In 1974, 63 out of every 1,000 babies born in Chile died before they were a year old. By 1978, that rate had dropped to only 39. On the regional level, the greatest progress was registered in Region 7, which reduced its infant mortality by half during the period analyzed. In 1974, the region with the highest infant mortality rate was Region 9 (100 out of every 1,000 live births), while the metropolitan region had the lowest rate (42.3 per 1,000). In 1978, the metropolitan region continued to exhibit the lowest infant mortality rate (25.5 per 1,000), but the most negative figure corresponded to Region 11.

Between 1974 and 1978, the reduction in the number of housing units per 1,000 inhabitants affected all regions without exception. The drop was mainly explained by the fact that the construction sector was depressed during that period as a result of the restructuration dictated by the new policy. However, these figures do not show the revitalization that has occurred in the last year and a half. Between 1974 and 1978, the regions least affected were 6 and 12, while 1 and 3 and the metropolitan region had the highest percentages of deterioration in the housing situation. The national average shows that in 1974, there were 151.6 units for every 1,000 inhabitants, while in 1978, the figure had dropped to 137.5.

In absolute terms, school enrollment [table next page] rose in most regions. The exceptions were 4, 7, 8 and 10. The largest increases are seen in 1 and 2, where the number of students enrolled rose by 6 and 5.8 percent respectively. The region with the sharpest drop is 10, which went from 252,536 to 240,393 pupils in school. With respect to school enrollment for the nation as a whole, in 1974 there were 3,042,[illegible] children in school and in 1978, 3,078,183. It should be noted that the relatively low increase in the total enrollment is mainly explained by a drop in the number of school-age children. This is a reflection of the reduction in the population growth rate in recent years.

Regarding the infrastructure, the only region that shows an increase in per capita investment is Region 7. In that region, 366 million pesos were invested in 1974, which figure rose to 436 million pesos in 1978. Both amounts are expressed in currency of the same value. Region 12 had an increase in absolute terms, but when one compares the number of inhabitants, one finds a drop of .6 percent between 1974 and 1978. Investments in infrastructure dropped sharply throughout the period analyzed because of restrictions imposed by the Economic Recovery Plan. However, the regions most affected in relative terms were 4, 5, 6, 8 and the metropolitan area, regions in which the drop was greater than the national average.

1. Number of Motor Vehicles for Every 1,000 Inhabitants
2. Source: Drafted by EL MERCURIO using INE figures

The growth in the number of vehicles, from 446,708 in 1974 to 589,788 units in 1978, constitutes an important advance with respect to regional development. It should be pointed out that the reduction in tariffs on imported vehicles was later, which means that the figures for the last year and a half would be far higher to those registered up to 1978. Regions 1 and 12, by virtue of the free zone system they enjoy, have more vehicles per capita than the other areas. In addition, they have the highest vehicle growth rate throughout the period (73.8 and 62.1 percent respectively). After them come the neighboring regions, with increases of 33.2 percent in Region 2 and 53.9 percent in 11. For its part, the metropolitan region experienced the least growth (9.4 percent) in the number of vehicles per person from 1974 to 1978.

During the period being analyzed, the level of deposits for every 1,000 inhabitants [table next page] showed a real increase of some 128 percent. The greatest growth was without a doubt the metropolitan region, where most of the country's financial activity is concentrated. But the development of the capital market has also extended to the remaining regions. In Region 12, deposits increased from an average of 5.1 million pesos for every 1,000 inhabitants to 12 million between 1974 and 1978. This represents an increase on the order of 135.3 percent in real terms, very similar to that of the metropolitan region.

PMD LEADER DISCUSSES PARTY, POLITICAL, ELECTION SITUATION

San Jose LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 22 Oct 80 p 11

[Interview with National Democratic Party (PND) President Rodolfo Cerdas Cruz, by Wilmer Murillo in the column "Political Wednesdays in the Republic"; date and place not given]

[Text] Rodolfo Cerdas Cruz has just taken office as president of the National Democratic Party, replacing . . . Rodolfo Cerdas Cruz as president of the Popular Front.

Although the unwarned observer might be tempted to think that this is a simple change of premise, its leaders believe that the new party should be given credit for being born at a time when the country is experiencing difficult circumstances.

Indeed the country is experiencing a crisis which is not only political, but which affects the economy, the state machinery, and practically all aspects of daily life as well. The government of President Carazo is faced with a serious economic crisis marked with a few victories and many failures. The conflict between the executive branch and the Legislative Assembly has succeeded in muddying the political atmosphere still further at a time when a fertile and constructive dialog is needed in order to resolve some of the most serious problems affecting and plaguing the economy and society.

Within this framework, according to Rodolfo Cerdas, the National Democratic Party is not only taking shape as an undertaking to go beyond the Popular Front, but as "a takeover in the national command which is already beginning." In other words the new generations are taking over the government.

In his opinion the crisis the country is experiencing has come to require the disappearance of the traditional parties and politicians who continue to skirmish over outdated topics which impress no one.

And while the "veterans" continue with their concerns, the National Democratic Party has been created to launch a new stage, and to pose different questions with different possibilities.

In the following interview, Rodolfo Cerdas provides the readers of LA REPUBLICA with answers to some of the questions about the national political situation.

[Question] A short time ago you represented the Popular Front, the left wing with a cachet, as you called it. What is the difference between the Popular Front and the National Democratic Party?

[Answer] The National Democratic Party is, from the point of view of its national organization, a step beyond the traditional political and ideological formations, and it is also clearly a step beyond the Popular Front. The National Democratic Party believes that what is needed here is a further national synthesis integrating the various legitimate claims of national society in a political project, with a view to placing Costa Rica on a new level of development, in terms of political democracy, personal freedom, socioeconomic organization and cultural physiognomy. The PND thus represents the crucible from which the new Costa Rica needed so that we can survive in the 21st century with our own historic destiny and configuration in a political, social and cultural sense.

[Question] It has been said in recent days that those who speak of the delicate situation of the country are adopting a melodramatic view. Do you really believe that we are reaching the boundary of "each man for himself"?

[Answer] We are certainly experiencing a serious crisis, which I myself have been pointing out for a long time. But we should not panic. Scare tactics in politics are as evil as spitefulness. There is still time. It is possible to introduce substantive changes, not only in the budget, as you can clearly see has been done since 1978, but in many other basic aspects. We must all contribute to spare Costa Rica greater evils. But there is time. Only it is necessary to make use of it. Scare tactics are bad because they are associated with miracles. Thus it is hoped that with a single project, for example the transoceanic oil pipeline, the budget or free zones, all the problems will be resolved. And it is forgotten that the real solution lies in constant, productive and serious work over a long period of time by all of Costa Rican society. In this sense, the crisis benefits no one, because it harms Costa Rica.

[Question] Does your appearance as president of the new group presage your future candidacy for the presidency in 1982, as a product of this crisis?

[Answer] I believe that we must convert this crisis into a source of democratic energy, to promote a new social pact. For this it may indeed be important for me to have been given the chance to be president of the executive committee. But the matter of candidacy is different. What in our view represents the first stage, organization, ideological and program clarification in the light of the reality of Costa Rica, is the last stage, generally, in the role of the traditional party. What is first for them--candidacy--comes second for us. For this reason we are a magnet for the excellent individuals in the traditional groups who still have faith that profound changes can be achieved there, and when electioneerism prevents them from changing anything, they will come to join us, as they are already doing.

[Question] There is talk on all sides of the need for dialog in order to deal with the country's problems. To what do you attribute the lack of capacity seen in the country to form groups with sufficient authority to attack the crisis?

[Answer] Costa Rica can be unified by example. If we continue to conceive of politics as we have to date, the country will disintegrate. This is not a problem of electoral coalitions, power quotas, family associations or how to spend the millions of the public debt. The problem is to unite Costa Rica against any politician, group or sector who wants to subordinate the interests of our country, as a nation seeking its autonomous, increasingly self-sustained development, with its own international profile, to its private or group or party interests. The leadership crisis allows this, because nothing remains but a disappearing tale of the "caudillo" phenomenon.

[Question] Do you see a desire on the part of the executive branch for irritation instead of pacification in its relations with the congress? Or do you feel that there is a lack of political capacity on the part of the two branches to reach understanding for the good of the country?

[Answer] It seems to me that the relations between the executive branch and the legislative assembly are living testimony of what should not be done. Above all if, as it has seemed recently, there is a deliberate effort by the executive branch to use its tensions with the legislative assembly to justify its internal lack of coordination, its inconsistency with its faction, the very lack of unity among its deputies, in a word to obtain, by means of conflict, a certain cohesion which the postponed political debt was unable to achieve. The Legislative Assembly bears an important portion of the blame, above all because of certain attitudes in the past which have begun to be corrected. But in recent times, the executive branch has taken on all the responsibility, even beyond its own faction, and what is worse, it seems proud of it.

[Question] In the Unity coalition, the PUP seems to have become a bomb ready to go off. Do you believe that Jose Hine Garcia will be the detonator causing Unity to explode?

[Answer] Hine Garcia cannot be, because Cristian Tattenbach Yglesias is his only strength. And until the latter reaches one of those broad political definitions which occur from time to time, certainly with increasing frequency, I would hope with regard to the budget, I do not believe that Don Jose has any tool of pressure in hand other than moral.

[Question] How would you describe the current situation in the official Unity coalition?

[Answer] Apparently, since the matter of the cash debt and the reform of the electoral code, there is an ever-greater tendency in the Unity to let the scandal pass and hope things will remain the same. The only thing is that there are some who imagine that that power will be theirs, but they will be surprised, because obviously the only one who knows how to see to his interests is Rafael Angel Calderon. The power in the Unity, while it continues to exist as such, lies there.

[Question] How do you view the reconciliation of Barzuna and Echandi? Do you believe that Don Mario will come out in favor of this whole machination?

[Answer] In my view, Don Mario Echandi is acting very wisely in opening his arms to Don Miguel Barzuna, above all if the latter sets aside his presidential aspirations, to date unjustified, not for personal but political reasons. Someone has to aid Don Miguel to abandon this pseudocandidacy of his, which is only harming him.

As you know, Don Mario will attempt to profit not only from this machination, but of everything these politicians in crisis have provided, believing that the problem was to retain power in 1978 and nothing else. And, along with Don Mario, many others as well.

But life has revealed that Costa Rica, here and now, does not need only candidates, but a human, technical and moral team politically capable of saving the country. This country is tired of the brilliant flashes of politics which like fireworks shine brightest when they are just about to fade away. This is the time to measure patriotic quality, and not will-o-the-wisps. Don Mario himself shines, there is no doubt. And, naturally, some of his friends as well. But I repeat that the problem is complex, because the task is to put in command a real team to take over the management of public affairs in Costa Rica.

COMMENTARY NOTES REASONS FOR VOTER ABSTENTION IN U.S. ELECTIONS

FL081928 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 8 Nov 80

[Revolutionary Armed Forces and Interior Ministry Combatants Political Information Program Commentary]

[Text] Almost one-half of the U.S. electorate did not vote in the presidential elections held on 4 November. The exact figure of the electorate that did not vote is 47.1 percent or a total of 76 million of U.S. citizens of voting age out of the 160.5 million that should have voted.

According to the statistics, the people's participation in this year's elections was less than in the 1976 elections. At that time, 53.07 percent voted while only 52.9 percent voted this year. But there is more. The abstention of the U.S. people has been growing over four consecutive elections and this time it was the lowest level of participation over the past 32 years.

What is happening in the United States? Why is it that the number of citizens who do not want to vote is becoming increasingly larger? Of course, this is of no interest or concern to the U.S. presidential candidates who lead the traditional parties.

With the investment of millions of dollars in publicity and electoral campaigns and with the backing of the big financial and power circles, which really rule in the United States, it is possible for a person to reach the presidency even if the people do not want him as president.

There is nothing flattering for a country or for a political leader to have almost 50 percent of the people with the right to vote not go to the polls. This reflects discontent and, above all, mistrust.

Naturally, the efforts of the U.S. political leaders serve to sow this seed with the passage of each administration be it Democrat or Republican. All presidents make promises, predictions and pledges to take action for the well-being of the nation and the people. And later, when they are in the White House, they forget their promises and do not keep them.

We are not referring only to Carter who in 4 years was unable to sensibly and consistently tackle the internal and external problems. It is an ill that has been prevailing in the United States for a long time due to political ignorance and to the contradictions and decadence of the system itself. Look at the past two decades. Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, Ford and now Carter have been in the presidency and the problems are the same and increasingly worse--economic crisis, high cost of living, inflation and a growing waste of capital for arms build-up and war purposes.

Unemployment affects 8 million people in the United States. Blacks, Indians and other national ethnic groups as well as millions of Latin Americans who have emigrated to the United States continue to be the disadvantaged and humiliated amid a system that discriminates against them racially and socially.

Military budgets increase annually and appropriations for the social sectors are reduced. The U.S. economy is suffering the hardest blows of a crisis in recent times and there are no encouraging prospects for the common citizen.

The people's abstention in the elections is not disassociated from this situation. The people's disappointment and mistrust in their rulers prevails. There are increasingly more people who do not believe the electoral promises and feel that it makes no difference whether a president is more or less capable, negligent or ignorant. Little by little, the understanding increases that the ones who rule in the country are the big financial consortiums. The monopolies and, to a greater extent, the military industrial complex push the nation on a bellicose and dangerous path.

It is no coincidence that almost one-half of the U.S. electorate did not vote. The years pass, governments pass and people's hopes wane. The problems, including vital ones, are not solved and instead they become increasingly worse. There are more than enough reasons for U.S. citizens to believe that it is useless to vote regardless of who the candidates are.

VARIOUS REPORTS ON INTERNATIONALISTS IN ANGOLA

More Construction Workers

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 16 Oct 80 p 5

[Article by Jose Gabriel Guma, special GRANMA correspondent]

[Text] Luanda, 14 Oct--More than 1,000 new Cuban construction workers will arrive in Angola during the current quarter to join the contingent of internationalist laborers engaged in building major projects in different areas of this African sister nation.

News of their arrival was given out by Levi Farah, Cuban government minister in charge of construction abroad [minister president of the State Committee for Construction]. He spoke on the occasion of a meeting with approximately 2,000 of the workers hired by the Cuban enterprise for construction in Angola.

Concluding the meeting, Angolan Construction Minister Manuel Mangueira emphasized the speed with which the building program is going forward and its high quality. At the same time, he insisted that Angola and Cuba will always be united.

Rafael Francia Mestre, a member of the Central Committee of the Cuban Communist Party and Cuba's ambassador to Angola presided over the event. Also in attendance were Omar Mirabal, first secretary of our party in the RPA [People's Republic of Angola], and Arnaldo Diaz, director of the Cuban Construction Enterprise.

Levi Farah mentioned the progress made recently in Angolan building, adding that the checking and aid which were offered made it possible to detect shortcomings and find solutions for their rapid elimination.

In connection with the linkage between an increasing number of builders and their projects, he stressed the positive results being obtained by this means and announced that it is planned to adopt this system in other countries in which Cuba has undertaken construction commitments.

The Cuban minister drew attention to the need for continued improvement of the construction workers' living conditions abroad and confirmed that they have on hand all the material required for the current year's plan.

He likewise indicated that a part of the Cuban personnel to be assigned to the program of cooperation with the Angolan Construction Ministry has begun to arrive in Luanda. When they are all here, there will be some 700 specialists.

Also, the minister praised the speed up in the timetables for completing the construction projects visited over the past few days and noted that the Angolans had expressed their gratitude for the quality and speed of the work.

While emphasizing the necessity for maintaining increasing labor productivity as the basic tenet, together with a reduction of production costs and the improvement of quality, Levi Farah also referred to the importance of incorporating new techniques to ensure increasingly positive results.

He likewise cited the immense significance of voluntary labor and noted that Cuban construction workers in Angola who accumulate 50 hours under this rule between 8 October and 7 December will be eligible for Bronze Titan certificates.

He declared that negotiations are now being held with the Angolans in connection with the 1981 plan, which will include, among other projects, the paving of Luanda port, for which a contract has already been signed. The development of Angola's major port has been given high priority by President Eduardo dos Santos. The basic part of the work will be completed within 15 months. Its enlargement includes warehouse areas for loading and unloading, as well as other activities, and represents a total of 100,000 square meters of paving.

Protocol Signed

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 17 Oct 80 p 5

[Text] Luanda, 16 Oct--Levi Farah, Cuban minister for construction abroad, left today on his way back to Cuba after a 10-day official visit to the People's Republic of Angola where he signed a new protocol with this country which was also signed by Angolan Construction Minister Manuel Mangueira.

Farah said that during his stay in Angola, and particularly during his talks with President Jose Eduardo dos Santos, he had been able to observe the reciprocal affection and warmth of the two peoples and the identity of criteria of both governments.

In the protocol, Cuba and Angola pledge to sign a contract for paving the port of Luanda, the country's major port, a program granted high priority by Angola's president. The port project includes warehouse areas for loading and unloading and is scheduled for completion in 15 months.

In addition, the document foresees contracts for the building of 2,000 housing units by the Cuban E-15 prefab system in different parts of Luanda.

The Cuban representatives agreed to study as soon as possible Angola's plan to construct an additional 1,700 housing units of a similar type, to be located in different Angolan provinces.

The pact likewise establishes certain preliminaries for the building of a tile factory at Huila, a stone quarry at Bie and a ceramics plant in Luanda.

Water Projects

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 17 Oct 80 p 5

[Article by Jose Gabriel Guma, GRANMA special correspondent]

[Text] Luanda--The projects on which Cuban and Angolan labor are working to double the capacity of the aqueduct supplying this capital were inspected by Angolan Minister of Construction Manuel Mangueira and Levi Farah, Cuban Government minister in charge of construction abroad.

Rafael Francia Mestre, Cuban ambassador to Angola and a member of the Cuban Communist Party Central Committee, and Arnaldo Diaz, director of the Cuban Construction Enterprise in Angola, also visited the construction sites.

At a place called Kinfangondo, some 30 kilometers northeast of Luanda, a brigade of the 3rd group of engineering projects of the aforementioned Cuban enterprise is speeding up the public works construction of a catch basin and filter. Both these major buildings goals should be completed by 30 November to salute the First MPLA-Angolan Workers Party Congress and the Second Cuban Communist Party Congress.

Meanwhile, an Angolan brigade is engaged in the construction of other similar projects. At present, the aqueduct provides 70,000 cubic meters of water every 24 hours, and once the capacity is increased, this total will rise to 140,000 cubic meters.

The internationalist Cuban workers, many of who joined the construction force through the microbrigades mobilized in Alamar and other parts of the island, started work at Kinfangondo on 5 August. They have now prolonged their working hours both in the early morning and in the evening, so as to be able to complete the schedule ahead of time, according to information provided by Rene Rodriguez, chief of the brigade and head of the Trinidad Alfonso project, who is a 50 year veteran of public building programs.

The Cuban work in expansion of the aqueduct is progressing rapidly and is of high quality, according to a statement by Engr Mario Rui de Andrade, director of engineering projects in the Angolan Construction Ministry (MICONS), at a recent meeting of the workers of group 3.

Speaking to Cuban reporters, Jose Joaquin Ferrer, a veteran Portuguese builder, who is head of the technical sector of the Angolan brigade, and Heignien Brun, of the French Degremont company, which will be responsible for assembling the technical equipment for the expansion of the aqueduct, expressed similar views.

In addition to expanding the aqueduct's capacity, group 3 is executing other public works in the water distribution centers of Palanca and Mulemba, both in Luanda, and the cold storage facility at Dinaprope. The group, with its 469 workers under the leadership of Humberto Rodriguez, completed work on the 1980 technical-economic plan 81 days ahead of schedule.

ROLE OF PARALLEL MARKET IN PLANNED ECONOMY EXPLAINED

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 14, 15, 16, 18 Oct 80

[Article by Jose Norniella: "The Parallel Market: Work and Only Work Is the Source and Basis of Consumption"]

[Text] The matter of the parallel market or market of differentiated prices, which is steadily gaining in strength, gives rise to many commentaries addressed to us. First of all, we can say that the parallel market is an economic instrument in the sphere of the circulation of goods based on the free sale of consumer products but at higher prices than those set for the same products within the system of rationing.

Our Economic Management and Planning System is based on the objective economic laws that work during the phase of the construction of socialism. This set of laws takes into consideration the existence of the law of value and the mercantile-monetary relations existing in our society, but with a new content in order to respond to a historic economic need until the achievement of communism.

In accordance with this historical circumstance, the Economic Management and Planning System supports the development of the parallel market in order to achieve the full operation of the law of socialist distribution on the basis of the application of the principle "From each according to his ability; to each according to his work."

Following this principle of distribution under socialism ensures personal material interest through work and furthers greater incorporation into labor activities. At the same time, it helps improve the productivity of work and the production of articles of better quality in wider varieties, an important factor in eliminating rationing.

The parallel market is an economic necessity in this phase of the building of socialism. That is why it is necessary for everyone to know what the parallel market is and why it is emerging. The explanation is neither brief nor simple, but it is indispensable.

In order to understand the causes giving rise to the emergence and development of the parallel market or market of differentiated prices, we must first of all clarify certain aspects relating to the law of distribution based on work.

Every mode of production has its own system of distribution whose relationships are subordinate to the form of ownership of the means of production. Distribution is a moment in the productive process that links production to consumption, without this implying that it plays a passive role in the development of production. On the contrary, it exercises a very active and direct influence on production and both affect one another.

In socialism, the distribution of consumer goods and services among members of society takes place in two ways: based on the quality and quantity of work and through social funds of consumption.

Distribution based on work is an objective economic law of socialism. It is based on the fact that the means of production belong to society, which uses them in a planned fashion in order to produce and meet the people's needs better and better. This form of socialist distribution is indispensable during the first phase of communist society for two fundamental reasons:

1) because the level of development achieved by the productive forces is still low and production is inadequate, for the time being, for offering the possibility of abundant goods. In other words, it is not possible to meet all the needs of the people fully and consequently, a system of distribution is imposed that takes the contribution of every individual to society into account.

2) because under socialism, work has not yet become the first vital need of the individual, as will occur under communism.

These reasons explain why distribution based on work becomes an objective law of socialism that acts as an effective economic mechanism for stimulating the worker to work up to his maximum capacity and improve his productivity. The wage, based on the quantity and quality of work, is the most important material incentive that encourages the worker to constantly improve his productivity and production. In this way, man will gradually see that work is the only natural way to meet all his needs.

Distribution based on work is therefore the highest achievement of socialism because it means the true equality of man before the means of production, inasmuch as the principle that work and only work is the source and basis of consumption applies to everyone. Socialism cannot bestow total equality for all. It does provide equality with respect to the means of production, but for the time being, it cannot provide it with respect to consumption. Different factors affect consumption because the person who works more consumes more.

Under socialism, the extent of individual consumption is basically determined by the ability to work and the way in which the worker uses that ability. The amount of goods which every worker receives depends on the quantity and quality of his work. More work of better quality will be rewarded by better pay, a higher wage with which the worker will be able to buy more consumer goods and services.

But the application of this principle of distribution also has a great moral connotation because the workers become aware that they have begun to work for themselves, for their own class, not for an exploiter. They now realize that their personal interests are totally linked to those of society.

Moral and material incentives to work are comprised of a series of measures used for the purpose of increasing the interest of workers and enterprises in production, productivity and other indicators of economic efficiency.

In explaining the enormous importance of the material interest of workers in the results of their labor, Lenin said that "the labor vanguard is preference and preference without consumption is nothing." He went on to say that "preference in 'shock' work is preference in consumption. Without this, shock work is a vague dream, but in spite of everything, we are materialists. And the workers are materialists. If you say vanguard work, then you have bread, clothing, meat."

Practice in the building of socialism has given rise to and applied different forms of material incentives. As we stated, the wage is the fundamental form of economic inceitive for the worker because its amount depends on the results and quality of his work. The General Wage Reform is the exemplary expression of how we have begun to apply the principles of socialist distribution based on work.

There are other incentives such as the system of bonuses and economic incentive funds that we are already using.

Along with all of this, socialism develops moral incentives to which the worker gives great social value. Among these, the most prestigious award is the Hero of Labor.

At the same time it bases distribution on work, socialism meets many other needs through social consumer funds, which are distributed independently of the quantity and quality of work. Two examples are health and education, which are received equally by everyone.

The Economic Management and Planning System implies, among other things, full application of the law of distribution based on work. Under the current circumstances, in which work is first of all a means to obtain consumer goods and services and in which production requires workers with a wide range of skills, distribution based on work is an inevitable economic reality and need.

As Karl Marx emphasized in his "Criticism of the Gotha Program," "the law can never be superior to the economic structure or to the cultural development of the society affected by it."

[Text] Searching for a logical explanation for the apparition of the parallel market or market of differentiated prices, we already noted that distribution based on work is an objective economic law of socialism. According to its principles, material goods for personal consumption are distributed to workers based on the quality and quantity of work which each one performs in the process of social production.

On this occasion, we shall analyze another very important aspect of the question: the ration book or the system of rationing.

First of all, let us see what the Programmatic Platform of our Communist Party proposes with respect to this current issue:

"With the growth of productive forces," states the document that guides our policy in the building of socialism, "the development of foreign trade, the growth in production, the achievement of a domestic monetary balance and the generalized application of pay based on the quantity and quality of work contributed, there is a gradual limiting of the area of distribution in which rationing is required, confined to those basic products whose supply is still inadequate to meet the growing needs of the people through a free market and at prices within reach of everyone. It is and always will be a fundamental concern of the revolution that in the distribution of goods essential for life, as a principle of justice and social solidarity, even the lowest-income families will have access to them."

The existence of ration books in our economy reveals that some goods are still scarce and that it is still necessary to distribute them in a rationed fashion. This does not imply that our people have a lower standard of living than they would if there were no rationing. It cannot be denied that rationing has helped to meet specific needs in a better and more just fashion and that with respect to these needs, it has also helped to maintain a higher standard of living than that enjoyed by countries where there is no rationing, by means of a much more balanced, uniform and generalized distribution to everyone.

The standard of living of the Cuban people is higher than that of many other countries under capitalism. This is shown by various publications of the United Nations and other international organizations.

However, despite the favorable results in many standard-of-living indicators, measures have been taken throughout this 5-year period in order to gradually eliminate rationing, based on the policy set forth in the Programmatic Platform. Naturally, there will be a few products -- especially food items for which there is great demand and an insufficient supply: beef, for example -- that will continue to be rationed for some time. In the case of most products, rationing will be eliminated little by little by means of a consistent policy. We are working hard in this direction because at a given moment, when specific levels of production and consumption are reached, rationing becomes a check on economic development and the attempt to diversify production.

Rationing will not be eliminated solely by means of a mere increase in production because in itself, it implies producing all kinds of items for everyone. Otherwise, there would be no reason for its existence. Increasing production is a very important element of the policy to eliminate rationing, which is no longer open to discussion, but it is not the only one.

The rationing we have had and that we still have forces us to produce all kinds of items for everyone, without discrimination and in equal quantities for everyone, without considering the real fact that some persons can meet their needs with less while some need more, one of the causes of bartering, in other words, trading one's cigarette quota for soap, and so on.

Rationing forces us to produce all kinds of things for everyone, whether or not they consume, because the criterion that predominates in the process of social production for a rationed market on which distribution is done by quotas is precisely that of producing all the rationed articles so that they will reach everyone, or at least, the sectors of the population so specified, as in the case of milk, which is only sold for children, the sick and the elderly.

But circumstances tell us that it is not possible to produce the whole enormous range of varieties and assortments of consumer goods that are rationed so that they will cover the needs of the entire population, first of all because the development of our productive forces does not permit it. Second, we do not have sufficient resources and third, not everyone consumes these products in equal quantities, inasmuch as there are personal preferences.

Consequently, when we produce all kinds of items for everyone, on a rationed market we are actually producing more than we need and wasting valuable economic resources which, in the long run, satisfy no need and fatten the list of idle stock.

Furthermore, the worker's income is determined by the concrete results of his labor. Pay based on output, the wage practice now followed, is a requirement of the very nature of socialism and not a circumstantial recourse for solving passing problems or meeting goals, much less making up for deficiencies in the planning and organization of production.

Logically enough, the individual who works more and better will obtain greater income because under socialism, the principle "from each according to his ability, to each according to his work" governs. And since under socialism work and only work is the source and basis of consumption, a higher wage obtained from a better job will not stimulate anyone if it cannot be exchanged freely on the market for more consumer goods. Consequently, the law of distribution based on work cannot function properly as long as rationing exists because it is extremely confining, checking the incentive to work more and better. That is why Lenin said that "the labor vanguard is preference and preference without consumption is nothing."

Rationing has been necessary under certain circumstances because it has been used as an instrument of social justice in the distribution of certain products. It is also true that it has helped us to neutralize the effects of the inflationary processes that were felt at a given moment. But today, the circumstances that gave rise to rationing are beginning to disappear and are turning it into a counterproductive element hindering the establishment of the mechanisms of the Economic Management and Planning System, checking the development and complete satisfaction of the people's needs, halting expansion of the range of production and improvements in quality and making consistent application of the law of distribution based on work difficult.

These are a few of the reasons advising the application of a policy aimed at gradually eliminating rationing. The fundamental path of this policy is the parallel market or market of differentiated prices.

[Text] Having devoted previous articles to different aspects of the law of distribution based on work and rationing, we must now turn to material incentives because they are a very important element that will help us understand the objectives pursued with the establishment and development of the parallel market.

Our Economic Management and Planning System recognizes the objective nature of the economic laws of socialism, employs the proper combination of material and moral, individual and collective incentives and provides rewards based on the quantity and quality of work contributed to society.

Frederick Engels said that "the economic relationships of a given society are mainly manifested as interests." These economic interests are what motivate and provide incentives for human activity and express the connection between the workers' situation within the system of material production and their material needs.

Man thinks as he lives. Consequently, his economic interests are determined by the material conditions of his life. Like material living conditions, economic interests are also objective and do not depend on the will or desires of individuals. Economic interests constitute a very significant driving force that encourages the participation of men in social production.

Workers are interested in fully meeting their needs and the only way to achieve such an objective is by working because in the form of socialist distribution: "from each according to his ability; to each according to his work," lies the element that stimulates them: earning the highest wage which his strength and productive capacity permits based on the quantity and quality of work contributed to society. In other words, under socialism, the wage constitutes the most important material stimulus. Next comes the system of bonuses and rewards as an additional economic stimulus.

But while we understand that the individual who works more earns more, we must also understand that those who have contributed the most to society should receive the most from society. To be precise, they should receive a quantity of consumer goods exactly equal to the value of the work performed, minus the logical deduction to guarantee the process of expanded reproduction and cover the inevitable unproductive social expenditures necessary for the development of society and human life. The only way to materialize this distribution is through a market on which every person may buy consumer goods based on earnings. In other words, the interests of the workers will be fulfilled when they can convert a higher wage into a larger quantity of goods.

Money is useful to the worker not just because it is money but also because he can exchange it for products or services that meet his needs. This is a possibility that the ration book and rationing cannot offer, but the parallel market or the market of differentiated prices can.

If we do not develop the parallel market, what good will it do for the worker to earn more money through his work? On the parallel market, there is a direct material stimulus that motivates him to work with greater productivity, to acquire more training, to do more complex, dangerous or disagreeable tasks because the worker can freely choose what he wants to buy without any type of limitation other than the limitation of his own wage. Money is an incentive for the worker if, by using it, he can acquire all the things he wants on the market. In order for this to occur, there has to be a market with products and services at higher than normal prices so that they may be purchased by those who earn more.

This is precisely the motivation that the workers need to increase production, improve productivity and raise their technical level. But this motivation also contains the necessary incentive for an improvement in society as a whole and in all workers, even those who earn less and who therefore have fewer possibilities to participate in the parallel market directly.

We must not forget that under socialism, many of the strong material incentives that existed under capitalism and exerted pressure on the worker to produce more disappear. Today, every man and woman is guaranteed the right to work, protection against being fired, an 8-hour day, safety and hygienic conditions on the job, a paid vacation, retirement, disability insurance and social security in case of illness or childbirth. Today, all the basic services that protect people's health, guarantee the education and training of children and young people and help raise the cultural and technical level of the workers are provided free.

Gone are unemployment, idle time, evictions, illiteracy, discrimination and all the evils engendered by the capitalist system which turned men into enemies of one another and used the discipline of hunger as work discipline.

The motivations deriving from the discipline of hunger are no longer present in society. But there are incentives which represent the possibility of consuming more as the result of a better wage earned from more and better work. That is the material interest which pushes the worker to give his utmost because we who live in these times need to feel the pressure of such stimuli in order to produce up to maximum capacity. Our conscience is not yet sufficiently well-developed to make us respond to moral incentives alone. This will come about under communism.

It is true that the workers who earn less will not for the time being be able to go to the parallel market as frequently as those who work more and earn more. And yet, the parallel market is one way of stimulating producers to improve the quality of their goods and expand the range of products. The parallel market is also the way to encourage everyone to work harder and with better quality and thereby achieve the rapid increases in production, productivity and efficiency we need so desperately in order to eliminate the limitations of rationing.

These are times in which we must work with great efficiency. We are living in times that leave no room for economic romanticism or the possibility of allowing ourselves to be beaten by egalitarian criteria not in keeping with this socialist phase of the development of our society, because we would be harming ourselves. We would reap no benefit for society or for the workers who earn less and whose future we would be mortgaging.

The parallel market is one of the main ways we have to develop so that at a given point in time, we may produce with sufficient abundancy and at lower prices.

Henceforth, there will be those who can buy more products on the parallel market because they earn higher wages and there will be those who buy less, in keeping with their lower wages or because they have a very large family to support with few breadwinners. But the population as a whole will have more than before and will have more possibilities of development than ever before. This is an undeniable fact.

[Text] Now that we have examined the different elements contributing to the problem of the parallel market, let us finally consider the advantages offered by this system of sales at differentiated prices and its influence on the promotion of production and distribution of consumer goods.

The Programmatic Platform of our Communist Party states that socialism seeks to meet the material and spiritual needs of people in keeping with the objectives of a just society in which the material and moral well-being of man is the raison d'etre of the economy. At the same time, it organizes its productive apparatus in such a way that it operates with maximum efficiency, applying the most suitable methods and using the solid principles of Marxism-Leninism and the rich experience accumulated in the building of socialism.

This document, which serves as a guide in the building of socialism, also states that the Economic Management and Planning System is based on recognition of the objective nature of the economic laws of socialism and uses a proper combination of material and moral incentives and the consistent application of distribution based on the quantity and quality of work done.

Knowing these premises, we shall be able to answer the question asked by many persons, to wit: Why is a product sold by the pound at higher prices rather than being rationed?

We have already said that a rational economy is one which produces, not all the products for everyone, but rather, those that are really consumed. Wasting resources is something else. An enterprise with economic calculation that squanders its resources will always have an unfavorable financial situation. Consequently, our production apparatus will no longer be able to continue to manufacture based on the criteria of rationing. This is the main reason why a product should be sold by the pound on the parallel market and not be distributed by the rationing system.

We must understand that at a time when firm steps are being taken to overcome the scarcities we have suffered in recent years, our production apparatus does not have sufficient knowledge of the market it has to satisfy. Nor can it produce everything all at once in order to meet a demand unsatisfied for a long time. Its lack of knowledge of the market caused the imposition of rationing because the enterprises were producing for the ration books and not for a free market. The lack of understanding of demand and the still low levels of production of certain products result in an inadequate supply compared with demand and consequently, articles do not last long in the stores. No one would dream of distributing 10 or 15 grams of oil by the system of rationing. Such a thing would be absurd. But no one questions the distribution or potatoes or vegetables by the pound any longer. How much would one receive using the ration book? A quintal? This would be too much and the product would spoil.

Under socialism, distribution is governed by the principle "from each according to his ability; to each according to his work." The logical deduction is that those who work harder and provide society with more benefits receive a higher wage as the principal material incentive. But in order for the law of distribution based on work to become a reality, in order for workers to comprehend it fully, it is necessary that those same workers have the immediate possibility of being able to exchange the larger amount of money for the equivalent in goods and services on an unrestricted market.

Only in this way will the extra money earned by work serve as a powerful incentive to increase productivity and improve training so as to be able to perform the more complex, dangerous or disagreeable tasks. After all, workers do not simply work to earn money. Speaking clearly, in order for money to operate as a material incentive inducing workers to do more and perform better, the market absolutely must have consumer goods available that are not rationed. However, there must be differentiated prices so that they may only be purchased by those who earn more money through their work.

This is a necessary motivation, not only in order to develop and increase production and productivity and improve the technical level, but also in order to achieve an improvement in society as a whole and in the workers in general, even in those who earn less and who do not now have the possibility of acquiring these products and services at higher prices.

In other words, the parallel market is the means allowing the law of distribution based on work, which in turn is based on the principle "from each according to his ability; to each according to his work," to operate. This is the prime and most important reason justifying its establishment and full development.

The parallel market expands the possibilities for purchasing articles produced in small quantities. Otherwise, they would have to be stored until a sufficient quantity were available to allow distribution by ration books. There would then be a risk of spoilage and no distribution at all, which would be the most harmful.

Another advantage of the parallel market, one that we have undoubtedly shown, is that it enables the consumer to pick freely between different products and purchase the quantity he wishes. This does not happen on the rationed market. Furthermore, on the parallel market, products exist in smaller quantities because they do not necessarily have to be distributed to everyone, only to those who want them. Our productive capacity will therefore be used better and there will be a greater assortment of consumer goods since smaller quantities can be purchased when desired.

In this sense, the purpose of the parallel market is to provide a stable supply of small quantities of articles that can be manufactured in addition to types of production for the rationed market, in order to meet the needs of the new market. These products will be of better quality and will have a more greater assortment, justifying the higher prices set for the goods. This in turn will encourage producers to develop this line of production offering greater earnings. The quantity and quality of products will be increased and the time will come when supply will be greater than demand. It will then have to be balanced by a reduction in prices or an increase in income.

The parallel market will then become a kind of vanguard in the production of consumer goods and gradually open the way to the mass production of these same goods for the rest of the population, but with the same high quality and wide assortment achieved when the goods were produced for the parallel market. In the last instance, the parallel market will result in an improvement in the standard of living of the entire population.

As one can see, the parallel market tends to stabilize the supply and demand of products within the real limits of their true level of consumption. This factor turns the parallel market into a very effective economic mechanism for fighting the black market, engendered by elements who do not work and who spend their time standing in line to buy everything they can with the ration books they have managed to obtain and then resell the same products at a much higher price.

There are many other advantages advising the introduction of the parallel market into our economy and its subsequent development. During this 5-year period now coming to a close, we have devoted ourselves to establishing a new Economic Management and Planning System. The parallel market is a very important element of the system enabling the law of distribution based on work to function more perfectly. Over the next 5-year period, we must work hard to perfect all these economic instruments.

GARCIA FRIAS CHAIRS MEETING ON PROTECTION OF FLORA, FAUNA

FL180147 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 0000 GMT 18 Nov 80

[Text] Guillermo Garcia Frias, member of the PCC Central Committee Politburo, today presided over a meeting held in Camaguey City to establish the provincial committee for the protection of flora and fauna in Camaguey Province. The committee is formed by 29 comrades who represent their respective agencies from various spheres of the economic, political and social sectors and headed by Dr Danilo Corchado Martinez, member of the Provincial Party Executive Bureau and representative of the Academy of Sciences in Camaguey. The new institution includes technical subcommittees for the flora and fauna, for dissemination and mobilization and for education and culture in addition to the municipal committees.

During the meeting the participants reported on the current situation of the flora and fauna in Camaguey and on protected and priority areas. For his part, Dr Danilo Corchado submitted to the meeting the committee's immediate plan of action.

Present in the meeting were Lazaro Vazquez Garcia and Luis Rodriguez Hernandez, first and second party secretaries in Camaguey Province, respectively, other members of the executive bureau and the first party secretaries of the municipalities.

At the conclusion of the ceremony establishing the committee for the protection of flora and fauna, Garcia Frias conducted a detailed historic examination of the destruction of woods and extinction of part of the fauna. The socialist society not only has the possibility of looking after the environment but also has the obligation, because to protect man it has to protect nature, Garcia Frias asserted. The party leader referred to the tasks that the committees must fulfill, to the great responsibility and authority they must have in protecting the environment and warned about dangerous aspects of environmental contamination. Garcia Frias also stressed the importance of men's education and awareness in the struggle for the preservation of ecologic conditions and affirmed that great success can be achieved to the degree that the masses make these tasks their own.

VEIGA PRAISES EFFORTS OF EDUCATION WORKERS

FL151407 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 15 Nov 80

[Text] Our people advance with firm steps on the path to attain a ninth grade education and other higher levels of education and, in this effort, the National Science and Education Workers Union is doing an outstanding work, Roberto Veiga, member of the PCC Central Committee and secretary general of the Central Organization of Cuban Trade Unions--CTC, has asserted.

Veiga made the closing remarks at a ceremony honoring the members of the Salvador Garcia Aguero Brigade who had the best record in the country in the battle for a sixth grade education. They were given the victory award in this effort of the National Science and Education Workers Union.

The ceremony was also presided by PCC Central Committee members Jose Ramon Fernandez, vice president of the Council of Ministers and minister of education, and Jose Felipe Carneado, chief of the PCC Central Committee Science, Culture and Educational Centers Department.

This triumph is the best gift that can be given by the working class to Commander In Chief Fidel Castro and Second PCC Congress and, at the same time, is a continuation of the heroic literacy drive which in 1981 will arrive to its 20th anniversary.

NEW TEACHER WAGE SCALES, TIMETABLE ANNOUNCED

Havana TRABAJADORES in Spanish 11 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Caridad Lafita]

[Text] Resolution No 504 of 3 September 1980 implemented the regulation for the upgrading of wages for workers employed by nursery schools, elementary, junior high and high schools, sports and cultural institutes and for education officials and administrators included in the National Education System.

For a better application of these new wage measures, the State Labor and Social Security Committee established Directive No 362 (OTS-S), whose 23 paragraphs interpret and regulate various aspects contained in the aforementioned Resolution No 504.

Wage modifications resulting from the performance of years of service in education or from the results of the evaluation are made once a year, in the month of September, along with the classification of nursery schools, teaching centers and orientation and diagnostic institutes.

Workers who have ceased teaching at the levels of education included in the regulation and who are reincorporated into one of these levels receive the wage corresponding to the level immediately below the post they will occupy, except in the case of workers sent to internationalist, civilian or military missions, those who move to posts as trade union leaders or are appointed by the party or government to perform other duties, and those sent to advanced or postgraduate courses and to obtain scientific degrees.

Workers who have retired from the levels of education included in the regulation and then return to one of those levels have the right to recognition of their years of service and to the additional pay covered in Article 25 of Resolution No 504, unless the termination of the labor relationship should be a consequence of the application of a disciplinary measure.

When recognition is given to years of service, the additional pay that might correspond as a result of that service does not begin until 2 years after resumption of service, with the exception of the special cases previously mentioned.

Teachers covered by Resolution No 504 and who are assigned to internationalist, civilian or military missions are considered to be actually teaching for the purposes of the additional pay for years of service. From the salary standpoint, they receive the salary corresponding to the last evaluation made of their work, with the exception of those workers still in education, to whom the system of evaluation set up can therefore be applied.

Regarding education workers who move to posts as trade union leaders, when such workers return to teaching, recognition is immediately given to the time they have spent as union leaders for the purposes of the additional pay for years of service. If teachers should be chosen or appointed by the party or government to perform other duties, when they return to education, immediate recognition is given to the years of service accumulated.

If the worker is sent to advanced or postgraduate courses or to obtain a scientific degree, either within the national territory or abroad, for a period longer than 1 academic year, years of service are not accumulated for the purposes of additional pay but once the course is completed, the worker has the right to immediate recognition of the years of service accumulated previous to his incorporation.

In these three cases mentioned, with respect to the salary, the workers receive what was coming to them at the time of the last evaluation made of their work when they complete the internationalist mission or the term of office as a trade union, party or state official or course.

Teachers and professors who began to work previous to 31 December 1970 without a degree and to whom Resolution No 1586 of 1964 from the Ministry of Labor was applied, following which they completed their degree, receive recognition of their years of service starting from the time Resolution No 1586 was applied to them.

Concerning junior high and high school teachers presenting certification of satisfactory performance on the special evaluation established by Ministry of Education Resolution No 454 of 1974, recognition is given of the time from the date on which they began to be covered by Resolution No 1586 for the purposes of the additional pay for years of service in the teaching profession.

In the case of teachers and professors at INDER [National Institute for Sports, Physical Education and Recreation], the Ministry of Culture and the former Children's Institute, which approved the special evaluation called for by Resolutions Nos 2249 of 1975, 41 of 1977 and 27 of 1973, set forth by the respective heads of those organizations, for the purposes of the additional pay, years of service in education are counted from the date on which the special evaluation was approved.

Teachers who go from the higher level of education to one of the levels covered by Resolution No 504 continue to receive the additional pay for years of service to which they have the right based on Resolution No 503 of the CETSS [State Committee for Labor and Social Security], until they accumulate the years of service needed to receive the sum provided by the regulation, at which time the two increases are added together, up to a maximum limit of 47 pesos.

Technical workers in the teaching profession covered by the regulation who, according to previous legal provisions, did not have the right to receive additional pay for years of service in education, have the right to receive credit for the time they spent in that activity for the purposes of additional pay, within the limits and according to the conditions set by the regulation.

University professors with degrees who were teaching in junior high schools when the regulation went into effect receive the salary for the level immediately below the post they occupy, independently of the phase they were in.

The wage increase resulting from special working conditions and consisting of increases of 10, 15 and 25 percent of the total salary, as provided in Chapter XI of Resolution No 504, is applied to workers in specialized centers equivalent to polytechnical schools and institutes or farming work-study schools, when the conditions outlined in that chapter exist.

The wage system approved by the regulation, Resolution No 504, does away with the annual system by phases established in the regulations abrogated by the resolution. Nevertheless, in the month of September 1980, the last wage step approved by those regulations goes into effect and thereafter, application will be made of the Second Transitory Provision of the regulation, which states that when the regulation goes into effect, workers going through the wage phases established in the regulations abrogated by the resolution receive the wage level immediate above the one corresponding to them in September 1980.

Directive No 362 and Resolution No 504 take effect on the date stipulated, 3 September 1980, once published in the GACETA OFICIAL DE LA REPUBLICA.

LOCAL MANAGEMENT RESPONSIBLE FOR WORK PLACE DISCIPLINE

Havana TRABAJADORES in Spanish 13 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] The management of any enterprise, establishment or unit may, without being a payment center and without delegation of the power from the enterprise director -- who has the legal status to do so -- set forth valid resolutions for applying the disciplinary measures established in Decree-Law 32, or does the label "state management" refer only to those units mentioned in Article 3 of Resolution No 459 of 1969?

This question was formulated by the presiding magistrate of the Labor Chamber of the People's Court of Villa Clara Province and put to the Government Council of the People's Supreme Court.

It is true that in its Article 3, Resolution 459 of 1969 defines what management of the labor center is, but for the purposes of the provisions of Law 1225 and the resolution itself. It reads:

"For the purposes of the provisions of the law and this regulation, 'the labor center management' will be interpreted to mean:

"a) the management of a production or services center or unit which exercises administrative and financial management over such a center or unit and that unit constitutes a payment center; and

"b) the centralized management of various centers or units of production and services which exercises administrative and financial management over those units and whose centralized apparatus constitutes a payment center."

The provisions of Resolution 459, as a concept of state management, are not taken into account for the application of Decree 32, which considers the headquarters of the center of work where the worker to be disciplined is employed.

This situation is clarified in Opinion 101 issued by the People's Supreme Court, in response to the consultation of the People's Court of Villa Clara Province.

The opinion states the following: Except in the case of special regulations set forth in certain instances by virtue of internal laws or provisions, the power to take disciplinary action in keeping with Decree Law 32 of 1980 is attributed to management in the person of the head of the respective work center where the worker to be disciplined is employed, without taking into account the provisions of Resolution 459 of the former Ministry of Labor, set forth as Regulation of Law 122.

Legal Vocabulary

Our "Legal Clarifications" section has as its fundamental objective the clarification and interpretation of legal provisions by means of ruling or information from the People's Supreme Court, the Office of Attorney General and the Ministry of Justice.

For that reason, it is necessary that our readers master the legal vocabulary, for which purpose we shall periodically publish the most common definitions in the legal terminology.

Case: happening or event, criminal conduct subject to the competent legal authority for resolution.

Cassation: recourse against the sentences and decrees of the superior courts, handed down against the law or accepted doctrine or going against the essential steps of the trial.

Attachment: consists of the holding of property by the competent authority because of debt or crime in order to ensure payment.

[Text] Wage increases for education officials, based on the category of the centers. In order to receive these increases, it is a requirement that classes be taught.

Monthly wage increases for education officials at the different types of institutions will be received by the workers who, along with their duties as officials, also teach classes, inasmuch as that function is included in their annual service time. Heads of specialized cultural centers are exempted from this requirement when their teaching training does not correspond to the special subjects taught at those centers.

BRIEFS

MINED METHODOLOGICAL MEETING CONCLUDES--Following 3 days of working sessions the annual Methodological Meeting of the Education Ministry [MINED] has concluded in this capital. The meeting was chaired by Education Minister Jose Ramon Fernandez, member of the PCC Central Committee and vice president of the Council of Ministers. The MINED vice ministers and national and provincial directors participating in the meeting heard speeches by party and government leaders and held meetings among themselves. Among the lectures was one on aesthetic education as part of the whole education of the students' personality and policy of the Culture Ministry and its role with respect to that education given by Armando Hart, member of the PCC Politburo and minister of culture. PCC Politburo member Carlos Rafael Rodriguez also made a speech on international problems in today's world and the Middle East conflict. MENDOZA REAFFIRMS SOLIDARITY--Jorge Enrique Mendoza, member of the Communist Party of Cuba Central Committee, has reaffirmed in Colombia that the Cuban revolution has been and will continue to be in solidarity with all revolutionaries of the world. When Mendoza was introduced at the closing session of the 13th Congress of the Communist Party of Colombia, the 11,000 delegates stood up and cheered with shouts of "Cuba yes, Yankees no." The Cuban delegate, who was interrupted 12 times with applause, reaffirmed in his speech the revolution's solidarity with Nicaragua, Grenada and Panama's sovereign claim over the canal and its zone. Before congratulating Gilberto Vieira on his reelection as leader of the Communist Party of Colombia, Jorge Enrique Mendoza noted that the Cuban party shares the views expressed at the congress on the need for peaceful coexistence and for peace to reach all corners of the world. NONALIGNED DECISION ANNOUNCED--At the UN General Assembly Cuba has reiterated the decision of the Sixth Nonaligned Countries Movement Summit Conference to apply without delay the sanctions provided for by the UN charter against the Pretoria regime. In a speech at the plenum Cuba's permanent representative Raul Roa Kouri stressed that among the sanctions in the charter, those directed at South Africa's economic sector and, particularly, a total embargo of oil supplies should be assigned priority consideration. The Cuban representative harshly attacked the violators of UN resolutions aimed at isolating the South African regime, forcing it to abandon the apartheid policy and impeding it from further developing its already powerful military capability. MMP LEADER DISCUSSES ELECTIONS, HAITIANS

Santo Domingo EL NACIONAL in Spanish 25 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] Dr Rafael Tobias Genau, the president of the People's Municipal Movement (MMP), has proposed the unification of all the democratic forces of the country so as to be together for the 1982 elections, in the belief that "no one will be able to win alone."

The MMP president, who has been a candidate for trustee of the National District on three occasions, referred to the work being carried out by some parties of the left, which are collecting signatures to obtain legal recognition.

He stated that the coverup which is being experienced in the Dominican Republic in politics "is interesting." Dr Tobias Genau favors political pluralism here, "so that the parties in power do not believe they are the only ones with the right to exist."

The leader of the MMP made his statements when he participated in the program "Interviews," moderated every day at 1330 on Onda Musical by the journalist Felix A. Gomez.

Tobias Genau believes that the Reformist Party can win in 1982, since it can count on many people and the necessary resources. He stated that proof of its strength were the 700,000 votes which it obtained in 1978.

Reiterating his call for the unification of democratic forces, Dr Rafael Tobias Genau pointed out that the leftists are doing it. He recalled that, despite the small number of votes which it received in 1978, the MMP was one of the few organizations which continued to be recognized by the Central Electoral Board [JCE]. He pointed out that Article 89 of the current law establishes this.

He stated that the MMP has various suggestions to present at the meeting which the board will hold on the 30th of this month with the political parties. Tobias Genao did not put forward any of the proposals which he will submit for consideration, but he did say that he agrees with the claims that a bill which is under consideration in the National Congress would make for the best electoral system.

Dr Tobias Genao feels that the executive branch is obliged to grant the board all the economic resources which it needs to hold an honest and impartial process. He thinks that as the JCE suggests, identity cards as well as the clerkships of the Civil State should be under its jurisdiction.

He cited Article 55, Section 1 of the Constitution, which authorizes autonomous organizations to appoint their employees. He said the JCE is one of these organizations. He thinks that President Guzman has been slow in authorizing the board the funds it is requesting. He thinks the executive branch should not wait for the 1981 budget, but should act on the matter now.

He said that Dr Joaquin Balaguer "is right" when he echoes rumors to the effect that Haitian citizens are being issued documents for personal identification. "These reports are nothing new, since they date back to Trujillo." He declared that the director of the identity card office, De Rafael Berges Peral, "must make the appropriate inquiries."

ASD TO RUN ABINADER IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

Santo Domingo LISTIN DIARIO in Spanish 26 Sep 80 p 8A

[Text] Dr Jose Rafael Abinader, the current comptroller general of the republic, will be nominated as a candidate for the presidency of the republic in the next general election by the Social Democratic Alliance [ASD].

According to the announcement, the electoral department of the ASD will engage in an extensive program of activities at the national level on Dr Abinader's behalf.

The secretary general of the ASD, Dr Emilio Antonio Guzman Matos, pointed out that the great evils of this country since its founding as a free and sovereign state have been rooted precisely in the fact that the government in power did not know how to face the administrative problems which the times and the prevailing circumstances demanded."

He also maintained that "as is natural, when the means to solve the problems of a specific country are not understood, one sees chaos and a whole series of disastrous consequences."

The leader of the ASD said: "It is for this reason that our party, conscious of this century-old problem, and setting aside small differences in criteria within the same party, is preparing for the opportune moment to launch as a presidential candidate a man of the people, hardened in political contests, an exemplary husband and father, with profound knowledge of economics and education and who is conversant with public administration from the lowest of posts to the highest and most specialized."

Guzman Matos added: "I am referring to the man who is currently the president of our party, Dr Jose Rafael Abinader, whom the Dominican people know as a serious man and one who has never known the easy sinecure or corruptive embezzlement, which in this country have damaged the reputation of so many men."

Also, he announced that "Right now, we are going to begin to work on the organizational aspect, with the aim of participating in the 1982 elections."

He proclaimed that the ASD "will run as a candidate for the presidency of the republic in 1982 this man in whom the Dominican people will find the solution to its problems in the near future."

NATIONAL PRESS EXPRESSES CONCERN OVER SUGAR SHORTAGES

Shortages Should Be Explained

Santo Domingo EL CARIBE in Spanish 25 Sep 80 p 12

[Editorial: "Clarification Needed"]

[Text] The serious shortage of sugar that is affecting Dominican consumers has created an atmosphere of uncertainty which should be resolved for the good of all.

The retailers state, on the one hand, that they have no sugar because delivery orders provided them by the National Price Stabilization Institute (INESPRE) are ignored by the Porvenir sugarmill, the state-owned refined sugar producer. The Porvenir sugar mill maintains, on the other hand, that its sugar production is not only normal but has increased. It also says that it has been delivering the sugar requested by the retailers through INESPRE.

There is obviously a mystery here, a mystery that is causing justified uncertainty among public opinion nationwide.

It is time for an explanation.

Government Should Explain

Santo Domingo EL NACIONAL in Spanish 25 Sep 80 p 8D

[Editorial: "Crisis in Sugar"]

[Text] A serious shortage of sugar, of the kind known as "refined" or "fine," persists throughout the country.

The state-owned Porvenir sugarmill, the only official sugarmill that processes this kind of sugar, has said that it has increased production and that it is delive delivering orders to the middleman, the National Price Stabilization Institute (INESPRE), on time.

The Association of Supermarkets said today that it will not receive any more sugar from INESPRE in view of the substantial reduction in the quotas assigned to it.

What is really happening with the sugar that is also called "white?" What is the real cause of the shortage? How is it possible that the scarcity of the product is being so keenly felt when production has been increased?

Only the government can give a satisfactory explanation.

JUNTA DISCUSSES ISSUES WITH RESIDENTS OF ZACATECOLUCA

Reforms Discussed, Unity Urged

San Salvador LA PRENSA GRAFICA in Spanish 20 Oct 80 pp 3, 38, 49

[Text] "The time has come to put an end to all this social injustice, which has been with us for more than 100 years. It is because of all the prevailing injustice that violence has flared to such a degree," said Dr Jose Ramon Avalos Navarrete last Saturday at Zacatecoluca in discussing the current situation in the country.

He analyzed the background to our current situation up to the change in government last 15 October and gave a rundown of the structural changes that the Government Revolutionary Junta is now undertaking.

No More Injustice

Dr Avalos Navarrete said that the process of change is irreversible and that starting with this government there would be no more social injustices as in the past.

He enumerated the changes in the agrarian reform, the banking system, foreign trade, the improvements in ISSS [Salvadoran Institute of Social Security], reforms of the Labor Code and the many other laws enacted to help the masses.

Strong Municipalities

Speaking next was Dr Pablo Mauricio Alvergue, the minister of the presidency, who said that the structural changes carried out by the Government Revolutionary Junta are of great benefit to all of the country's municipalities. He also gave a rundown of the most important projects and explained the philosophy of the Government Revolutionary Junta.

He called for cooperation from all Salvadorans, stressing that the people's salvation depends on their degree of unity, by refraining from ill-will and hatred and forgetting all of the bad things.

Groundwork for a New Society

Atilio Vieytez, the planning minister, spoke immediately afterwards and said that the agrarian reform is and would be the main foundation for our united society.

He stated that the nationalization of banking and foreign trade has been a success and that statistics are the best proof of this.

Vieytez said that the people must be aware, united and prepared to face the future. He pointed out that before the end of the century El Salvador would have a population of 10 million in a territory of 21,000 square kilometers. He said that we would require determination, patience and unity in the struggle for development to cope with this state of affairs.

Rights

A local resident asked for information on the status of the peasant farmer unionization bill, and Dr Julio Alfredo Samayoa said in reply that the bill is in the hands of the Government Revolutionary Junta.

The public gathered at the Ichanmichen springs applauded at length upon hearing the reply from Dr Samayoa, the minister of labor.

Greater Unity

The last to speak was Col Adolfo Arnoldo Majano, who thanked those attending the dialog between the people of Zacatecoluca and the members of the Government Revolutionary Junta.

He appealed to everyone to join the struggle for national recovery, "because in unity there is strength, and with this strength we will be able, together, to surmount the most adverse situations."

He pointed out that if all Salvadorans are united, we would achieve the gains that the agrarian reform was designed to bring about, such as a higher output of grains, cotton, coffee, etc.

More Information

Here are some more details on the visit by the Government Revolutionary Junta last Saturday.

Doves Set Free To Symbolize Peace With Honduras

Zacatecoluca, La Paz, 19 October--Two white doves were set free to symbolize the peace that will soon reign between Honduras and El Salvador and in El Salvador's political climate. It was one of the major ceremonies staged in this town on Saturday the 18th during the workshop at which the Government Revolutionary Junta, accompanied by its cabinet, exchanged impressions with the citizens of the 21 municipalities in the department.

The doves were given to Dr Jose Antonio Morales Erlich, a member of the Junta, by the mayor of Cuyultitlan, who on behalf of the residents of the entire department, which bears the name of La Paz (peace), expressed the hope that our country would achieve peace and congratulated the government for its success in cementing peace with our sister republic of Honduras and, therefore, throughout Central America. It was indeed a moving moment, especially when Dr Morales Erlich released the doves, which flew towards the grove by the Ichanmichen springs, where the meeting in question was held.

Participants

Representing the Government Revolutionary Junta were Drs Jose Ramon Avalos Navarrete and Jose Antonio Morales Erlich and Col Adolfo Arnoldo Majano. Because of prior official commitments, the other members of the junta, Jose Napoleon Duarte and Col Jaime Abdul Gutierrez, were unable to attend; they sent their warm greetings to the citizens of La Paz.

Also there were several ministers and undersecretaries from the state cabinet and other high-level officials to take part in the exchange of impressions with mayors, local commanders, blue-collar workers, peasant farmers, housewives, market vendors, teachers, students, etc, all of them led by departmental authorities.

Avalos Navarrete Address

Our national anthem was first sung by the public, and then the mayor of Zacatecoluca, Professor Carlos Avalos greeted the visitors. Answering on behalf of the Government Junta was Dr Avalos Navarrete, who took the opportunity to discuss what the government has done during its first year. Its goal for the year was and still is to carry out the proclamation of the Armed Forces on 15 October 1979, which set down the objectives of democratizing the country and helping the masses, who used to be victimized by privileged minority segments of society.

Dr Avalos was especially emphatic in giving assurances that the current revolutionary process, marked by peace and freedom, would never be halted and that the far left and far right would fail with the violence that they are promoting.

Emphasis

Dr Jose Ramon Avalos Navarrete, as well as the speakers who followed him to the microphone (Dr Pablo Alvergue, minister of the presidency, and Atilio Vieytez, minister of planning), underscored to the citizens of the department of La Paz that the country's various sectors must become involved organizationally to achieve success in the in-depth changes spurred by the Government Revolutionary Junta, changes based on the Armed Forces Proclamation of 15 October 1979.

Dr Alvergue and Vieytez did exhaustive analyses of the current political process and economic development program.

They reasserted that the government is acting impartially, without a desire for vengeance or revenge against anyone. Its only goal is to establish justice, which has been lacking in El Salvador for so many years. They repeated that the regulations for Decree 207, which concerns the abolition of sharecropping and land leasing, would be implemented soon. This is something of great importance for peasant farmers, Vieytez said, also mentioning the second stage of the agrarian reform.

Shows of Gratitude

After the speeches by Dr Alvergue and Vieytez, groups of male and female students approached the Government Revolutionary Junta and its entourage to present them with flowers as a show of endearment.

Other persons, including mayors, also brought meaningful local souvenirs for the visitors. As we said before, the mayor of Cuyultitlan presented them with two doves, and the mayor of Santa Maria Ostuma gave them pineapples, a well-known product from the fertile lowlands of Ostuma.

On behalf of the Government Junta, Dr Morales Erlich expressed thanks for the demonstrations of affection and made particular reference to the doves brought from Cuyultitlan. He said that he understood how much the residents of the department of La Paz yearn for domestic peace. He also thanked the people for congratulating the junta on the success of the peace talks with Honduras, adding that peace would become a reality in just a few days.

Problems

As is customary at these workshops staged by the Government Revolutionary Junta, the get-together last Saturday at Ichanmichen included a round of questions and answers at which the area's major problems were brought up.

In Zacatecoluca, mayors, teachers, parents and others brought up such issues as education, peasant farmer unionization, health care, peace with Honduras, drinking water, roads, municipal autonomy, etc. The replies came from the ministers or undersecretaries in charge of the issues broached.

There are 21 municipalities in the department of La Paz: Zacatecoluca, Santiago Nonualco, San Juan Nonualco, San Rafael Obrajuelo, San Pedro Nonualco, Santa Maria Ostuma, San Emigdio, Paraiso de Osorio, Jerusalen, Mercedes La Ceiba, Olocuilta, San Diego Talpa, Cuyultitlan, San Francisco Chinameca, Tapalhuaca, San Luis, San Pedro Masahual, San Pedro Tepezontes, San Miguel Tepezontes, El Rosario, San Antonio Masahuat.

Majano Speaks

The final speech at the meeting in Ichanmichen was delivered by Colonel Majano, who praised the department of La Paz for its proud history over the years and for its contribution to national progress.

He then talked about the reason for these direct contacts between the government and the people, whose needs it wants to satisfy, based on their involvement. Colonel Majano stressed that the Government Revolutionary Junta of which he is a member considers the welfare of communities, especially poor ones, a special goal.

Noting that the main problems in La Paz are, as mayors and other citizens explained, schooling, water and municipal autonomy, he stated that everything was proceeding just fine in these spheres and that in the future the municipalities would enjoy real autonomy and be able to take care of all their local needs, even regarding taxes, security, etc. Colonel Majano concluded by urging Salvadorans to consume what the country produces and to promote industry and handicrafts.

Peasant Unions, Peace Discussed

San Salvador LA PRENSA GRAFICA in Spanish 23 Oct 80 p 37

[Text] Zacatecoluca, La Paz--Peasant farmer unionization was one of the topics broached on Saturday the 18th in this city during the workshop and discussion that the Government Revolutionary Junta, accompanied by its state cabinet, held with residents of the department at the Ichanmichen tourist center.

The question in this connection was posed by the mayor of San Luis Talpa, who also asked for more details about the peace process with Honduras.

The peasant farmer unionization issue was dealt with by the minister of labor and social security, Dr Julio Alfredo Samayoa, Jr. He reminded the public that the current political constitution quite clearly recognizes the right of all citizens to join farm worker unions.

"Unfortunately," he stated, "previous governments never allowed such unionization, citing the crudest pretexts...Therefore, because of peasant farmer disenfranchisement, de facto farmer groups such as the Salvadoran Christian Peasants Federation, the Farm Workers Union and others, sprang up."

In contrast, Minister Samayoa underscored, the Government Revolutionary Junta has very clear ideas in this regard, inasmuch as one of the objectives in the Armed Forces Proclamation of 15 October 1979 is the enactment of a Peasant Farmer Unionization Law. Dr Samayoa then reported that his ministry has already submitted a draft of such a law, which is a complement to the reforms of the Labor Code, to the Government Revolutionary Junta for its consideration and approval.

Dr Jose Antonio Morales Erlich, a member of the Government Revolutionary Junta, replied to the second question from the mayor of San Luis Talpa. He explained that one of the terms of the Mediation Agreement is that neither of the two parties is authorized to publish details of the process, but thanks to the sound judgment of the mediator, former Peruvian President Luis Bustamante y Rivero, we are now in the home stretch towards the signing of the peace treaty, which does not wound the dignity of either country. Dr Morales Erlich predicted countless benefits for both Hondurans and Salvadorans as soon as the peace treaty is ratified by the two sides.

He concluded by saying: "There is one thing we should emphasize: everything was accomplished without impairing any of El Salvador's rights relating to borders, roads, etc...In other words, our sovereignty has not been impaired."

Mr Emilio B. Saravia, a member of the City Council in this department capital, suggested to the Government Revolutionary Junta that the day when the peace treaty with Honduras is signed be declared a national holiday with a day off for public and municipal workers and those in private enterprise.

UNITY AMONG LEFTIST FORCES, FAILING ECONOMY DISCUSSED

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 12 Oct 80 pp 16-17

[Article by Roberto Morejon]

[Text] In the last few weeks the revolutionary organizations of El Salvador have increased the number and range of their military actions, keeping in reserve the great mass mobilizations launched months earlier.

This trend was already revealed in some guerrilla messages, and the facts corroborated the announcement. No one wants to discount the occupations of political, religious or other centers for agitation purposes or to obtain the release of prisoners.

On the occasions of the recent takeovers of the OAS headquarters in San Salvador, the metropolitan cathedral and another temple, criticism of the state of siege and prevailing repression was made public, and the release of several youths was demanded.

The military actions of the Farabundo Marti Armed Forces of Liberation (FAPL), the People's Revolutionary Army (ERP), the Armed Forces of National Resistance (FARN) and the Communist Party all of a sudden began to show a power perhaps not foreseen by local genocidal forces. On many occasions the confrontations seem to be carried out by two highly trained contingents, of course with opposing objectives.

According to the insurgent forces themselves, recently larger military structures have been put into practice; that is, constantly combat-ready battalions are deployed in different regions. A considerable number of militia members, around 100,000, are reportedly contributing to the disruption of the regime.

Among the regular actions of the people's forces, the most prominent are simultaneous attacks on military quarters and the property of the "14 families," the rescue of prisoners, blowing up bridges, setting up barricades on highways, appropriating weapons, taking towns and districts for agitation purposes, and the recruitment of citizens.

The latter tactic, which sometimes takes place at the edge of the capital city, occurs when new contingents join the revolutionaries during popular demonstrations or even during armed marches held concurrently.

The guerrilla detachments often are ordered to execute traitors, intercept military vehicles and prepare ambushes or assaults on important enclaves, such as the recent operation in which the Yankee embassy was fired upon several times by bazookas, although it is considered a fortress.

Common Objectives

Though not too long ago one could still observe a certain inconsistency in the actions of the various revolutionary organizations, that seems to be a thing of the past; and an even stricter coordination must be achieved in the coming months.

This trend is the product of a unity achieved in the heat of battle, the lesson of triumphs, defeats and errors. The Salvadoran struggle began a stage in which ideas became more clearly defined with the formation of the Unified Revolutionary Leadership (DRU), made up of the armed groups FAPL, ERP, FARN and the forces of the Communist Party.

Taking different strategic approaches, trying to concentrate dispersed troops, the lessons learned in other countries such as Nicaragua are being assimilated. In Nicaragua, for example, the unification of factions meant a great step forward.

But in El Salvador other levels of society have also seen the need for linking efforts. One antioligarchic and anti-imperialist force, an expression of progressive interests, is the Revolutionary Democratic Front (FDR), made up of professionals, politicians, intellectuals, common people, etc., all of them people of proven honesty. The goal is the formation of a democratic government.

This consolidation of human resources--as well as economic ones--destroyed the attempts of the genocidal Junta to intimidate and crush the citizens who participated in the general strike last August. On that occasion tanks, bayonets and the tactics of the paramilitary bands were used. However, disciplined work led to the crumbling of the fragile underpinnings of the civilian-military mafia that is running the state.

Military Bares Its Claws

Something quite different happened in the ranks of the high officials who staged the putsch of last 15 October. The specter of dissent emerged among them with regard to the manner in which they should continue the task of selling out to the United States and overcoming popular unrest.

One of the strongmen, Col Adolfo Majano, consistently pointed out by Western agencies as the "moderate" head, looked on in a daze as all his followers were purged from power. The stratagem bore the stamp of his fellow conspirator in the coup, Jaime Abdul Gutierres.

Majano is the one who cooked up the demagogic agrarian reform that was implemented early this year, against all odds. It has served only to militarize the countryside and force peasants to produce in order to leave behind the economic quagmire. He favors the maintenance of the present Junta and the promulgation of merely cosmetic decrees as a means to gain time and crush the revolutionary forces.

His rivals, led by Abdul, would be willing to hold "elections" or to cede nominal power to a specimen of the Christian democratic fauna, who would serve as a civilian frontman for military manipulations.

The Majano defeat in this crisis at the top proves that no recipe for solving problems will provide the results desired by the military. Majano's hands have been cut off to prevent him from maneuvering for a possible coup. In the road lies a dethroned colonel, the supposed leader of a movement of young moderate officers which was not noticed by observers, at least not as a homogeneous entity.

Meanwhile, the "rebel without a cause" continues to be an accomplice in the murders of workers, students, peasants, housewives and even children. The fascist hordes have specialized in burning down houses, making illegal searches, and of course murdering more than 7,000 people in 1980. In Honduras, 100,000 Salvadorans, along with 3,000 in Costa Rica and 1,000 in Nicaragua, can attest to the brutality they fled.

Way Paved for Demoralization

The chaos is too much. High-level state officials, political leaders and public officials are abandoning their posts and boarding airlines to escape what they fear will happen, in an acknowledgement of official corruption.

The myth of agrarian reform has now been debunked, and now the regime has militarized the state electricity, water, port and communications enterprises in order to avoid new strikes, in defiance of the state of siege.

In a country where the only topic of conversation is death, disappearances and guerrilla actions, hardly anyone remembers that the factories must operate and the soil must produce food.

In the open flight of capital, more than 60 industries have closed their doors between 1979 and 1980, amid a constant drain of foreign reserves. The active establishments are coming nowhere near the nation's needs for goods and raw materials.

San Salvador is slowly being destroyed by the war. The school dropout rate in the nation is 50 percent in day schools and 80 percent in night schools. Students are turned away from 440 schools.

Debacle Could Be Avoided. . .

The United States, principally, and Venezuela in second place, would like to stop the insurrection at all costs.

The Christian Democratic clique of Caracas is getting more and more involved in the internal affairs of the Caribbean and Central America. Now it is tied up in a spy network set up by the CIA to shore up servile regimes in the region.

Former President Carlos Andres Perez, THE NEW YORK TIMES and leaders of the FDR have talked about a structure known as "Centauro," which is supposed to be carrying out the interventionist plans.

While the United States regards these actions with pleasure, it is sending more advisers to the Salvadoran Army, even Saigonese mercenaries who served in Indochina. Navy ships suspiciously roam the adjacent waters of the Pacific.

The White House finally decided to increase its donation to the Junta to millions of dollars. The amounts committed to Bolivia, which were not delivered because of the coup there, will be diverted to San Salvador to ensure the "moderate" path.

Since the coup by Abdul, Majano and Company, aid has amounted to about $60 million, and could top $100 million.

All this is to see if the proimperialist bastion can still be "saved," with a few touchups, during an era of radical change in the region.

If, as many predict (even the most astute members of the Washington National Security Council), the revolutionary tide is rising in the homeland of Farabundo Marti, then the possibility of sending in the Marines is not being discounted, even though that would be "an agonizing decision," according to James Cheek, assistant under secretary of state for Central America.

For this reason the Carter Administration would like to see another OAS forum to study the possibility of taking a stand on the sending of combined forces to the Central American nation.

Unlike what happened in 1979, when the Andean Pact and other nations refused to intervene in Nicaragua, now the treaty signatories are showing a different attitude.

Colombia, Peru and Ecuador have taken refuge in silence; Venezuela supports the genocidal coup in Bolivia. . . well, although they don't say so, they must be applauding the daily crimes in El Salvador.

Hence, the importance of a permanent, loyal contribution to the revolutionaries, in order to prevent a plot to do away with the fruit of all the sacrifices made to date by a small but rebellious people on the road to definitive independence.

CRM, FDR LEADER DISCUSSES LEFTIST UNITY

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 21 Oct 80 p 7

[Report on interview with Marisol Galindo, leader of the Revolutionary Coordinating Committee of the Masses [CRM] and of the Revolutionary Democratic Front [FDR], in El Salvador; date not given]

[Text] One of the greatest achievements of the political and military forces of El Salvador in their drive toward unity is the strong advance attained with the recent formation of the Farabundo Marti Liberation Front. Marisol Galindo, a leader of the CRM [Revolutionary Coordinating Committee of the Masses] and of the FDR [Revolutionary Democratic Front], recently discussed this with a staff member of EL NUEVO DIARIO.

She was interviewed somewhere in El Salvador. This front, she said, is becoming the vanguard of the Salvadoran people who are fighting for their true liberation.

The formation of the Farabundo Marti Liberation Front represents an advance made at the instigation of the Unified Revolutionary Directorate of the Political and Military Forces of El Salvador. The former unit was a sort of management organization, while this Front is coming to be the true vanguard, explained the revolutionary leader.

With the formation of the Farabundo Marti Liberation Front, the names of the different political and military forces will disappear. These forces have been fighting and constantly obtaining greater degrees of unity, leading to the formation of this vanguard, pointed out Marisol Galindo.

She then explained that the flags and other symbols identifying these forces will now disappear.

Now all the forces will fight under a single flag; it is a red rectangle with symbols in white. It has a star, also white, in the upper left corner.

The main slogans of the vanguard are: "United to fight," "Until the final victory," and "Revolution or death."

She mentioned this while evaluating the political achievements of this year. As we know, on 15 October it was a year since the coup d'etat against Colonel Romero, a coup immediately labeled as a maneuver of North American imperialism in support of its policy of reform and repression.

The democratic sectors have joined in this struggle. Also, said Marisol, banking employees, insurance, state, and business employees are involved in the organization of this irreversible struggle.

She indicated that the social force that has been developed in this struggle has taken root so deeply in the consciousness of the people that they are not now fighting for their own demands, but rather for a historic purpose, the takeover of political power.

She added that the people have overcome the reformism, which the forces of imperialism wanted to use to block the liberation of the people.

Asked about achievements on an international scale, she said that the world is now aware of the justice of the struggle of the Salvadoran people and of the criminal nature of the Christian Democratic Military Junta; this is a struggle of the people against the military government.

She explained that they will not turn back in this struggle in El Salvador; they will work until the people triumph.

She said that solidarity with El Salvador has increased considerably abroad; now not only the peoples are supporting the just cause of their Salvadoran brothers, but also truly democratic governments are doing the same.

She was asked to comment on the military field. She answered that in the course of the struggle, the military aspect has come to be the essential aspect. There has been massive support for military actions, because the people are aware that their sole alternative is armed combat until the end.

She reported that there are regular military units that have been fighting constantly for over 5 months against the genocidal forces.

Their success can be explained by the fact that four battlefronts have been established: the "Feliciano Ama" western front; the central front; the "Anastasio Aquino" central front; and the eastern front.

There is also an extensive popular militia organization. Because of the existence of these forces, said Marisol, the genocidal forces have resorted to the criminal strategy of annihilation. Now, she reported, any operation in the most battle-torn regions includes not only the use of tanks, but also of helicopter-borne artillery, which attack the civilian population indiscriminately.

About the outcome, she said that for the past 6 months work has been in progress on preparing suitable political and military conditions; we can not make one false move.

Not only are they working to find the best time to begin the final battles against the military junta and its allies; they are also considering the need for countering a possible military intervention by the forces of imperialism.

She said that the balance of strength is continuing to shift toward the forces of the people. The exact time is not yet known, but the moment is approaching when the enemy forces will fall in the final battle; we can only hope that their fall will not destroy too much in their path, said Marisol. "We are reaching the end of this state of equilibrium." Here the interview came to an end because her time was limited, and she had to turn her attention elsewhere.

'HUMAN RIGHTS' OFFICIAL PRAISES FOREIGN RADIOS

PA121718 Havana International Service in Spanish 2321 GMT 11 Nov 80

[Statement by Fernando Augusto Mendez, member of the "Salvadoran Human Rights Commission," during "recent" stopover in Cuba--recorded]

[Text] It is important to tell the sister people that El Salvador already has a human rights commission. It is comprised of men of good will, of honest people, who want to see the country free of its large number of murders. We also want human rights respected in El Salvador. The commission was created with a single weapon--the weapon of denunciation, denunciation to all peoples. We do not have the right to use any other type of weapon or to adopt any other type of struggle other than denunciation of the condition of human rights in El Salvador international organizations. It could be said that in El Salvador human rights are strewn all over the floor.

The commission does a great deal of work. This is why we are being criticized. It is charged that we are biased, are (?backing) or sponsoring certain political organizations. We are not sponsoring them but simply letting the voiceless organizations express themselves. They have no place to express themselves. But the right to express an idea, the right of association, the right to be together at some point, are all a part of human rights. We want these rights respected. This is why we have been harshly criticized by the current government, which charges that we are not impartial but support various political organizations.

It is only natural and logical, however, that these organizations that struggle in a way that to them is [word indistinct]--be it politically, ideologically or whatever--should find support in the human rights commission. On many occasions they have been unable to meet elsewhere, they have been denied the right to meet, they have been denied the right to express themselves.

More important, newspapers in El Salvador do not reflect opinions. Papers publish half-truths. The worst part is that the state does not have to force the papers into subjection, since by their own nature, because of the patrimony they enjoy, they not only do not report the news but distort the truth.

This is why the Salvadoran people have placed their hopes abroad. Their hopes have no borders; their hopes are placed on journalists such as the ones in front of me right now, who represent the expression of thought and tell people the truth. That truth returns to our people like a boomerang. The people are anxious to learn the truth from the radios and other media of neighboring countries.

In the past El Salvador had fighters such as Jorgito Pinto, who carved a special niche through his newspaper EL INDEPENDIENTE, which has been destroyed three times. That last time, 60 men broke in and destroyed its expensive modern equipment.

Radio Station YSAX, operated by the archbishopric, has also been a victim of at least five attempts, the latest destroying the equipment. At this moment there is a popular campaign underway to get YSAX back in operation because it is a real support for the people, as it expressed their wants and anxieties and told them the truth.

Finally, there is a newspaper published by the archbishopric called ORIENTACION. Under other circumstances, at the present time ORIENTACION would have been destroyed long ago.

Summarizing the situation, the people's hope for a channel to hear the news and voice their demands and aspirations is often frustrated by the temporary absence of means of communication. Therefore--and I say this not as flattery but as a fact--we have a voice of encouragement in Radio Havana, Radio Rebelde, Radio Noticias Del Continente--the latter, located in Costa Rica, we learned with sorrow today was bombed by a plane, according to news we read. We do receive the encouraging Voice of Cuba with undistorted news.

The Human Rights Commission undoubtedly is a ray of hope. Through it the people express their sorrow. Parents search for their children with the certainty that once their dear ones are captured, the search is no longer for them but for their bodies. They want to have the right to give them a decent burial.

Thus we have in El Salvador photography department that takes photos of those we find, because we cannot find all the bodies all over the national territory. We take pictures usually when they are practically unrecognizable for possible identification by their relatives. In such cases we reveal the site of their burial for the relatives' benefit.

Many Salvadoran youths are being killed. Youths in El Salvador no longer have a right to live. This persecution can only be compared to the former hunting of wild boars in North America. In El Salvador any youth standing on a corner is mowed down from moving automobiles.

MONSIGNOR PLEADS FOR REFUGEES, COMMENTS ON JUNTA STATEMENTS

San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 20 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] Monsignor Arturo Rivera Damas, the apostolic delegate in San Salvador, said yesterday that "with the joy we felt at the news of the peace treaty between two fraternal peoples, it was to be hoped that the 10,000 Salvadorans who, according to news from abroad, are in the border area of the two nations, would be given aid and treated as refugees under the protection of the government of Honduras."

The apostolic delegate, speaking of the week's events during his homily at the Sunday mass at the Metropolitan Cathedral, said that the news of the imminent peace treaty with Honduras had been greeted with joy. This treaty comes after 11 years of broken relations. "For 11 years," he said, "economic and political interests have not permitted this peace to be formulated. I use the term 'formulated' because in reality Honduras and El Salvador have always considered each other as brothers. Even when the borders were closed the Hondurans encountered kindness and friendship when they crossed to El Salvador, just as the Salvadorans met with the same treatment in Honduras."

In another part of his homily he mentioned the speeches given by three members of the junta on the occasion of the first anniversary of their rule. "I want to view these speeches as complementary and not divergent, even though they necessarily took somewhat different positions," he said. In analyzing these speeches, Monsignor Rivera said that one member of the junta blamed the present state of affairs on the [illegible]ists; another blamed the leftists, who have tried to destabi[illegible] the government ever since the beginning; and the third membe[illegible]d: "The causes of the crisis we are going through go deeper and lie in the unjust system, full of poverty and misery, political frustration, moral corruption and fraud, under which the people have lived until now."

Monsignor Rivera also noted the positive nature of the accord reached by the government junta with the armed forces, and said: "I will repeat the order that a commitment should be made, especially regarding the regular use of force, the systems of apprehensions, dealings with the citizens, respect for property, rights of the accused, etc."

"How many times," asked Monsignor, "have abuses been denounced, which are now being covered by a legal decree? How many evils would we have been spared and will we now be spared if this decree is truly obeyed?"

"We further ask," he added, "that the spirit of this move toward ideological pluralism be followed; this is the way to establish a new political structure. Why should someone who thinks differently be persecuted? Why not talk with political organizations instead of harassing them?" queried Monsignor Rivera.

TREATMENT OF EMIGRANTS, REFUGEES DEPLORED

San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 13 Oct 80 p 6

[Editorial: "The Salvadoran Situation"]

[Text] As a harsh consequence of the violence that is so cruelly striking this country, thousands of Salvadorans have had to leave their country and take the risk of finding a way to live in another land. We have already referred to this on various occasions, but more specifically since the Arizona tragedy.

Recently, the governments and information media of other countries have concerned themselves with that situation--a situation which undoubtedly causes anguish to thousands of our fellow citizens who have had to leave their fatherland. With respect to the former, we have recently seen that the governments of Honduras and Panama are in the midst of discussions regarding the transfer of 1,000 Salvadorans, through the efforts of the United Nations High Commission on Refugee Problems. It has been said that Honduras cannot undertake the burden represented by the approximately 15,000 Salvadorans who have been obliged to leave their country because of violence, after it received more than 6,000 from Nicaragua, as part of the exodus that left that territory after the Sandinist triumph.

We have returned to the topic because there are two aspects that should be dealt with. One is the treatment that has been accorded by so many countries to the Salvadorans who have been fleeing from El Salvador; and the other, the argument of the Honduran government that the difference [between Honduras and El Salvador] is an obstacle to Honduras' being able to provide shelter for our compatriots, apart from the economic burden to the state.

With respect to how other countries are treating the Salvadorans, Mexico's conduct continues to be astonishing. In Mexico the Salvadorans have been victims of the brutality of some officials or agents of the immigration office, for whom the image of their country abroad doubtless does not matter at all. We said that that behavior has caused astonishment among the Salvadorans, because the Salvadoran people have always had the best of friendly relations with the people of Mexico. In one commentary we said that we have even imported their music and the articles of clothing worn by the mariachi, which means the "Cuscatleco" sentiment has adopted a series of Aztec customs, firmly incorporated into our own in that and other aspects. Nevertheless, what is occurring in Mexico must be viewed as part of the calvary that has fallen to the children of this nation to suffer--they who have been dragged into the worst calamities by a continuing violence and which outsiders do not try to understand, because they are not personally experiencing it, as we are.

With regard to the second point--that which concerns Honduras--we wish to say that its government, fortunately free from the phenomenon that oppresses us all here, must not parry by saying that their difference with El Salvador is still not settled, offering it as an obstacle to its display of willingness and its expression of humanitarianism toward the Salvadorans who arrive on Honduran land. Those are formalities that some day will be settled and they should not govern the noble sentiment of a people who, as in the case of the Honduran people, have fraternized for years with ours. Let us remember that, back in the decade of the 40's, Honduran citizens, driven away from their land for political reasons, came here and found the hospitality in this fraternal country that we Salvadorans accorded them.

NEED FOR PEACE TREATY WITH EL SALVADOR ANALYZED

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 21 Oct 80 p 7

[Editorial: "A Time for Peace"]

[Text] After a lengthy and harsh process, which in many cases seemed bound to lead inexorably toward failure, Honduras and El Salvador have finally managed to reach agreement on signing a peace treaty.

The treaty will be signed at the end of October in Lima, Peru, in the presence of the mediator, the jurist Jose Luis Bustamante y Rivera; before this ceremony, the secretary of foreign affairs of Honduras, Cesar Elvir, will travel to San Salvador to return the visit of friendship which his Salvadoran counterpart, Fidel Chavez, recently made here.

The trip of Elvir Sierra, who will be accompanied by officials and journalists, is scheduled for tomorrow; this is the first time that a representative group of Hondurans will be making an official visit to El Salvador, a nation with which we have had no relations--either diplomatic or commercial--since 1969.

Since the wounds of the war of aggression have begun to heal, LA PRENSA has maintained in its editorials that peace was essential for development. It has reminded its readers that Poland and Germany--after World War II and after a tragic loss of 3 million deaths--ended by signing a peace treaty. It has also pointed out that without peace it is not possible for both countries to achieve the development to which they are entitled, whose need is more apparent now than ever before, because of the huge problems caused by population growth, inflation, and the acute political tensions of our times.

Within the region, the two nations which have historically been closest are unquestionably Honduras and El Salvador.

It is hard to find a single family in each of the two nations which has no blood ties with the other. The Salvadoran soldiers were the ones who served under Gen Francisco Morazan with the greatest dedication, and the many Honduran exiles attest to the friendly and fraternal treatment they have received in their neighboring country, whenever the cyclical disruptions occurring in our country have forced them to seek political refuge.

All this is only part of the issue. There are economic, commercial, manufacturing, and all sorts of factors that favor a reconciliation between Honduras and El Salvador.

Furthermore, there is an unanswerable argument of great significance that can not be overlooked: Central America is now facing a totalitarian threat. Just as the Bible says, "a house divided against itself can not stand," so a shattered nation like the old Territory of the Kingdom of Guatemala cannot fight effectively against communism or any other form of oppression, unless it does so in a coordinated, united and complete way.

For all these reasons, and because of the cultural, family and all the other ties which have to some extent been frozen since the war, there is great enthusiasm among many Honduran citizens about the return of peace.

We have received reliable reports about the nature of the treaty that is to be signed; according to these reports, it is a just, reasonable, and legitimate document, which respects the rights of both parties and guarantees what is most important to us: the definition of the border between the two states.

Of course, there is one factor which was decisive in reaching this agreement: the deep political-military crisis that is shaking El Salvador has weakened its negotiating position.

There was a time when El Salvador, with a high level of economic growth and an apparent political stability, refused to negotiate; it rejected the Honduran proposals and took a position that was little less than imperial.

At that time some angry decisions were made, and El Salvador denounced the Inter-American Treaty on Peaceful Solutions (the Bogota Pact) and said quite strongly that it would not submit to the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in The Hague, Holland.

Today conditions are substantially different; and this has smoothed over the bitterness, to the point that an accord worthy of both parties is now attainable.

We who believe in peace, law and civilized debate are deeply pleased that this solution is being reached, which will put an end to one of the greatest problems facing Honduras.

With this settled, there is one other problem still facing us: the construction of a truly democratic society. We are now on the way, and if we all use good will, we will be successful and thereby achieve what all the people long for: fraternal coexistence, which will promote our development in peace and freedom.

DETERIORATING ECONOMIC SITUATION DISCUSSED AT CONFERENCE

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 20 Oct 80 p 76

[Article by Angel Maria Velasquez: "Conclusion of the Third Economic Congress: The Honduran Development Model Did Not Result in a Triumph for the People"]

[Text] . Honduras continues to be the most underdeveloped nation, with the exception of Haiti.

. Exports are increasing, but production for domestic consumption is decreasing.

. There is public and private mismanagement and irrational use of the human and material resources of our nation.

The Third National Economic Conference, which ended this past Saturday in San Pedro Sula, made known some of its preliminary conclusions of the studies, analyses, and papers presented at the event that led to the conclusion that the Honduran Development Model, as it is being carried out, is incapable of handling the challenge of underdevelopment because, in spite of some indicated changes, "Honduras occupies last place, based on degree of industrial development, among the countries of Central and Latin America, except for Haiti."

According to the varied papers presented at the conference, at present there is no considered model in Honduras for an economic and social policy that provides a framework for the actions of the public sector which in turn would make it possible to orient private activity toward clearly defined objectives.

The analyses establish that the 1979-1983 Development Plan, which could have served as a reference point to which the government should have adhered, was not carried out. Furthermore, even when plans did exist, economic policy actions were not strictly based on them, but were turned aside because of lack of political decision; because there was no established model to improve economic expansion. Social discord is deepening.

The economists question the Honduran Development Model of our country, because they observe a deterioration in the well being of the majority of the Honduran people, manifested by the following indicators.

Private consumption increased only 3.2 percent and the annual population increased 3.5 percent, reflecting a loss in the people's well-being. Inflation has become a mechanism for the transference of resources from the poorest strata to the higher strata, which deepens the process of polarization, with unforeseeable social and political consequences.

According to the papers, another characteristic of the present model is that the increase in investment coefficients in recent years has been financed primarily with foreign credit "which have compromised the country's potential for contracting debts without this effort signifying an improvement in productive activity and in the standard of living of the Honduran people."

With respect to production, the Third National Economic Conference came to the preliminary conclusion that there is a decrease in the production of basic domestic consumption goods, to the benefit of production for exportation, which accentuates the dependence of the national economy, since both commercialization and the prices of products are beyond the control of the Hondurans.

The considerations pointed out in the economists' papers express the opinion that the basic problem of our country has to do with the agrarian reform, which is being implemented extremely slowly. The process has affected a small number of rural families and a small amount of land intended for their distribution. Therefore the process should be revised soon toward the elaboration of a more thorough and comprehensive plan that will embrace political, economic, and social change and new forms of social and individual ownership.

In the presence of this situation, the Third Congress adds that our country has three options: an appeal in behalf of "critical need," through the World Bank, whose objective is to carry out actions to eliminate poverty; another type of development, that involves a change in system; and integrated rural development, advanced by the ILO [International Labor Organization], which combines the two preceding ones.

In summary, the economists conceived the situation as follows: the "Honduran Development Model is characterized by a conflict regarding the appropriation of the surplus; ever-increasing greater concentration of wealth; monopoly of outside commercialization; foreign indebtednes public and private mismanagement; and irrational use of resources."

IMITATION OF CUBA BY FSLN QUESTIONED

PA100235 Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 3 Nov 80 p 2

[Article by Fernando Sequeira: "And Why Not a New Cuba?"--words within slantlines printed in bold face]

[Text] In LA PRENSA's reports and in private conversations I have frequently heard questions being asked as to /where are they taking us, where are we going, what direction are we taking, is this moderate socialism or communism?/ All the questions reflect a certain feeling of uncertainty among sectors which traditionally have the most to lose, according to them.

As an observer of this process, I think that all of these questions and doubts could be simply and categorically resolved by answering once and for all that everything seems to indicate that we are heading /toward a new Cuba/ or a new Nicaragua or whatever other name those interested in putting a label on events want to use.

Naturally, such a categorical (and capricious, if you will) assertion will cause some alarm and panic in certain sectors, and criticism or denial in others. However, I would answer that /what is so bad about wanting to imitate Cubans if Cuba is apparently such a wonderful country?/

The question we should actually ask ourselves is /Is Cuba really a wonderful country or are we imitating Cuba because we simply do not know what else we can do?/

I presume that, at least in the material aspect, Cuba is a marvel of a country, because I refuse to believe that the leaders of the Sandinist National Liberation Front [FSLN], who are all probably dedicated, capable and, above all, intelligent men who have most assuredly spent quite some time in Cuba, would not delude themselves or try to deceive us. To dispel all doubts, it would be good if all of us Nicaraguans were able to verify how wonderful Cuba is.

After clearing up all uncertainty and verifying that Cuba is actually a country worthy of being imitated, the pertinent question would be /Is it a wonderful country because its own resources allow it to be so or because foreign resources allow it to be so?/ In other words, is it true that the Soviet Union is giving it $8, $4 or $2 million daily? If this is true, then the wonder becomes a mirage and mirages fade quickly and generally occur under severe stress or illness. However, some will say that we Nicaraguans can also find ourselves a superpower or friendly country wishing to support us and turn us into a mirage so we can continue imitating the Cubans because, after all, Cuba does seem to be a wonder of a country, even under those circumstances.

I cannot affirm that Cuba is receiving $2 or $4 or $8 million as Carter says. This is outside my reach because to do so one would have to set up a team of economists, mathematicians and sociologists to make a mathematical analysis of the output of Cuba's economy and life, duly taking into account the tremendous impact of the U.S. economic embargo on Cuba's economy.

If the tremendous foreign aid turns out to be a mathematical falsehood, there would be no doubt that the Cuban marvel is actually a marvel. If the contrary is the case, Cuba would be nothing more than an international beggar or one more pawn of the USSR in the geopolitical game. The matter would become further complicated in the latter case because we would have to determine if the USSR is a wonder, or if the United States is a wonder, just in case either one turns out to be our godfather or the geopolitical chess player.

If Cuba does not turn out to be the wonder worth imitating that some of us apparently think it is, we would then end up with the second question I said we should ask ourselves, i.e., /Or is it that we are imitating Cuba because we do not know what else to do?/ In other words, do we Nicaraguans or the FSLN leadership lack imagination or creative ability?

In the fictional anecdote of Sandino's bugler in one of Pablo Antonio Cuadra's typewritten notes, we do not find an answer to the question but we do find a clear-cut attitude to adopt if we are actually imitating Cuba because we do not know what else to do. For the benefit of those who did not read or do not remember Pablo Antonio's writing, the anecdote goes more or less like this: "During one of first attacks against the yankee positions, Sandino ordered that a bugle call be sounded--as was traditionally done by armies when launching an attack. Of course, this put the yankees on the alert and turned the surprise attack into a sad defeat. When reviewing his defeated troops, Sandino found the bugler among the wounded. He took the bugler by his hand for a while and then pushed him aside saying: To hell with the bugle, from now on we will wage our war our own way." That is how the Sandinist guerrilla was born.

To conclude, I am going to take the liberty of haughtily raising the following points: First, there is no reason to feel alarmed or ashamed or to conceal the fact that /we are imitating Cuba/ because Cuba could well be worth imitating and, why invent the wheel again? Secondly, so that we can stop feeling afraid or uncertain about what Cuba apparently is, let a program be established to allow 1 in each 25 Nicaraguans over 25 years of age visit Cuba in the next 2 years. Third, let the nobel foundation in Sweden name a commission to clear up our doubts once and for all as to whether or not Cuba is mathematically a wonder or mirage.

Note: The cost of the second suggestion would be only $2 or $3 million in fares because maybe the Cubans could put us up with their families. There would be no need to worry about the cost of the third proposal because the nobel foundation has lots of money.

There is no need to talk about the first suggestion because /it does not cost a thing/ to become alarmed or ashamed or hide anything.

EPISCOPAL CONFERENCE LETTER DEFINES ROLE OF CATHOLICS

Youth Praised, Families Advised

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 25 Oct 80 pp 1, 9, 12

[Text] On 24 October, the Episcopal Conference of Nicaragua released a new document entitled "Jesus Christ and the Unity of His Church in Nicaragua," in which it recognizes the magnanimity of the youth, and its spirit of service and sacrifice, as well as the increase in faith and religious sentiment among the Nicaraguan people, but at the same time cites the harassment from materialist ideologies in opposition to the Catholic faith.

The new pastoral letter, a 32-page document, contains three chapters, namely: I. Problems of the Catholic Church; II. Fundamental Criteria Based on Faith; and III. The Evangelizing Commitment of the Nicaraguan Christian.

We Speak as Pastors

The introduction to the pastoral letter states: "Just as we were near our people during the country's past vicissitudes, now we also want to express our concern for all their problems and their just aspirations.

"We do not speak as politicians, nor as scientific or technical experts, but rather as pastors of the Catholic Church, who have an ardent awareness that it is our duty to be teachers of a truth which comes from God and which brings with it the principle of the true liberation of man, and is the only one seeking peace in the heart. We do not attempt to speak in order to please people or to cause dismay, nor with uniqueness or a desire for pretense; we only want to be faithful to God and to our brothers.

"We are aware of the newness of the historic experience that we are undergoing; we are at the beginning of a new era in the life of Nicaragua. We believe that this time affords us the opportunity and the responsibility to remake our nation from its foundations."

The Truth of the Process

"It is true that this process of changing socioeconomic, political and cultural structures has aroused hopes and conflicts between opposing interests, as we noted in our previous letter of 17 November 1979.

"The Nicaraguan people, tested in the crucible of suffering and ennobled by their faith in Christ, their devotion to Mary most holy and their fidelity to the Church, want to be the subject of their own history and to make the liberty, justice and independence of the nation a reality.

"However, we cannot fail to say that this historic process, like everything other than Jesus Christ, is for Christianity an ambivalent reality, with its values and accomplishments, and with its flaws and limitations."

Purposes of the Letter

"Christ's charity prompts us to address and speak to all men of good will, particularly the children of the Catholic Church, with the hope of serving them and helping them to discover through our human words the message of salvation which the Redeemer himself has brought us.

"We Christians, reconciled with God and with men, our brothers, through a constant conversion, must evangelize the world in a credible, effective manner."

Problems of the Nicaraguan Catholic Church

"We witness with joy a religious awakening among large sectors of our population. There are many who are sincerely seeking God:

"a. Our youth, in particular, deserve recognition for their magnanimity and spirit of service and sacrifice, recently demonstrated during the literacy campaign, their sharing of religious and civil responsibilities and the intention of some who want to follow Christ in the priestly ministry.

"b. Each day, there are more laymen who are becoming aware of their specific and absolutely necessary function in the mission of the Church. We have evidence of this in the various apostolic movements or paths for growth in the faith, and in the ministries entrusted to the laity that are emerging in our parishes, in fidelity to Christ and the Church.

"c. In the religious sentiments of our people we observe valid elements of an authentic faith, expressed in their patron celebrations, their love for Christ and the Immaculate Virgin, and in a fundamental position toward life or death. It is true that this popular religious sentiment must be made a vital commitment for Christians, but it must never be disrespected, and must always be considered an mainstay and a challenge to the evangelizing effort."

Our Obligation

"Moreover:

"a. We consider it our obligation not to leave our faithful defenseless against the harassment of the materialist ideologies in opposition to the Catholic faith, and not in keeping with it, and of certain fanatical, anti-Catholic religious sects which disrespect our humble faithful.

"b. We think that a serious problem which we have as a Church is the doctrinal and moral confusion that exists among certain Church sectors; this has caused grievous tension among many Catholics.

"The pain and bewilderment caused among our faithful by those who undervalue or disobey the teachings of the pope or the bishops in communion with him seem serious to us.

"This amounts to a scandal when those who act in this way are priests, and religious men and women. The Catholic people, who have the sentiment of faith, clearly perceive the need for communion of the religious men and women, and priests, with their bishop and with the pope, to such an extent that they lose confidence in those whom they observe to be in disagreement with and in opposition to their pastor, or who speak of the pope without due respect.

"To some who, in spite of everything, want to remain within the Catholic Church, the discipline of the Church, including that in the liturgical area, has ceased to be binding on their conscience."

The Family Problems

"c. The Church must devote very special attention to family problems. Our families sometimes suffer disorientation owing to the lack of unity of views among priests who depart from the doctrine of the pope and the bishops on major aspects of family and social morality. We observe that there are some bright spots in the status of the Nicaraguan Christian family; however, there is still a long way to go before we achieve a true Christian life in our homes.

"d. We bishops of Nicaragua recognize that, although some very positive steps have been taken in the pastoral area, we must organize and plan, in order to consolidate the unity of the Church and to bring life to its apostolic action."

Fundamental Criteria Based on Faith

"We must state this at the outset: what is of fundamental concern to us as pastors is the total proclamation of the truth about Jesus Christ, about the nature and mission of the Church and about the dignity and destiny of man (P. Mens).

"We are convinced that our first contribution to the Nicaraguan people is Jesus Christ, clearly and explicitly proclaimed and loved. This proclamation and this love of Jesus, and through him and like him, for our brothers, will make the old evil structures creak and the day of the new creation arise.

"Others may make contributions in the economic, political and social areas; while the contribution to the spiritual transcendence and humanism that is receptive to God can only be made by the believer.

"The divinity of Jesus Christ must never be kept silent, nor his mission reduced to that of a mere social reformer. This is not in accordance with the teachings of the Catholic Church."

Archbishop Obando Speaks

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 25 Oct 80 p 9

[Report on interview with Archbishop Obando; date and place not given]

[Text] The Episcopal Conference of Nicaragua, that is, all the bishops representing the Church, clearly defined the position of members of the Catholic Church concerning party politics. The reaction from some religious was made public in a letter which appeared in a local newspaper. In order to provide the citizens with evidence, LA PRENSA interviewed Msgr Obando, who responded to queries on various subjects.

[Question] Did the Episcopal Conference receive the communique from the religious concerning the Conference's position on the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] document regarding religion? Were they under obligation to send you that publication first?

[Answer] The Episcopal Conference did not receive the communique from them, but we learned about it from a local newspaper. The endeavor to maintain the unity of the Church is an effort that is difficult. It was difficult for Christ himself, who had a strong personality and great wisdom, to maintain the unity of the 12 apostles.

[Question] The confusion created by certain political leaders in their statements about religion and about the obligations of Christians has been dispelled by the pronouncement from the Episcopal Conference. How can some religious continue to think that what the FSLN says about religion is more alined with the truth than what the Church says?

[Answer] Pope John Paul II stressed at Puebla that it is incumbent on the bishops to devise the courses of action for evangelization. But we admit that there will always be difficulties...and Vatican II was clear about this when it stated: "The Church strives to be a mark of salvation, but we admit that there is often a great gap between the message that is preached and the weakness of the evangelizers." (Msgr Obando went on to say) we must recognize that the Church has its wrinkles, and those wrinkles are brought on by the evangelizers, who often err, as we do, in witness.

[Question] Has the Vatican informed the Episcopal Conference about the decision that it is to be the Church of Nicaragua which decides on the status of the priests who are now holding political posts?

[Answer] The Episcopal Conference has publicly stated in the past that there are many laymen capable of holding the positions currently occupied in the government by priests or religious. And we have suggested that they request permission from the Holy See. To date, we have not received any message from the Holy See, but we have taken into consideration an approximate period lasting until December 1980. If the Holy See grants them permission, we shall obediently abide by the decision. If we are told that it is we who are to decide, we shall do so in the Episcopal Conference.

[Question] What advice would you give to parents concerning the problem that has arisen with respect to the education of their children?

[Answer] On the subject of socialism, the bishops of Nicaragua are clear when they say that if, by socialism, it is meant that the people of Nicaragua are prevented from being the masters of their own destiny, we would not be in agreement with that type of socialism. If, by socialism, it is meant that parents are prevented from educating their children in accordance with their own convictions, we would not be in agreement with that type of socialism either. And we have asserted that we bishops reserve the right to make constructive criticism whenever we deem it necessary.

Not Even the Religious Schools...

"I admit that, at the present time, the circumstances are difficult, and I would like to take the opportunity of this interview to recommend to the Nicaraguan family the comment from Medellin that has become so famous, namely, that the family should be the trainer of individuals, the educator of faith and the promoter of development." In a resolute tone, the archbishop continued:

"At the present time, the Nicaraguan family should not rely on the schools, not even the religious schools. They should be concerned with being able to give Christian training in the home itself. And they must be well organized for this. The youth must be trained from an early age for the responsibility of marriage, and (he added), if many families are disorganized now, it is because the preparation of the young people has been wanting. As Vatican II said, we have an obligation to Christianize the environment, and to be witnesses to Christ who died and was resurrected."

[Question] Is there a general principle which speaks of the obligation of the public authorities toward the moral customs of the family and the society? At the present time in Nicaragua, the breakup of marriages is very common, and the Nicaraguan family is undergoing a series of marriage problems which have damaging effects on the children and on the future society. How can this situation be changed?

[Answer] (The monsignor stressed) those who are at the top, at the summit, in any situation, must be the light of the world and the salt of the earth to enlighten with good example. And this is made clear by Saint Paul when he says: "Let us pray for the authorities that we may be able to lead a calm and peaceful life." Those who are directing the destiny of the people must give a good example and help keep the Nicaraguan family from ever becoming disorganized. They are called upon to protect the family, because it is the first cell of the society (declared the archbishop). Furthermore, within a few days we shall issue a pastoral letter in which we shall also deal with the matter of the Nicaraguan family.

[Question] Has the Episcopal Conference made contacts with all its bishops, including the bishop of the Atlantic Coast?

[Answer] Yes. Msgr Salvador, bishop of the Atlantic Coast, was with us, and informed us on the Bluefields problem. And he told us that the Priests Council is active at all times, working with great enthusiasm and not giving up its work nor becoming fearful; because we know that a Christian must always remain with his bow taut, and with his gaze fixed on the stars, performing his mission, regardless of what dangers he may face.

'La Prensa' With the Bishop of Bluefields

LA PRENSA telephoned Bishop Salvador in the city of Bluefields, who told us that a meeting was being held just then by the Priests Council, which includes priests from the four zones of the Atlantic Coast (Puerto Cabezas, Waspan; Las Minas, Rama; Muelle de los Bueyes, Paiwas; and La Cruz, Bluefields). This meeting will last for 3 days, and soon courses will be created for representatives of the Word. "We are working with the social welfare agency," replied Msgr Salvador to our question about the Church's action in connection with the floods of the Coco River. "We have a ham radio operator and he is at the orders of the authorities, as well as three priests who are in the flooded area."

He went on to report on the Church's activities, including a meeting that they had requested of the vice minister of the Atlantic Coast, Lumperto Campbell, which they will hold on Thursday afternoon, 23 October.

Msgr Salvador said: "We, as a Church, are always evangelizing and seeking to help solve the problems of the community. We are cooperating with the Bluefields Junta and with the Bluefields Ecumenical Board (which includes the Christian Churches of the Atlantic Coast),as well as Misurasata [Indian organization]: in short, with all sectors of the population, as befits the mission of the Church," the bishop of the Atlantic Coast stated in conclusion.

BRIEFS

FRG COMMERCIAL TALKS--Representatives of Panama's industrial, banking and government sectors met today with the FRG economic mission visiting our country to examine possible areas of investment in Panama and to make commercial relations between the two countries more dynamic. The most important projects for the German mission are: the development of the fishery industry in the Atlantic, possibly constructing a port in that region and modernizing the port system and its infrastructure. EDITORIAL COMMENT ON NEW CONSTITUTION, PROBLEMS WITH PLEBISCITE

General Content Surveyed

Montevideo EL PAIS in Spanish 3 Nov 80 p 6

[Editorial: "The Seventh Constitution"]

[Text] The Constituent Assembly finished preparing the text of the Constitution to be submitted for the people's ratification on 30 November. If it is approved, it will be the seventh Constitution which Uruguay will have had in the 151 years of its independent existence.

The Constitution of 1830 lasted for 88 years, 7 months and 10 days; that of 1918 lasted for 15 years, 1 month and 17 days; and that of 1934 lasted 9 years, 8 months and 27 days, exceeded only by that of 1952, with 9 years, 11 months and 9 days. The Constitution of 1952, for its part, was in effect for 15 years and 20 days, and if the text that has just been devised goes into effect on 15 February 1982, the Constitution of 1967 will go out of existence on that day, having completed its 15 years exactly.

The new Constitution will consist of 239 articles and 10 Temporary Provisions, and will be considerably longer than that of 1830, which had only 159 articles, and even that of 1918, with 178 articles and 10 Temporary Provisions; although it will be considerably shorter than those which followed it. In this respect, it should be recalled that the Constitution of 1934 had 284 articles and 12 Temporary Provisions; that of 1942 had 282 articles and 6 Temporary Provisions; and those of 1952 and 1967 had 332 articles and 21 Temporary Provisions.

Thus, our country has adhered to the line of long constitutions abandoned several years ago by other charters. As a factor for comparison, we might recall that the French Constitution of 4 October 1958 contained only 92 articles; the Fundamental Law of the Federal Republic of Germany of 23 May 1949 had 146 articles; that of the People's Republic of China, dated 20 September 1954, had only 106; that of Norway, dated 17 May 1965, had only 112; that of Finland, dated 17 July 1919, had only 95; that of the United Arab State, dated 5 March 1958, had only 73; that of the Republic of Tunisia, dated 10 June 1959, consisted of 64 articles; that of Belgium, dated 29 September 1971, had only 140; and the Italian Constitution of 1948 had only 139 articles, to cite just a few examples.

The draft Constitution which is to be expedited by the citizenry has given rise to many varied comments, and consecutive editorials on this page will be devoted to them.

Without interfering with an overall analysis, a more or less detailed comment is in order on the various articles, for which purpose a study will be made today of the 58 approved in the first session last Monday.

In this connection, we must begin by stating that there are 28 articles which have been kept unchanged (five are from the Constitution of 1830, two from that of 1918, 15 from that of 1934, one from that of 1942, three from that of 1952 and two from that of 1967); that there are 11 articles in which slight changes have been made in grammar or terminology ("National Exchequer" is replaced by "National Treasury "the slightest aggression" is replaced by "all," "surety" by "bond," "duty" by "obligation," "improvement" by "prosperity," "asylum" by "protection" and "official" by "accused"), which do not in fact change the original content; that 13 articles have been eliminated completely (one was from the Constitution of 1930, and four apiece from the Constitutions of 1934, 1952, and 1967); that more or less major changes have been made in 29 articles from the previous texts; and that in this group of laws approved in the first session, there is only one new article.

Rather than expand upon those which have been retained (Articles 1, 2, 4, 7, 8, 10, 14, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 24, 25, 26, 28, 30, 32, 34, 36, 38, 39, 40, 47, 48, 58, 70 and 73) from the present Constitution, and those which have just been changed (Articles 5, 22, 27, 41, 42, 44, 45, 46, 51 and 72), it would be of more public significance to comment on the other three groups in the draft.

For example, there is a total or partial elimination of the articles stipulating that the nation will never be the possession of any individual or family, originating in the Constitution of 1830; the one prohibiting the establishment of primogeniture rights and stipulating that no authority may confer any title of nobility, or hereditary honors or distinctions, which originated partially in the Constitutions of 1830 and 1934; the one allowing the common law to establish trial by jury in criminal cases; the one which states that the welfare of the family, its establishment, preservation, privilege and transmission will be the object of special protective legislation; paragraph 1 of the current Article 5, approved in 1967, stipulating that the state will direct foreign trade, protecting the productive activities intended for import purposes, or replacing imported goods, as well as stating that the law will foster investments designed for that purpose and will channel public savings primarily to that end; the elimination of Article 52, which bans usury, explaining that the law citing a maximum limit on interest for loans is one of public order, nevertheless maintaining the old principle of the Constitution of 1934 to the effect that no one may be deprived of his freedom because of debts.

Finally, it eliminates Article 56, which states that any business firm whose features call for the permanent status of the personnel in the establishment, will be obliged to provide them adequate food and housing; Articles 62 to 65, from the Constitution of 1952, regulating the Statute of the public official in a different manner; Article 79, permitting accumulation of political parties, which perhaps may be regretted in the near future; and it limits the lengthier content of the present Article 254 to the brief remark that "the administration of justice will be free of charge for those declared poor, in accordance with the law."

As has been noted, major changes were made in nearly 30 articles discussed during the first session.

Article 6, which originated in the Constitution of 1934, with a second new paragraph, states: "In the international treaties that it concludes, the republic will propose the clause that any differences which may arise between the contracting parties will be decided through arbitration or other peaceful means. The republic will seek the social and economic integration of the Latin American state, especially insofar as the mutual protection of their products and raw materials is concerned. It will also foster the effective complementation of their public services." That version is better than the one proposed, which omitted any mention of arbitration and virtually the entire second paragraph, adding a paragraph in which an obligation is cited to promote "abiding respect for the principle of nonintervention in the internal affairs of states."

As for the old law, from the Constitution of 1918, whereby the home is an inviolable sanctuary, search during the night with a court order is now allowed; it is explained that no penalties may be imposed other than by virtue of a law promulgated before the commission of the act which promoted them; the semicomplete expression relating to the possibility of arrest is replaced by "sufficient evidence for conviction"; the period for initiating summary proceedings is extended from 48 to 72 hours; the boards of directors of the media are included among those responsible for publications in the press; there is recognition for the right to security of the inhabitants, regulated in a manner different from that in the Constitution of 1967; researchers are added to those protected for intellectual work; and "civil magistrate" is replaced by "competent judge" in stipulating who may order the rendering of assistance.

In a different area, it limits immigration only "for reasons of general interest," making the principles of the Constitution of 1967 general; it stipulates the protection of minors in a different manner; it eliminates the declaration of 1967 whereby "the state will direct the foreign trade of the republic, protecting the productive activities intended for export or replacing imported goods; the law will promote investments intended for this purpose, and will channel public savings primarily to that end;" it changes the regulation on workers' rights, stipulating secret voting on "important decisions," and banning strikes by public servants; and it changes the principles that must govern the rights of public servants.

Finally, in another statement, it recognizes social security ("at the sole behest of the executive branch and the approval by three fifths of the votes of all the members of each chamber"); it includes among the goals of education that of "maintaining technical efficiency, as well as protecting the fundamental bases of the nation's status and of constitutional order," as for tax exemptions for private educational institutions, it limits them to those "governed in accordance with the requirements of the law," and it includes intellectual training with the moral and civic training that educational institutions must offer.

In the chapter on citizenship and suffrage (which will be called "and of political parties"), it extends the present 3 years required to be entitled to legal citizenship to 5 years of residence; citizenship is not required to hire "technicians that may be considered necessary in the view of the executive branch," and there are changes in certain paragraphs relating to the right of suffrage and the suspension of citizenship.

As for the right to security recognized generally in Article 7 of the Constitution of 1830, it is now reiterated in an independent article ("every inhabitant of the republic is entitled to security"), and Article 3 of Constitutional Decree No 5 is also included.

During the mere 30 days separating us from the plebiscite, the missing articles may be analyzed again.

Single Presidential Candidate Scored

Montevideo EL DIA in Spanish 2 Nov 80 p 8

[Editorial: "Single Candidate"]

[Text] The current political comment is undoubtedly highlighted by the temporary provisions finally voted on with the text of the constitutional reform to be subjected to a plebiscite this month.

We state this clearly because, whatever the significance of the draft Constitution that has been approved and of some of the changes made in its content, in the final analysis it corresponds generally to what was announced since the publication of the guidelines, and also because, in the course of the days before the plebiscite is held, it will be possible to revert to them and analyze them in some degree.

The citizenry, on the other hand, has received the information relating to the way in which the designation of the next president of the republic is arranged in the aforementioned temporary provisions with genuine surprise.

Everyone knows that, since the initial stages of the so-called timetable, its authors referred to the designation of a single candidate for 1981. In other words, this is not an element of surprise nor anything new. However, the criticism which that solution evoked generally among all independent areas was not in that category either, among many other reasons because, apart from imposing conditions on the future freedom of the parties, even from the standpoint of vocabulary, it does not seem proper to talk about elections when a choice is lacking. There is an actual choice between two or more candidates; but if there is only one candidate, one cannot talk about an election, but only confirmation.

This reasoning has been reiterated several times, and there has been in the country a real expectation regarding a favorable solution to the issue; in other words, with a determination that would make a multiplicity of candidates possible, in accordance with what is the well-known desire of the nation. On various occasions, including when the subject was brought up in questions from the press, the issue was cited as something which would eventually be decided at a later date.

That later date has arrived, and the aforementioned provision definitively settles the issue. It also does so in a manner contrary to the general hopes and desires of the people. But, in addition, it compounds it with a connotation which, insofar as we are aware, was not contained in the timetable either.

In fact, unless we are mistaken, we believe that we remember that when mention was made of a "single candidate" representing the two traditional parties, what was being referred to was basically an agreement between them. In other words, both groups, when they are in a position to operate, something which has not occurred and will not occur before the plebiscite, but which has been announced for next year, will be obliged to seek a common candidate.

The text of the temporary provision which has now settled the issue goes further still. What is involved essentially is not an agreement among parties, but rather with the parties. The text states precisely that, "...the Armed Forces will seek the conclusion of a patriotic agreement with the political parties on the basis of single candidates of national unity for the positions of president and vice president of the republic," etc.

It goes beyond what had been understood, even in the event of the maintenance of a single candidate, because on the basis of the text that has been released, even if the two large parties should reach agreement on a candidate, it would not be sufficient. The agreement will be promoted by the Armed Forces, which will also be a party to the deal, unless we have made a mistake in interpreting a text which seems clear to us.

If this agreement is not reached, for whatever reason (including the very obvious one that the participating parties, with the same patriotism, may nevertheless have legitimately different views), the next president of the republic will be designated in accordance with the procedure called for by Institutional Act No 2 (June 1976).

Thus, the transition period which begins in 1982 does not mean that the citizens will directly participate in the selection of the holder of the most important elective office.

In the event that the candidate is eventually nominated through the aforementioned procedure, the political parties which have not participated either in the text of this constitutional reform nor in the plebsicite and its natural controller, would end up not participating in the election of the next president either.

We do not hesitate to state that, in our judgment and regardless of how much we analyze the text and its inferences, this is a serious mistake which we deeply regret, and which is not in keeping with the spirit of democratic openness that the republic, its traditions and its people rightfully demand.

Blank Vote Count Questioned

Montevideo EL PAIS in Spanish 1 Nov 80 p 13

[Editorial: "The Method of Counting the Blank Votes"]

[Text] One of the problems posed in connection with the constitutional plebiscite of 30 November stems from the manner in which the blank votes which, under a system of compulsory suffrage with its obvious effect of reducing the percentage of abstentions, could prove to be an appreciable number, will be counted. This question, which at first was taken for granted as one to be settled by the Electoral Court, but which would now appear to be handled outside of the latter's jurisidiction, therefore requiring the expedient of a law or an institutional act, is of indisputable importance, owing to its close connection with the criterion to be applied for proclaiming the results of the election.

In this regard, it is fitting to maintain the logical justification for a view similar to that of the assessment of the "yes" vote and the "no" vote. Both the positive and the negative option have quite clear significance and intention, and are completely independent of the consequences of a political nature which either option might cause, as well as of any presumable expression of desire that would imply a judgment in favor of or opposed to the state of institutional temporariness that prevails in the republic. From this standpoint, which is admissible only in the case of an act ratifying new constitutional regulations, those voting "yes" and "no" are only stating that they are for or against such regulations acquiring authentic, legitimate force.

In the case of the blank votes, the rational solution should be devised on identical conceptual grounds. Those who vote in such a way that their opinion on the matter subjected to the plebiscite for a pronouncement cannot be known, are neither tacitly unopposed to the new institutionality's being in effect, as has erroneously been interpreted in the case of the recent Chilean plebiscite, nor are they issuing a tacit opinion rejecting the drafted Constitution. They are simply refraining from any expression of desire in one direction or the other.

To be sure, there may be among the number of voters who cast a blank ballot some inspired by the intention of expressing repudiation for the plebiscite itself as an institutional solution; just as there may be "yes" voters who act prompted by a feeling of adherence to the present government and its endeavor, and "no" voters influenced by the intention of expressing, in their own way, their status as opposition to that same government and to the national restoration process. But all this is in the realm of mere supposition concerning problems related to the inner recesses of each voter, which are completely dissociated from the issue prompting the convocation of the people to the polls.

For the reasons cited herein, it is necessary that the problem of the method of counting the blank votes in the constitutional referendum be solved.

If, as has already been announced, the citizens' decision is to be based on a simple majority of votes, and the constitutional ruling in effect since 1934 on an additional requirement that this majority must represent 35 percent of those qualified to vote will not have any effect in this instance, the count should be made by simply considering only the votes cast as "yes" or "no", and hence if the former exceeded the latter it would suffice to have the Constitution ratified.

If this were the case, the fact, which cannot be precluded, that the affirmative votes might not exceed 50 percent of the total valid votes should be considered totally irrelevant to the proclamation of the results; because to act otherwise would entail making the mistake of counting the blank votes as negative. As has been demonstrated, we trust sufficiently, there is not in either the proposal or the mechanism of the plebiscite any valid reason to consider them anything other than the expression of a desire to refrain from voicing an opinion, and to limit themselves to complying with the ruling that stipulates compulsory suffrage.

Moreover, although it is true that, from the standpoint of proving popular support for the drafted Constitution, a clearly larger percentage of "yes" votes from the total number of voters would be preferable, it is not true that demanding such an accomplishment to consider the ratification by the plebiscite attained would be tantamount to falsifying the correct interpretation of the citizens' decision, and attaching to the presence of those indifferent to an opportunity for a democratic solution or those remiss in complying with their civic duties an importance as improper as it would be undeserved.

FEDECAMARAS URGES REVISION OF ANDEAN PACT COMMITMENTS

Caracas RESUMEN in Spanish 2 Nov 80 p 28

[Text] An analysis made of Venezuela and the Andean Pact by FEDECAMARAS [Association of the Chambers of Commerce and Industry] concludes by stating: "There is an urgent need to undertake a revision of Venezuela's commitments in the Andean Pact, so as to rationalize its participation, preventing it from becoming a restraint on its internal development and its projection to other countries."

The aforementioned leading private economic entity argues that, "The purpose of Latin American economic integration is to establish an expanded economic area that will make it possible to benefit from the advantages of produtive specialization, and the application of economies of scale, and to make more rational use of the available resources."

It declares: "Among these major guidelines which apply to both LAFTA [Latin American Free Trade Association] and the Andean Pact, the latter adds as an objective the achievement of balanced and harmonious development among its members, in order to attain constant improvement in the standard of living of the subregion's inhabitants. This balanced, harmonious development, it adds, should lead to an equitable distribution of the benefits stemming from the integration among the member nations."

FEDECAMARAS notes: "Moreover, the principle of reciprocity obliges each country to carry out a collective development, compensated for with concrete benefits, so that the balance among all of them will always bring positive results.

"The institutional and program mechanisms established in the Cartagena Agreement, and previous decisions, stipulate sectorial industrial development programs, a plan for the main Andean highway system, agreements on communications, multinational companies, a common system for foreign investments, and for patents, licenses and technology, mechanisms for paying LAFTA, a mutual reserve fund, Andean technological development programs, and the creation of the Andean Development Corporation, and the Andres Bello, Simon Rodriguez and Hipolito Unanue Social Conventions."

FEDECAMARAS states: "Through the years, business owners have retained a feeling of disappointment in their expectations, which was confirmed when the Board of the Cartagena Agreement, in its evaluation of the integration process from 1969 to 1979, declared: 'For Venezuela, the Andean integration may be considered marginal, if a quantitative, short term standard is applied.' And it adds: 'Its impact has been of a qualitative, and especially political nature, and can be assessed rather over the medium and long terms." It adds that, for the other countries, however, the Board cites economically calculable positive results.

FEDECAMARAS states: "This discrepancy between expectations and results is due to a large number of reasons. In the international realm (it notes), there is the tendency to continue the process of substituting imports at all costs, and to force the process of development in the countries that are relatively less economically developed, forgetting the principle of specialization, based on the comparative advantages of each country and granting those less developed countries countless benefits which have a negative effect on the development of their partners."

Having given the foregoing explanation of this important point, FEDECAMARAS observes: "At the same time, within our borders, problems of various types have arisen, ranging from higher production costs to incompatibility between the international standards which we are committed to uphold and the guidelines for the industrial development policy."

FEDECAMARAS remarks: "This situation of inconsistency, of differences between the national development plans and the subregional development plans, of decisions made in favor of integration but overlooking the country's legitimate interests, of commitments assumed internationally which cannot be implemented later in any of the countries and of sacrifices on behalf of community development without an obvious compensation has caused the results of the integration to prove negative for business owners."

And, commenting at length on this critical point, FEDECAMARAS adds: "And an examination of the future prospects, based on the various areas that are currently being negotiated, the common external tariff, regulations on the origin of commodities, programs for the development of the iron and steel, fertilizer, chemical, pharmochemical and electronics industries, technical standardization and quality control, as well as others, also proves to be negative, since none of these proposals takes the special interests of Venezuela into consideration."

Hence, FEDECAMARAS concludes by saying: "For this reason, there is an urgent need to undertake a revision of Venezuela's commitments in the Andean Pact, so as to rationalize its participation, preventing it from becoming a restraint on its internal development and its projection to other countries."

CVF PROPOSES SALE OF STATE COMPANIES TO PRIVATE SECTOR

Caracas RESUMEN in Spanish 2 Nov 80 pp 32-33

[Text] The sale to the private sector of companies owned by the state, including sugar companies, hotels, agroindustrial firms and even metalworking plants, which are currently causing the nation losses has been announced by sources associated with the Venezuelan Development Corporation (CVF) who noted that, from a numerical standpoint, this means that of the 80 companies run by the aforementioned state agency, 60 would be transferred to the private sector.

It has been estimated that the book value of the firms in question that CVF intends to transfer to the private sector is on the order of 1.3 billion bolivares; and it is CVF's aspiration that the presumed purchasers will offer firm guarantees, in addition to the assets which would be negotiated to guarantee such sales, in the event that they were made with easy payment terms, that is, with credit.

What has not yet been stated is whether such sales of state companies would be made by bidding, or under what terms. Precedents exist, such as when CVF divested itself of Maracay Looms, a transaction which evoked much comment because of the way in which it was carried out. The fact is that it was purchased by a group of textile importing dealers, who claimed that they encountered some unproductive equipment (looms, etc.), and therefore they converted their production into new lines (canvas and duck) which used to be imported in large quantities. With this, and the pertinent protection, they succeeded in converting a company that was operating year after year at a loss for the state, into one with substantial profits for the private owners, and even for the treasury, because of its participation through the income tax. As industrial and commercial sources (the latter also being very ambitious to establish industries in certain instances) commented: "This decision should have been made a long time ago, not only by CVF but also by other state agencies, which have been converted into 'printing industries' and even the most unlikely businesses, of course with losses for the nation." It was also noted that, "The government could very readily save the 5-odd billion in annual losses by getting rid of the respective firms causing them, as the Central Bank of Venezuela stated in its latest Economic Report."

There is consensus in the private sector that, "Since there is no damage in the public sector, the money is treated 'easy come, easy go,'" and that "what concerns many in the long run concerns no one, and thus, with that course of action, the vast majority of the state companies have become converted into a bottomless sack of losses." Then they add: "Not even the funds from oil suffice to compensate for what is represented by the disastrous administrative management of those who, owing to political influence, have come to occupy positions and perform functions for which they are not trained and do not even know how to perform."

Those comments include the public disclosure that, "Generally, these state companies originated in the opportunism offered in consecutive administrations to individuals backed by cliques, political membership cards and similar things, without other credentials to justify them; and what is worse, without responsibility nor any guarantee of responsibility, as is the case in all public positions." They remark: "The difference consists of the fact that, in the private sector, guarantees and bonds are required even to hold a cashier's position; and in the public sector one need only have what is called 'a good recommendation from party A or B.' Then, when the problems of losses of all kinds arise, with the washing of hands like Pilate, everyone is considered exempt from all responsibility, as in the Sierra Nevada case and that of the Antimano land; so that the ones who are always 'condemned' are the people, who have had nothing to do with the business."

They claim: "This is why the notion of the state's divesting itself of all these odds and ends which, in its hands, are only causing losses to the nation, must be received with approval. Now, all that we need to know is how the sale of those companies to private owners will be made."

GEOLOGICAL STRUCTURE OF GULF OF VENEZUELA SURVEYED

Caracas RESUMEN in Spanish 2 Nov 80 pp 18-20

[Text] The Gulf of Venezuela is one of the most interesting areas of the Venezuelan continental shelf. Although its geology is still little known, certain specialized publications that have appeared during the past 15 years give us an idea of its most important features. The works of Coronel (1967), Coronel (1972), Kiser (1972) and Gonzalez de Juana, Arozena and Picard (1980) help us to understand the geology of this area, although there are no data obtained directly from the exploratory drilling, but only seismographic data and, of course, the extrapolation from knowledge of the geology of the adjacent land areas (the Paraguana and Goajira Peninsulas, and northern areas of Falcon and Zulia).

1. Physiographic features and geological nature of the adjacent areas

The Gulf of Venezuela lies in the northwest corner of Venezuela and covers an area of about 15,000 square kilometers. The depth of the water varies between 15 and 80 meters, although 80 percent of the area does not exceed 40 meters in depth. The Gulf is bounded on the west and east by the tectonic blocs of Goajira and Paraguana, respectively, areas wherein the igneous and metamorphic rock known generically as "base" crops out on the surface, forming topographic elevations of moderate relief. Toward the south, the Gulf has a boundary with the Maracaibo Basin, one of the richest oil-bearing areas in the world. However, between the Maracaibo Basin and the Gulf of Venezuela there may be a very sizable geological separation comprised of the Oca Fault. This fault is one of the largest structural elements in Venezuela, and appears to extend from west to east, from the Perija mountains to the northern section of Caracas, where it joins the El Pilar Fault of eastern Venezuela. If this separation were confirmed by the drilling, the geological features of the Gulf of Venezuela might prove to be different from those of the Maracaibo Basin; in other words, less attractive from the standpoint of oil content. Toward the southeast, the Gulf of Venezuela meets the Dabajuro Platform and the Falcon Tertiary Basin. As may be observed from the structural sketch, the Oca Fault passes south of these geological provinces, and hence it is possible to predict that the geological features of sectors of the Gulf will be quite similar to those provinces. To be sure, this is not so favorable for the oil prospects of the Gulf, because the Falcon Basin has been very meager in this respect.

To the north, the Gulf of Venezuela meets the open sea and such islands as Curacao and Aruba, comprised of igenous and volcanic rock, and some tertiary sediment that is not very thick.

2. Geological history of the Gulf of Venezuela

Over 200 million years ago, the Gulf of Venezuela was part of solid ground, together with Guajira, Paraguana and northern Venezuela. The were lowlands, subject to fluvial and eolian erosion. One hundred and seventy-five million years ago, a cycle of volcanic activity began in the area which gave way to a marine (Cretaceous) transgression that deposited, in northern Venezuela, including the Gulf, such marine sediments as limestone and shale, some of it under anaerobic (with little oxygen) conditions, which fostered the conversion of animal and vegetable remains into petroleum, and explains the large gas and oil-bearing deposits in the Maracaibo Basin.

The Cretaceous seas became deeper and more open, allowing for the deposit of shale and limestone from the Upper Cretaceous period 100 million years ago. After this major invasion of the seas, significant tectonic and orogenetic (formation of mountains) occurred in the area, and it is possible that the rock in Goajira, Paraguana and parts of Falcon was converted into metamorphic rock, and lost its capacity to produce hydrocarbons.

About 60 million years ago, there was another invasion of the seas in the Gulf area. However, this transgression was not so sizable as the one that occurred about 100 million years ago, producing sediment with very slight deltaic depth, such as calcareous sand and carbonaceous shale.

Less than 50 million years ago, the Gulf was partially raised above sea level, forming the West Gulf platform, not in the catastrophic manner cited previously, but rather in a slow, gradual way (epirogenetic and not orogenetic). This event caused the separation between the Gulf's western platform and its eastern basin. During the past 40 million years, the eastern part of the Gulf has received thousands of meters of sediment, whereas the western platform has received only 2,000-3,000 meters of sediment. Between the two areas there is a large truncated zone which could be one with oil-bearing prospects.

3. Major structural features

As we have noted, the Gulf of Venezuela has a western platform on which the young sediment lies directly on top of the igneous-metamorphic base; a truncated area, against which the oldest sediment is wedged, allowing for the theoretical existence of stratigraphic traps; and an eastern basin, in which over 10 kilometers of sediments are deposited and there are structures which are structural traps that might store oil, if the oil was formed in the area.

4. Oil-bearing potential

Until the Gulf of Venezuela is subjected to a systematic, progressive exploration, it would not make much sense to speculate on its oil-bearing potential. If the Gulf proves to be an extension of the Falcon Basin, its oil-bearing potential will be slight. If, perchance, the Gulf has more affinity with the Maracaibo Basin, its potential will be far more promising.

The only responsible statement that can be made at present is that the complete exploration of the Gulf should be carried out as soon as possible; because, in the event that oil-bearing deposits were to be discovered, it would take at least about 10 years and several billion bolivares to develop them. The cost of each wildcat well in the Gulf is estimated at about 30 million bolivares.

Therefore, we deem it necessary to start the exploration of the Gulf as promptly as possible, in an orderly and systematic fashion. A settlement of the dispute that is fair and reasonable, one which will make it possible to progress forward in an atmosphere of harmony with our neighbors, will have our most resolute support. From all indications, we are on the threshold of such an agreement.

YPFB PROMOTES USE OF LIQUEFIED GAS

La Paz EL DIARIO in Spanish 1 Nov 80 p 3

[Text] Bolivian Government Oil Deposits (YPFB), in accordance with its policy of conserving liquid fuels and replacing them with liquefied gas, is installing another 103 conversion systems among its motorized units.

The installations are being done in the depots of Santa Cruz, Cochabamba, Sucre, Camiri, La Paz and Oruro. Others were done months ago in motorized units such as trucks, pick-up trucks, jeeps, automobiles and others.

The installation of the "kits" will be finished by the end of November. The work is being carried out by Bolivians who have received specialized training before the implementation of the project.

The state oil enterprise revealed that in La Paz and various districts of the country a significant number of motorized units belonging to private parties are already operating on liquefied gas through a conversion system installed in them. One major feature of this system is that liquid fuel as well as gas can be used with no problem. However, the users are gradually using more liquefied gas than gasoline because of the technical and economic benefits.

The report indicates that in La Paz more than 1,600 liters of liquefied gas are consumed each day for transportation. This amount represents a significant increase over earlier months, as motorists begin to realize the technical and economic advantages of the fuel.

In La Paz there is a liquefied gas distribution center exclusively for vehicles, located at the Entre Rios station in the Cemetery zone.

YPFB plans to build similar stations in 1981 in Cochabamba, Santa Cruz, Sucre and Oruro.

BRIEFS

OIL PRODUCTION--Brazilian oil production increased 12.27 percent in the January-October period of this year as compared with the same period last year. During this period the country produced 57 million barrels with a daily average of 188,214 barrels. Production on the continental shelf [off shore] increased by 42.22 percent during this period with a daily average output of 76,522 barrels. In the meantime inland oil production experienced a reduction in view of the exhaustion of the wells of Reconcavo da Bahia. During the first 10 months of this year this sector of oil production experienced a 1.89-percent reduction. (Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 13 Nov 80 p 20]

FIRST SMALL PILOT HYDROELECTRIC PLANT TO BE BUILT

PA151933 Bogota Domestic Service in Spanish 1730 GMT 15 Nov 80

[Text] Bogota--The manager of the Colombian Electrical Power Institute, ICEL, Carlos Rodado Noriega, announced that Colombia will build, with Colombian technology and materials, the first small pilot hydroelectric plant for Latin America, with 200-kv capacity.

The initiative is the result of one of the decisions of the first Latin American seminar on small hydroelectric plants held in Girardot from 2 through 8 November, organized by ICEL and the Latin American Energy Organization, OLADE.

The event was attended by 59 international delegations, representatives of 19 countries from this continent and observers from international entities such as the Inter-American Development Bank, IDB, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, UNIDO, and the Secretariat of Central American Economic Integration, SIECA. In addition, there were 50 Colombian experts and officials representing energy companies, universities, manufacturers and the government present.

Rodado Noriega added that the small hydroelectric plants are generations units with capacities of up to 5,000 kv, which use small rivers and waterfalls, abundant in Latin America, to satisfy the energy needs of the rural communities lacking such service and which, because of their location, cannot be serviced by the large electric systems.

PANAMANIAN PRESIDENT ASKS ARGENTINE COUNTERPART NOT TO RESTRICT BOOKS

PA071451 Panama City LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 26 Oct 80 pp 1-A, 8-A

[Cable sent by Panamanian President Aristides Royo to Argentine President Jorge Rafael Videla G., on 24 October 1980]

[Text] We have learned with sorrow of recent measures that restrict the circulation of important literary works. It is distressing that a country which has produced such writers as Jorge Luis Borges, such epic poets as Martin Fierro and scientists of the stature of Bernaldo Houssay should be deprived of the chance to learn to love with the verses of Pablo Neruda solely because this great universal poet, who died of sorrow over the fate of his country, transmitted his political concerns to his poems. The beacon of light from Argentine universities that shines over the entire continent cannot be extinguished by a decree.

As a Panamanian and a Latin American, I appeal to your government's good judgment to urge that there be no repetition of the burning of books as was done by the Nazi-fascists and that there be no going to the extremes by considering Kant and Hegel to be subversive elements as occurred in Greece some years ago.

The fathers of our countries fought against the tribunals of the inquisition. Thanks to them, we have freedom of religion in our countries. Do not now permit a cultural inquisition because, in this century, this would not prevent freedom for literary creation. [sentence as published]

ARGENTINE PRESIDENT ANSWERS ROYO ON BOOK BURNING

PA071544 La Estrella DE PANAMA in Spanish 2 Nov 80 pp A-1, A-14

[Text] The following is the response by Lt Gen Jorge Rafael Videla, Argentine president, to his Panamanian colleague, Aristides Royo, in connection with a message that the Panamanian president sent him on the burning of books in that country:

31 October 1980

The Argentine people have, as Your Excellency must know, a long and honorable historic tradition that includes their unyielding commitment to the freedom and the dignity of man.

We, their rulers, fully share that commitment and we work every day to keep it alove.

Only we Argentines know what pain and suffering we have endured to fully uphold these values in the republic.

For this reason, the message that Your Excellency has sent me in connection with an alleged restriction of the circulation of literary works constitutes manifest ignorance of our reality.

In addition, the reports to which Your Excellency refers are completely inaccurate, thereby showing that the Panamanian Government has proceeded hastily and in a biased way.

Furthermore, the lack of courtesy entailed in the premature publication of your message has hurt the mutual respect on which the relations between two sovereign states should be based.

But, above all, the incident protagonized by Your Excellency implies an inadmissible interference in our domestic affairs, which obviously fall within the exclusive purview of the Argentine authorities and people.

We deplore that Your Excellency has compromised the relations between our countries forgetting the honorable tradition to which I have referred, being uninformed about the Argentine reality and, in addition, violating elementral principles of coexistence among nations.

Believe me, Mr President, I deplore this incident, which obscures a friendship which was strengthened when we were pleased to celebrate the result of the Panama Canal negotiations and when we laid the groundwork for a better reciprocal understanding with General Torrijos.

Your Excellency does not know how painful it is for me to have to address these lines to the president of Panama and I do not doubt that he will understand without further explanations my need to make it public. Greetings to Your Excellency.

Sincerely,

CHILEAN-PERUVIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE FORMED

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 25 Oct 80 p C-3

[Article by Gilberto Wilton]

[Text] Arica--A first step to overcome common problems in commercial exchanges between both countries was taken yesterday in this city with the official establishment of the Chilean-Peruvian Chamber of Commerce. The organization was formalized during a meeting which was attended by the top leaders of the Chilean National Chamber of Commerce and the Peruvian Federation of Chambers of Commerce and representatives of specialized associations, regional chambers of commerce and businessmen from the neighboring city of Tacna.

The agreement, one of the most important within the framework of the annual meeting which the National Chamber of Commerce holds in this city, was signed by its president, Guillermo Elton, and by the president of the Peruvian Federation, Augusto Ramos, in the presence of the consul of Arica, Mario Parejas Lecaros; the president and secretary general of the Tacna Chamber of Commerce, Oscar Martorel and Hector Chavera, respectively; and officials who are part of the directorate of the new binational entity. The Peruvian commercial attache in Santiago, Roberto Rodriguez, and Jesus Angulo, an official of the Peruvian Export Promotion Fund, also attended the meeting.

Before the Chilean-Peruvian Chamber of Commerce was established, Guillermo Elton read a message sent by Foreign Minister Rene Rojas Galdames which congratulated him for this initiative.

In the telegram, among other things, the minister said, "I hope the new organization will contribute to the even greater intensification of the bonds of friendship which unite the sister nations of Chile and Peru and will serve as an effective instrument for the promotion of the commercial exchanges of both countries."

Later, the vice president of the National Chamber of Commerce, Luis Escobar, and the president of the new organization, Antonio del Curto, spoke. They emphasized the importance the signing of this agreement will have for mutual commercial relations.

Escobar expressed his confidence that in a new and imminent stage "the Joint Commission will meet and take up matters relating to the movement of travelers, the development of trade and tourism, particularly in the border region." He added that the Joint Commission, "as is obvious, will not on its own decision be able to reestablish normal diplomatic relations. The resolution of this problem falls to the governments, and the sooner it is taken care of the better the relations of friendship will be between the two countries."

For his part, Del Curto recalled that for various reasons bilateral trade had declined significantly "preventing our peoples from enjoying products of great international quality and prestige. The new political and economic conditions which fortunately are being established in our countries will make it possible to set up bilateral organizations to promote and make concrete a new stage in commercial exchanges which have been so beneficial in the past."

Future of Commercial Exchanges

Referring to the establishment of the organization, the consul in Arica, Mario Parejas, told EL MERCURIO that the entity "is important because now we will have an institution which will study commercial exchanges. There will be dialog, and, therefore, there will be happy solutions. Also, it is important to conciliate the interests of the two countries and to quickly reactivate situations which have not been functioning."

With respect to a rapid renewal of relations at the level of ambassadors, the Peruvian diplomat said, "The relations of one country with another should always be profound. The doors with Chile have never been closed; proof of this is the fact that commercial exchanges have continued to operate."

Commercial Attache Roberto Rodriguez emphasized that at present the balance of trade was favorable for Peru and that he did not consider this situation good. "In order that there may be real exchanges, the balance of trade must be equalized," he added. He also said that the Joint Commission will hold its first meeting in 2 years at the beginning of December 1980.

Finally, the president of the Tacna Chamber of Commerce, Oscar Martorel, said that he hoped that, just as the Chilean-Peruvian Chamber of Commerce had been formed, now a similar organization would be set up in Peru. "Our country has initiated a process to open up imports, and the present deficit with Chile will soon be taken care of. Many Chilean products, particularly fruits, are already being sold in Peru; and these Chilean exports are continually increasing," he concluded.

PAPER NOTES 'FAILURES' OF PLP GOVERNMENT

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 11 Nov 80 p 5

[Article by Etienne Dupuch: "Why the PLP Has Failed"]

[Text] IN November, 1977 the Bahamas Hotel Corporation signed 10 and 15-year agreements with the Canadian Pacific Hotel of Toronto, Canada. The CP hotels, the largest and oldest hotel company in Canada, had a contract for the management of the Balmoral Beach Hotel in Nassau and the Lucayan Harbour Inn and Marineland Lucayan Beach Hotels in Freeport.

With the tourist business booming in Nassau and Freeport, combined with the management experience of the CP hotels, this operation should have been a brilliant success. It hasn't been. And so, by mutual agreement, CP has now parted company with the Bahamas Hotel Corporation after only three years of its contract period have expired, leaving behind losses totalling $30 million. Add to this figure the $20 million the government paid for these hotels and it represents a loss of $50 million, a burden which must be borne by the taxpayers .... that means YOU and ME .... of this hopelessly badly managed nation.

The tragedy doesn't stop there. It extends to every business enterprise touched by the government. When Bahamas Airways, operated by an experienced English company, was forced out of business by government stupidity, a "star" in the Pindling Cabinet declared that the government would provide the country with the finest airline that ever sent airplanes aloft. The government launched Bahamasair, which is not only a second rate operation, but it has lost money so fast that Minister of Finance Arthur Hanna recently declared it must either pay its own way or fold up. This is just another piece of Arthur Hanna's nonsense. Whatever happens, Bahamasair must keep on flying, as a result the government must find more and more new ways to tax the Bahamian people .... that means YOU and ME ... to find money to support their incompetence.

Whether they like it or not, they have to keep the hotels going. And, now that the management of the hotels must be taken over by the Hotel Corporation, you can expect the operation's losses to multiply at a giddying rate.

******

Another area of failure by the government has been the Ministry of Agriculture and Marine Products, especially in connection with Hatchet Bay Farms at Eleuthera, which no less a person than the Prime Minister himself trumpeted as the greatest farming operation of the future in the history of these islands. The farm has not only failed to maintain the high standard of production achieved by the Austin Levy organization before it was taken over by government, it has lost millions of dollars. This, of course, means a further burden on the backs of the taxpayer who, needless to remind you, means YOU and ME.

******

Why should this sorry state of affairs exist. There are several reasons. And I will tell you what they are.

Among the evacuees who migrated to Nassau from England after the second world war was a man who had been a Wing Commander in the RAF. He made some investments in Nassau. I knew him well, but I have forgotten his name. This man was a member of the House of Commons in the Ramsay Macdonald government, the first Labour government in the history of Britain. It was a hopeless failure and the reason for its failure, according to the Wing Commander, was that not a single member of the government had had any business experience. They were men full of revolutionary ideas, aimed especially at pulling down a social and economic structure that had been built up by men with centuries of experience in nation building behind them.

This is the first reason for the colossal failure of the PLP government .... a fact that grows alarmingly clearer every day, whether supporters of this government like to admit it or not.

The Pindling government is dominated by a group of lawyers whose experience does not extend beyond the "Whereases" and "Wherefores" of legal jargon. Law is a fine profession, in the limits of its own particular sphere, and there is no better foundation-training for a person who is entering a broader sphere of operation but, standing alone, I can think of no profession that is more limited in its scope.

A government needs men and women trained in law in its Cabinet to keep its decisions within legal boundaries but it also needs successful businessmen to point the way it should go. At no time in the PLP administration has the government had the benefit of the experience of an outstandingly successful businessman. Dominating its financial operations is the Hon Arthur Hanna who declared, on becoming Minister of Finance, that he would go on borrowing and spending money as long as there was anyone around who was prepared to finance the government's ventures.

I cannot think of any more irresponsible and stupid statement ever coming from a Minister of the government, for, surely any fool must realise that a day of reckoning must come and, when it comes, it will be a black day in the experience of the Bahamian taxpayer who, once again I must remind you, means YOU and ME.

******

Oh yes, earlier on I mentioned fishing in connection with the farming enterprises of the government. Fishing was trumpeted as a multi-million-dollar enterprise of the future. I told them from the start that they were talking through their hats and I gave them the reason. Apart from the lobster industry, which has always been with us, fishing will never become a major industry in the Bahamas. The simple reason is that there is very little .... if any .... planckton in Bahamian waters, a fact that accounts for the brilliant clearness of the Bahamian sea. Planckton is a food of the sea on which fish feed. Bahamian fish live almost entirely on the limited amount of food generated around reefs and wrecks.

******

So much for the absence of any business experience in the government. Let us now examine some of the other reasons why the PLP has been such a colossal failure, for, whether you realise it or not, government is a business, the biggest business in any country.

Some thirty or more years ago a Labour government in Britain sent a labour officer to Nassau to unionise Bahamian enterprises. The Legislature of that day accepted unionism on a limited scale. It excluded hotels from union control. The Hon George Murphy, an Irish-American businessman, was then operating the Fort Montagu Beach Hotel on contract. He was a successful businessman. He predicted at the time what whenever unionism entered the hotel business in the Bahamas that would be the beginning of the end of the tourist industry in these islands.

As time went on unionism did enter the hotel industry and,while it posed some difficulties for hotel management, they managed to live with it. But it was another thing when the PLP took over the country and introduced such a rigid programme of Bahamianization that hotel operators found themselves saddled with incompetent staff in vital positions. It was then that several hotel owners decided to get out of the country. They sold their hotels to government at a sacrifice price with the result that even, during a boom period under the experienced Canadian Pacific Hotels management, they have failed miserably.

******

So much for the lack of business experience, restrictions placed on business by labour unionism and rigid Bahamianization. And now for a third deficiency in the character of the PLP government.

A government needs to have a measure of commonsense and compassion in its composition. The PLP government has neither.

I need hardly tell you that they have been brutal in their hatreds, a flaw in human character that is self-destructive. And certainly they have not shown any commonsense. They can't say that they didn't know any better because I pointed out their mistakes early enough for them to see the error of their ways. A man is doomed to failure who doesn't learn by his mistakes.

It has been scientifically established that only three percent of the world's population are trainable for executive positions. The Bahamas has a large and very complicated economy requiring a lot of experience and natural ability to successfully administer.

These islands have an estimated population of just over 200,000 people, half of them children of school age. It is estimated that a half of the total population of the Bahamas is concentrated in Nassau. Let us say that 50,000 to 75,000 people constitute the labour force in Nassau. Three percent of 75,000, which is the top figure in this estimate, is 2250 Bahamians who are trainable for executive positions.

You needn't enter into any argument with me on these facts. I didn't establish this rule of life. It is simply a part of God's plan that there should be more workers than thinkers. I must say that He is very prodigal in his gifts. He spreads them around at all levels of society. And no matter what anyone does .... they can't alter this fact of human experience. It is, therefore, elementary that this small number of people cannot efficiently administer the complex economy that has been developed in the Bahamas.

******

One last word. My lawyer friends need not be annoyed with me because I say they are not generally men of business experience because I readily admit that I am not a businessman. I hate the details that go into the business side of The Tribune. It is true that this newspaper is a success. There is no denying this fact. There are two reasons for its success.

First, we have developed capable writers who produce a saleable product. But, secondly, we have an our staff people who are capable of handling the business side of the operation. I never talk business with anyone at The Tribune today, largely because I don't understand it. I leave that side of the business to people I can trust who understand and care about money.

A combination of writing ability and business acumen .... in two different sets of people .... accounts for the success of The Tribune. And this is true of any major enterprise, whether it be government or in the private sector.

The government needs lawyers to keep its decisions within the boundaries of the law but more important still, it needs businessmen to keep its books in the black. On top of all this, it needs commonsense and compassion. All the PLP has is lawyers .... and that's too damn bad for this country of ours, because, as you see, crime, stupidity and irresponsibility has been its product.

******

Now let us see what makes up the Cabinet of the Bahamas.

The Prime Minister and Ministers of Finance, Health, Works, Education, External Affairs and Youth .... seven in a 12-man Cabinet .... are all lawyers.

The Minister of Labour was a laboratory technician, Tourism Minister was a school teacher, Agriculture and Fisheries no special qualifications, Transport was a small merchant and in transportation in a small way at Eleuthera, Development an electronics engineer.

I have no doubt that they, as individuals, are all worthy Bahamians but, roll them all together as the government of a country with a complicated economy and a small population to draw on, and you have a licence for failure. And an unwitting stimulus to other irresponsible activities in the community as reflected in the present crime wave sweeping over our islands.

Because I predicted this tragic outcome from the start some people have called me a prophet. I am not a prophet. I readily admit that I have no taste for business. But I think I can lay claim to having a good measure of commonsense. And that is what makes a good newspaperman.

INFLATION DECLINE--The rate of inflation in the Bahamas took a plummet instead of a spiral last month. At the end of September inflation stood at 11.79 percent. This compares with 12.20 percent at the end of August. This is the first time that a decline has been reported since December of last year when the rate stood at 6.6 percent. The food component of the retail price index for New Providence continues upward, though. It jumped 2.2 percent last month, the second highest monthly increase for the year. PAPER REJECTS PLEBISCITE PRINCIPLE TO ADOPT CONSTITUTION

[Editorial: "Constitutions and Plebiscites"]

[Text] Countries are beginning to have their constitutional texts approved of by means of plebiscites, in which the people must decide either yes or no, to approve or reject the entire constitution. There is no room for discriminating or making any distinctions, much less expressing reservations or making reforms.

Along these lines, we had a precedent in 1930 when there was a plebiscite on some reforms. But the most recent cases, dealing with an entire constitution, have taken place in Chile, and in the near future, Uruguay.

This method has some advantages, but we feel that, all things considered, it is not the best.

The fact that a constitutional text is not discussed article by article by those who have the right to approve of it does have some positive aspects. For example, the constitution maintains its integrity, and if it has been drawn up by specialists, it keeps its technical authenticity intact. In this sense, it is worth pointing out some prejudices which are common in juridical activities. Hardly anyone who is not an expert in the field would feel like planning and building a bridge; but any deputy or senator feels qualified to participate in the drafting of the most complicated legal texts. These prejudices lead to some surprising situations known to all: for example, Congress meets for a month to approve of a new constitutional text which did not even have a rough draft prepared before the session. No one can deny the importance of common sense and natural intelligence. But they are not enough. The result has been constitutional texts full of errors, contradictions, repetitions and huge loopholes. A good draft can be reduced to ashes if the discussions for its approval are too freewheeling, and if the people who vote are not fully informed. A good part of those defects can be avoided if the text has been prepared by people who are experts in the field and if partial reforms are not allowed, as happens in plebiscites.

But the defects of this system are also considerable. Above all, the drafters are named within a single basic political movement (minor divergences make little difference) so that the text reflects just one point of view. In the cases we referred to, which are known to all, the people who drafted the constitution are not representatives of the people or of the currents of thought that exist in the population. With regard to the vote, it is certain that the man in the street has less education on the average than those who make up a constitutional assembly, and thus is less able to decide how to vote in full awareness of what they are approving or rejecting, of the implications of a text that lays the groundwork for a nation's entire juridical existence. Although the drafters may be experts, they will never do a perfect job; therefore the text can always be improved in light of various and diverse opinions that exist, for example, in a constitutional assembly. There is always room for reforms to some articles or entire chapters. On the other hand, in the plebiscite a sort of balance must be achieved in a blind decision; the side that has the most points in its favor--whether it be yes or no--will win, even though there may be very important counterpoints. By voting for approval of the constitution, one even accepts what one knows is wrong; by voting no, one is rejecting even the good aspects. Modifications have no place. Like it or not, there is an unavoidable choice imposed.

For this reason we do not think the plebiscite is wise. In places where it is commonly used, it tends to involve highly specific issues. Nor do we recommend the usual parliamentary system in which discussions are held without sufficient specialized studies before the sessions. The best solution would be to work from a text or draft written by experts in the field; but with the possibilitiy of discussions and reforms by a legislative organization.

IMPORT TARIFF CUTS SUGGESTED AS VITAL ECONOMIC MEASURE

La Paz PRESENCIA in Spanish 2 Nov 80 pp 3, 10

[Article by Ramiro Paz]

[Text] To solve the economic crisis which the country is undergoing, a series of measures is needed to meet three basic objectives: control of the inflationary process, reactivation of investment and production, and compensation for adverse social effects. Without a conceptual framework and an integral approach, the measures taken in an isolated fashion could lead to a deepening of the crisis with tremendous distortions in the distribution of income and the employment structure.

There is, however, an economic measure which (although it could be part of a stabilizing package) deserves special study. The general concept that most people have of this measure does not always reflect the regulatory role it could play in an economy such as the Bolivian one. This measure is the reduction of import tariffs.

Traditionally, the tariff has been viewed as a basic tool to generate financial revenues for the central government. The reason is that the lack of an advanced productive structure reduces the tax base, which must be compensated by setting high taxes on imports.

Let us examine the real nature of this policy.

First, given that imports in a country such as Bolivia consist mainly of food and raw materials, the impact of a high tariff on the cost of living is significant. In sum, a high tariff is without a doubt a critical factor in the spurring of inflation; viewed in another way, the consumer of imported goods indirectly subsidizes public spending, mainly made up of wages and social benefits; that is, the inefficient state bureaucracy is subsidized.

Second, a high tariff makes imports unduly expensive, which provides an incentive for contraband. This destroys the small and incipient national production effort. Everyone is aware of the smuggling of cigarettes, instant coffee, liquor, dairy products, medicine, car parts, etc.

Third, it is also obvious that the real revenues that come from tariffs are not what they should be. A high tariff is conducive to "deals" which undermine the moral basis of the public administrative apparatus, and therefore of the country, not to mention losses to the Treasury.

The above considerations lead us to a specific recommendation: a 10 percent reduction of tariffs on food, raw materials, spare parts, medicine and intermediate goods related to production and marketing.

There are two general arguments against this step: a) a lower tariff would lead to the legal importation of finished goods that are competitive with nationally produced goods; and b) treasury revenues would shrink.

With regard to the first argument, it is necessary to concede that Bolivia has no industrial (manufacturing) base of any significance, so the macroeconomic impact of such a measure would be minimal. The consequences would be proportionally much less than in more industrialized countries such as Argentina, Chile and Peru, where a similar solution has been tried. But more importantly, we must also recognize that the majority of our industry simply processes imported raw materials (plastics, pharmaceuticals, beverages, textiles, tobacco, etc.). This means that with a lower tariff on raw materials, the costs of these industries would be lower, and thus their market prices would drop. That is, price competition stemming from the introduction of finished goods could be made up for by the cost advantages in the raw materials that are processed.

Concerning the second argument, it is very possible that lower tariffs would reduce tax evasion and smuggling, so that the level of revenues would be the same or higher.

In conclusion, we must make an empirical study of the proposed tariff reduction, taking into consideration the effect it would have in terms of lowering the cost of living, promoting the competitiveness of national industry, and raising treasury revenues. Other countries' experiences would seem to support the advantageousness of the measure.

SOLDIERS CALLED IN TO HELP IN SUGAR HARVEST

La Paz PRESENCIA in Spanish 30 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] Santa Cruz, 29 October--The sugarcane harvest in this department is about over. Three sugar mills have announced officially that they will finish milling, in view of the considerable drop in raw material supplies. Meanwhile, the producers who received help from the Armed Forces when hundreds of soldiers were put to work cutting cane, say that thousands of tons will remain unharvested.

If the milling comes to a halt suddenly, it is unlikely that the scheduled sugar quota will be achieved, say experts. There will be a shortfall of at least 800,000 quintals, which could have a direct effect on domestic consumption.

In the National Commission for the Study of Cane and Sugar (CNECA) as well as the Federation of Sugarcane Growers, and in sugar industry circles, several arguments have been raised for this situation: the lack of timely credit disbursements, the bad roads that were impassable during the long rainy season and prevented sugarcane from reaching the mills, the lack of harvesters (resulting in an appeal to the Armed Forces), and the appalling lack of diesel (which, for reasons not explained by Bolivian Government Oil Deposits [YPFB], immobilized a large number of agricultural machines and transport trucks). All these factors have conspired against one of the principal sectors of the Santa Cruz agroindustry.

Uncut Cane

The official agencies in charge of the sugar industry believe that if milling is brought to a standstill, some 10,000 hectares of cane will be left uncut, accounting for a production of 400,000 tons. That would be enough to cover the expected sugar shortage.

Cane producers say that the problem is more serious than what has been estimated, because it would lead to immediate disincentives, resulting in lower production next year.

The sugar mills in Santa Cruz, three private and one state-owned, have been working at a little over 50 percent of their installed capacity, according to official reports, due to raw material shortages. The cane producers argue that there is enough cane to meet the needs of the industrial centers, but that the price is low. Furthermore, say the growers, there are no reliable roads, and most of the local road networks were destroyed during the floods the year before last and have not been repaired.

Truckers cannot get to the fields, first of all because there are no roads, and secondly because of the diesel fuel shortage, which also paralyzed farm tractors. Now it is said that the little fuel that has been obtained is of bad quality, and has led to breakdowns of all engines. In this regard, YPFB has still not provided any explanation.

Announcements by Mills

The San Aurelio sugar mill announced a week ago that it will stop accepting cane. This Wednesday the UNAGRO mill, located in Mineros, 85 kilometers north of this city, made the same announcement. La Belgica is also about to stop milling. That would leave only the Guabira mill of the Bolivian Development Corporation.

Soldiers of different garrisons, who have been dispatched to this district to cut cane, are still at work, especially in the northern provinces.

The mills claim that the only reason for terminating the milling is the lack of raw materials.

The quota scheduled for this year was to be 5,999,100 quintals of sugar. To date, according to CNECA, only 80 percent of that quota has been met. This means that there is a 20 percent shortfall, amounting to 800,000 quintals. No one would speculate about the consequences on the domestic market, where last year a similar shortage caused discontent and protests.

Despite measures taken on all levels, it has not been possible to fix all the roads washed out by the floods. More than 1,200 kilometers of roads directly linking the cane fields with the sugar mills have been destroyed totally. Many regions are still mudholes, and now another rainy season is beginning. Growers have resorted to all means possible to get the cane out; the only relatively practical way was to use tractors, until YPFB failed to come through with supplies, and there was an alarming shortage of diesel fuel. After several weeks, there was some unexplained change in the fuel, and according to truckers and growers, there are now engine breakdowns due to poor quality fuel.

Consequences

Sugar mill officials, as well as cane growing representatives, agree that the problem is serious. The number of unforeseeable factors has made it impossible to meet raw material needs, but growers have not had enough cooperation when they brought their problems to agencies at all levels, ever since the sugar harvest began more than 4 weeks behind schedule.

There is just one solution, according to producers, to prevent a sugar deficit in the country: The mills must be made to prolong the milling, and all institutions must be mobilized to repair the roads and cut and process the cane that is in the fields. No one knows how long it will take, but this is the only way to prevent new shortages, speculation and shady deals between sugar agents and distributors throughout the country.

FARMERS TO RECEIVE LAND TITLES FROM AGRARIAN REFORM OFFICIALS

La Paz PRESENCIA in Spanish 29 Oct 80 p 8

[Text] The National Agrarian Reform Council will distribute property deeds to peasants all over the country until the end of this year, it was officially announced yesterday.

The deeds, according to the report, are being drawn up by the Agrarian Reform Council's Agrarian Courts, using the IBM system.

After the legal requirements are met, the agrarian deeds are to be signed by the president of the Agrarian Reform Council, and then turned over to the farmers in their own communities by special commissions.

Authorities have indicated their intention to "deliver as many as possible of these documents" in order to legalize landholding and allow the owners to apply for credit at the Bolivian Agricultural Bank and other credit institutions.

It was also stated that "adequate coordination" is being sought between the National Agrarian Reform Council and the agencies that deal with the agriculture sector.

In this regard, authorities of the National Agrarian Reform Council, after obtaining approval from their superiors, plan to meet soon with representatives of decentralized entities such as Community Development and the National Colonization Institute to "exchange ideas and avoid the dispersion of efforts and resources; to bring about effective development and achieve the total incorporation of Bolivian peasants into national life."

"We believe that with the technical work that has effectively been carried out, and the integration of peasants into national life, we can enhance the nation's development," stated Dr Jose Manuel Caballero, president of Agrarian Reform.

CHAIRMAN DEFINES MAJOR CONAL OBJECTIVES

La Paz PRESENCIA in Spanish 22 Oct 80 p 9

[Text] The National Legislative Advisory Commission (CONAL) will act as a link between the Commanders Junta and the business, labor and professional sectors when the government needs the opinion of the productive sectors on any new legislation or decree, it was announced yesterday by Gen (Ret) Juan Lechin Suraez, president of that commission.

General Lechin Suarez confirmed the CONAL proposals in his statements to the press after meeting with the president of the republic. He said it will advise the government "when the latter seeks its opinion," study the proposed laws and supreme decrees before they are promulgated and in addition will submit initiatives to the executive branch.

As is already known, the advisory body, created recently by the government, consists of 12 military officers, most of them retires, and a like number of civilians.

General Lechin Suarez explained that CONAL will not issue laws or decrees, but rather will study them, to "give its opinion and suggestions to the executive branch." It is not a legislative body, but a support agency of the executive branch, he said.

Likewise, the CONAL president said, this organization will not appoint ambassadors, that being a "function of the president of the republic."

Concerning his meeting with Gen Luis Garcia Meza, he said that he presented a report concerning CONAL's current activities and that the president of the republic, in turn, made several recommendations to expedite the work.

According to the report, CONAL is currently involved in establishing its internal regulations, with specific functions for its political, social, economic and international relations committees. He said the best reports indicate this work will be finished by 25 October and that from then on CONOL will begin to operate effectively. In that sense, he also said that its members will meet every Tuesday with the president of the republic.

Concerning CONAL's internal regulations, General Lechin Suarez said they are somewhat similar to the discussion rules in the legislative branch.

Elsewhere in his remarks, he also said that CONAL will suggest to the executive branch the need to undertake coordinated work with other state technical agencies, such as the National Economic and Planning Council (CONEPLAN) for study of economic affairs, and the National Political Commission (CONAPOL) for political affairs. He also announced that it will hire professionals to draw up specific proposals.

Asked about the scope of the state security law, to be published soon, he said that they still have not received the "pertinent legal instrument from the present executive branch." He added that they will make a statement if their advise is requested.

Dr Guido Valle Antelo, secretary general of CONAL, announced that workers' and peasants' representatives will soon be part of CONAL's subcommittees. He also said that the CONAL budget, which is still being studied, including the 1981 requests, will be "moderate," and that the organization will use "minimum support personnel."

Among its priority tasks, CONAL will study the scope of the new state political constitution, it will define the outlines of a new electoral law. so that elections may be held within a period which has not yet been determined.

Finally, it was announced that Gen (Ret) Remberto Iriarte Paz, a member of CONAL, has been replaced by Col Miguel Munoz. The appointment was made through decree law by the executive branch.

CROP DIVERSIFICATION PROJECT OFFICIALLY INAUGURATED

La Paz PRESENCIA in Spanish 23 Oct 80 Sec 2 p 5

[Text] In a special ceremony over the weekend, the minister of peasant and agricultural affairs, Col Julio Molina, opened the new central offices of the Chapare-Yungas Development Project (PRODES) in Cochabamba.

The central offices of PRODES were formerly located in La Paz. Minister Molina, in the main speech of the day, said the transfer is based on "recommendations of several studies."

PRODES works simultaneously in Chapare and Yungas on regional development projects designed to improve the cultivation of coca. The minister also said that the transfer of the agency's central headquarters is an example of the government's decision to encourage "measures to benefit Cochabamba." He also said that by so doing, they are trying to take "concrete steps, through a solid, unimprovised strategy, to succeed effectively in the campaign against narcotics such as cocaine. The work of PRODES for a regional development of the Chapare, through diversification of crops and productive activities for the peasants, will permit a real improvement of the cultivation of coca to the levls required for the legal and traditional demand for this product."

Dr Winston Estremadoiro, executive director of PRODES, said that the present administration agreed to transfer the project offices and that the move had been previously frustrated in the "labyrinths of bureaucracy and the power vacuum."

Further on he reviewed the "achievements and failures" of PRODES, from the first official steps to replace coca crops to the creation of the agency in 1977. He said that in the last 3 years PRODES has done the basic and feasibility studies, as well as the agroeconomic research contemplated in the "pilot" phase. "Having efficiently implemented this research, we can say that PRODES has a solvent base for the planning and implementation of the regional development of Chapare through diversification and the vertical integration of production," he indicated.

The executive director of PRODES referred also to the "unpleasant dimension of our work," and he cited in this regard the "impatience" of those who "have little concern for the principles" of those who are depending on regional development; those people would like to see an end to the plan for replacing the coca crops. He added that PRODES has emphasized the idea of regional development of the coca plantations. This dimension is not well understood by some sectors of public opinion, he said.

As for future prospects, he indicated that transferring the offices to Cochabamba will redound to the greater development of the Chapare. He also announced the start of an "experimental stage of operational tasks," and the creation of an infrastructure of improved plant and seed production in traditional and nontraditional categories in the Chapare. However, he said that the operational phase will depend on whether adequate financial aid is received.

Finally he said, "We expect our project to become a real beachhead which, through the experience and technology generated in the Chapara area, will lead to the effective and rational development of our Amazon region."

BRAZIL SEEN AS IMPORTANT ELEMENT IN REAGAN FOREIGN POLICY

PY142347 Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 12 Nov 80 p 3

[From the "Notes and Information" page: "Challenge for Our Diplomacy"]

[Text] With his long experience in government and diplomacy, Ambassador Roberto Campos should have well-founded reasons for saying that within the scheme of strengthening U.S. defense mechanisms, Brazil will be one of the most important geopolitical elements in the foreign policy of President Ronald Reagan's future government. This idea involves broader aspects, and in practice it will materialize naturally from the recovery of the United States' international prestige as the leading Western power--a prestige that began to deteriorate during the Johnson Government and slipped further down during the Nixon administration.

Washington's interrelations with the world in general and with Brazil in particular make up coparticipants in that situation, because in the final analysis such coparticipation results from profound identification with a lifestyle characterized by political pluralism and free-market economy. Thus, once national interests are safeguarded, the different situations and economic developments duly considered, there is no reason to eschew a policy of closer integration with the White House in shouldering responsibilities for the Western way of life. Furthermore, our internal process of democratic normalization calls for the adoption of an external political point of reference to link us with the world.

We are not talking about establishing instruments for subordination or about mimicking political positions. We are talking about conducting relations on the basis that Latin America (and Brazil as part of it) constitutes a natural line of defense for open societies and liberal political philosophy despite the authoritarian nature of some Latin American governments. This fundamentally means that we have to analyze in depth our point of conflict and controversy with the United States, since only by knowing what separates us will we be able to know what effectively unites us and what will enable us to draw even closer together. Some points of contention are the Brazilian-FRG nuclear agreement and the protectionist trade barriers raised by the U.S. Government. There was also contention over the human rights situation in our country, but this has been smoothed out by our liberalization process and the increasingly reasonable attitudes adopted by the Carter Government.

There are, however, other points of contention not related to the possibly divergent foreign policies of Carter and Reagan but more precisely to our internal policy, our diplomatic orientation and to the course we set for our foreign trade. One of these points, for instance, is the possibility that the United States may develop concern over Brazil's exports of conventional arms lest these exports (important in commercial terms) become a strategic alternative in the framework of a joint outlook for the defense of the West. Another point of contention may be the positions Brazilian diplomacy is taking regarding some third world countries, especially in Africa, which are lined up with the Soviet expansionist policy and, consequently, are in confrontation with the Western defense system. The pro-Arab leaning of our foreign policy, which can be explained (but not justified) by our oil dependency, is also at odds with the White House positions in defense of the state of Israel--positions that Reagan has promised to maintain.

Brazil's geopolitical, demographic or even economic importance demands that our diplomacy be prepared to respond to the new policy Reagan will adopt in the White House. In today's troubled world, the difficulties are not only political but also economic and financial on both sides. With Reagan's election, the market expectations raised the international parity of the dollar at a time when the solid German mark began to face difficulties due to the peculiar situation of the German economy. The petroleum crisis (with the outbreak of war between Iraq and Iran) will unavoidably force the Reagan Government to adopt an even more protectionist attitude toward U.S. goods, thus partially frustrating our prospects for exports to the United States. If we are not prepared for these eventualities, we run the risk of becoming entangled once again in senseless third world rhetoric.

Not only our diplomacy should be prepared for the new times to come. Before and above our diplomacy, our internal liberalization process should be consolidated so that once full political normalization has been attained, we as a nation may have a clear foreign policy to insure our rightful place on the international scene, especially in Latin America.

COMMENT ON REAGAN--The image of Ronald Reagan as a warrior, that is, the image of the future U.S. President as a warrior, has received a boost from the remarks included in a report prepared by the military advisers of the president-elect. This report states: no part of the world can be considered outside the interests of the United States; the United States must make use of military force; the United States must prevent [words indistinct] even without the aid of its allies, even unilaterally. The report prepared by Reagan's advisers was released in (London) and is bound to give rise to unfavorable reactions. The European allies of the United States (?fear) getting involved in U.S. military actions. With Reagan as U.S. president, the entire world [words indistinct] from the U.S. arsenal. BALANCE OF PAYMENTS--The need to put an end to the swift disruption of the balance of payments has forced the government to concentrate its efforts on encouraging exports and stimulating domestic savings in order to compensate for the inevitable decline of foreign income. In view of this, the struggle against inflation has been declared of secondary importance and will no longer be a priority target. According to a qualified government adviser, the system of incentives for exports which the government is putting together in order to prevent certain products from becoming unprofitable as a result of the exchange policy is bound to have inflationary effects; "however, we see no other way, because at this point the important thing is to export." The government has decided to take the responsibility for inflation not only because there is no way out other than concentrating efforts on balancing foreign accounts, but also because Planning Minister Delfim Netto, during his contacts with U.S., European and Japanese bankers, established the fact that it is the foreign debt and not inflation that worries the country's creditors. A government source indicated that this discovery by the minister explains Delfim's recent statement that inflation is a domestic problem which can be resolved by domestically implemented transfers of income. Since anti-inflation and balance of payments policies are bound to clash, there is no choice but to accept this conflict. PROBLEMS IN ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH U.S. EXAMINED

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 25 Oct 80 p A-3

[Editorial: "Relations With the United States"]

[Text] During a meeting of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Chile, Foreign Minister Rene Rojas Galdames took the opportunity to mention the state of economic and commercial relations with the United States, which are already important and give promise of continued expansion. In fact, the foreign minister, among other data, reported that this year overall trade will total $2 billion, that approved investments will exceed $3 billion and that the United States is the largest supplier of financial resources for the Chilean economy.

This is one of the few occasions on which an official from the political sector of the government, a principal example being the minister of foreign relations, has made reference to the subject of international economic relations, which are a substantial part of a country's overall foreign policy. In this regard, it is an auspicious indication that the concept of international policy is beginning to include in an explicit way the totality of factors which impinge upon its formulation and application. This is particularly necessary in Chile's case, in which the international success of foreign policy has been decisive in equilibrating the attitude of many foreign countries.

The foreign minister also said that not all aspects of economic relations with the United States can be viewed with equal optimism or sense of rapprochement, since there are some negative factors. The most delicate of these is the protectionist tendancy which is observed in the industrialized nations toward imports from the developing countries, which threatens to seriously alter the economic growth possibilities of the latter. Other countries, such as Brazil, are also following protectionist policies of a similar kind.

Other negative practices which the minister of foreign affairs underscored in his speech are the difficulties encountered in the application of the general system of preferences and the policy of some international financial organizations of making their loans subject to the fulfillment of political conditions imposed by those who control or decisively influence its decisionmaking process. All these situations introduce disturbing elements in the relations between the industrialized powers and the developing countries.

Just as the sector of relations with the United States has made progress and there has been satisfactory development in the commercial, economic and financial spheres, it is important to examine the possibilities of equal progress and improvement in the area of political and diplomatic relations. The requirements of our country's political independence can be harmonized and are compatible with the needs of an international coexistence based on mutual respect, as has been our permanent historical tradition.

The prospect of political detente should be analyzed, no matter what the outcome of the presidential elections of the United States. Whether there be a Democratic or Republican administration, the requirements of this advance are the same. To accomplish this, it will be necessary to make a significant effort at the diplomatic level.

COMMENTARY SEES OPPOSITION MOVING INTO LABOR, UNIVERSITIES

Santiago LA TERCERA DE LA HORA in Spanish 2 Nov 80 p 3

[Article by Pablo Rodriguez Grez: "The Path of the Opposition"]

[Text] There are many who naively believe that the opposition was defeated once and for all in the 11 September plebiscite. This is a crass error. Everything indicates that for the opposition, the election results are merely a slip that can be overcome. Nevertheless, things are definitely no longer the same. For many years, they speculated with a majority popular backing that could not be expressed because the institutional channels were closed. Now they can only draft specious arguments to justify the people's decision. In this task the government's adversaries have been successful abroad, but they have once again suffered a resounding defeat in Chile. One therefore has a curious dichotomy. While within the national sphere everyone understands and the majority of the people support the political path outlined by the Armed Forces for the construction of the future constitutional system, our circumstances are not known abroad and foreign governments and institutions continue to be the victims of intentional distorsions transmitted by traitors and agents of Soviet Marxism. Rather than relieve pressure unleashed against Chile, the plebiscite has helped to maintain it at practically the same level.

Labor and the University

In my opinion, the opposition has its eyes on labor and the universities, taking advantage -- it is said -- of the room which the regime allows it on those fronts. That is where it will use all the weight of its influence, hoping to ignite a resistance movement that will gradually be supported by other groups of citizens.

Naturally, the trade unions, as they gradually return to normal, allow acute social tensions to be generated. This activity is internationally organized and no Western country could be free of the general directives issued by one or several of the major world confederations. We are already acquainted with the dissuasive force they have. It is enough to recall the threats we suffered 2 years ago concerning the promulgation of the labor plan. In addition, there is the approaching social security reform, an especially important issue for a country with early retirements or candidates for retirement. This innovation, which could not be postponed without grave harm to our economy, will be used to try to ignite a labor reaction that could alter our coexistence and public peace.

Moreover, it is obvious that as long as the trade union organizations of the different countries bring pressure to bear on their respective governments to isolate Chile internationally, all of our diplomatic efforts will be useless and inadequate. For the time being, the political activists who have infiltrated the labor unions cannot subvert domestic order but on the other hand, they can help undermine the image of high government officials abroad.

The universities continue to be the chosen spot for all the revolutionary-type political groupings. In the university classrooms, one finds young people filled with idealism, rightfully concerned and searching for just political and social solutions. Such characteristics make them especially sensitive to the irresponsible slogans of the extremists which sound good and are apparently rational. We have seen this in recent days. Various figures without any academic prestige have visited different university campuses with the unconcealed purpose of altering and stirring up the atmosphere, in an attempt to bother students and then mobilize them behind an obscure and so-called objective.

The unsettling action of the partisan opposition will concentrate on these points. Consequently, the government must work efficiently on them to prevent a surprise.

Heavy Hand

With the rules of play defined as they now are, everything indicates the need for a heavier hand to correct the excesses toward which they are trying to drag us. Both in the labor unions and the universities, official tactics must be redesigned and existing legislation must be enforced, without any exceptions. Otherwise, relative tolerance will be interpreted as weakness and will open the way to wild adventures whose beginning is obvious but whose ending no one can predict.

It is also time to give the Chilean Foreign Service the characteristics it always needed. During this period of its institutional history, Chile is not served well by a professional "white glove" diplomacy. We now need a diplomacy on a war footing to neutralize the low blows dealt us nearly everywhere by the stubborn enemies of the military regime.

Only a heavy but just hand can properly guide the period beginning on 11 March. The president of the republic has shown that he has all the qualities required by the circumstances.

CODELCO TO INVEST HEAVILY IN COPPER MINING RENEWAL

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 28 Oct 80 p D-4

[Text] Investments totaling $224 million will be made this year by the Copper Corporation (CODELCO) on its mining deposits.

This important figure is part of a total of $460 million which will be injected into the copper mining sector through projects to be implemented within the next 3 years.

The investments, which will be made with CODELCO's own funds, are to be used to update technologies, renovate equipment--some of which has been in operation since 1914--and exploit new sectors of deposits, to which end, for example, an entirely new mine will be constructed at El Teniente.

Maintenance of Production.

Weighty considerations advise that these investments be made, namely:

--The drop in mineral content of some ores, particularly those of Chuquicamata, are making it necessary to process a greater amount of mineralized rock to maintain production levels. One point in illustration which can be made is the fact that to obtain 1 ton of "wirebars" or electrolytic copper (kinds of refined copper) it is necessary to remove 132 tons of waste. In spite of this relative drop in mineral content, this year Chuquicamata will repeat its record of being the most productive copper mine in the world.

--Along with a decline in the copper content of the ore, it is necessary to face up to the growing hardness being encountered in the rock as the excavation is deepened.

--Scientific and technological advances call for the renewal of production processes, methods and systems to maintain output at the highest level in the world and to be cost competitive.

Up to now, Chile has been the largest producer of fine copper in the world. The most abundant reserves of this ore (25 percent of the world total) are to be found in its territory. Nevertheless, in order to maintain this lead and to not decrease production it is necessary to implement several costly projects.

In the following sections, EL MERCURIO reports the major investments programmed by the CODELCO from the present until 1983.

Chuquicamata

Total investment: $133 million

Expansion of concentrator:
The drop in the copper content of the ore calls for the processing of greater tonnages of ore to maintain current production levels.

Total cost: US$73,474,000
1980 investment: $30,000,000
Startup: First quarter of 1982.

Unit 12 Tocopilla:
This involves a new electric power plant designed to meet the increasing requirements of Chuquicamata and to replace older units. It includes installations for future operations using coal.

Total cost: US$53,347,000
1980 investment: US$5.5 million
Startup: First quarter of 1983.

Replacement of Operational Equipment

As in the case of the concentrator, this requirement is the result of a drop in the copper content of the ore and the longer distances which require greatest transport capability and scaled adaptation to the economy.

Total cost: US$58,939,000
1980 investment: US$6.2 million

El Salvador

Repair and Maintenance of the Foundry

Total investment: US$13.4 million
1980 investment: US$889,000
In operation.

Repair and Improvement of the Refinery

Total investment: US$8,812,000
1980 investment: US$1,353,000
In operation.

Expansion of the Concentrator by 30 Percent

Total investment: US$18,499,000
1980 investment: US$8.48 million
Startup: First quarter of 1982.

Change in Frequency

This project is the result of the hookup with the ENDESA [National Electric Power, Inc.] which will be extended to Diego de Almagro. The project was executed with an IBRD loan and will additionally benefit the Third Region, as it will supply energy for industrial and mining use.

Total investment: US$8.2 million
1980 investment: US$2.03 million
Startup: Third quarter of 1981.

Andina

Plan for Exploitation of the Tourmaline Breccia

The greater hardness of the ore and changes in the characteristics of the deposit have necessitated a new system of exploitation which calls for larger equipment for transport and crushing.

Total investment: US$20,477,000
1980 investment: US$4.43 million
In partial operation: "startup"

Los Leones Leach-ore Residue Reservoir [tranque de relave]

This reservoir is to replace the Piuquenes Dam, which is already exhausted. It will handle the leach-ore residues of the concentrating plant, which is located 18 km away, in a totally underground installation. The dam will have a capacity of 102 million m^3 and will have a 145-meter high retaining wall. It will occupy the hydrographic valley of the Los Leones River which was diverted from its course by means of a 4.5 km tunnel.

Total investment: US$43,350,000
1980 investment: US$8,409,000
Startup: in the first stage of operation.

Plan for Exploitation of Second Level

This project involves the operation of the deposit's second level of exploitation by the block subsidence method.

Total investment: US$11,390,000
1980 investment: US$3,380,000
Operational startup: Third quarter of 1983.

El Teniente

Future Mine

This includes the infrastructure necessary for exploitation of the primary mine (metalliferous ore) and development of the corresponding engineering for exploitation of an ore with a lesser metal content and greater hardness. The most important part of this project is the underground room for primary crushing, with a capacity for the processing of 25,000 tons per day.

Total investment: US$44,549,000
1980 investment: US$15,312,000
Operational startup: Third quarter of 1982.

Colihues Dam

This will replace the Cauquenes Dam, which is already exhausted, and will handle the leach-ore residues of the Sewell and Colon concentrator plants, located 60 km away. It has a capacity of 170 million m^3 and will inundate an area of 700 hectares.

Total investment: US$94,763,000
1980 investment: US$9,921,000
In operation: "startup"

Oxygen Plant

With production of 392 tons per day of oxygen, this plant will permit a substantial saving of energy in the fusion processes.

Total investment: US$10,945,000
1980 investment: US$6,535,000
Startup: Fourth quarter of 1980.

Projects Under Study

In addition to the above-mentioned projects, CODELCO has several other investments under study for the generation of energy, technological research and new processes. The most important studies are: a study on overall development for the Chuquicamata and El Teniente Divisions; on site lixiviation (Chuquicamata); energy generation in upper Cachapoal (El Teniente); identification of greater reserves in the Rio Blanco deposit (Andina); and solar drying and the harnessing of this energy (El Salvador).

An extensive exhibit of the projects which our copper mining sector is developing will be prepared with illustrative charts and detailed models for the CODELCO booth at the next Industrial Fair in Santiago.

The making of the above-mentioned investments, in addition to those being considered by the private copper mining sector, according to estimates of the Copper Commission, will permit our country to practically double production in the next decade and will give strong impetus to national development.

CANADIAN BILATERAL TRADE--A group of 22 Canadian businessmen arrived in Santiago yesterday to participate in the third Chile-Canada business seminar that will begin tomorrow. Michael Milroy, head of the delegation that arrived yesterday, said that there are many Canadian investments in Chile and that the number is gradually increasing as a result of the joint meetings of businessmen which began in 1978. He added that commercial trade between the two countries entered a process of growth in recent years which has broad projections. In 1978, bilateral trade amounted to $80.5 million, which figure rose to $106.5 million in 1979. During the first 6 months of this year, the volume of trade amounted to $74 million. Milroy said that Canada can offer interesting technicological goods and machinery for the wood, fishing, mining, communications and other sectors. For its part, Chile has a very good market for its fruit and vegetable exports, he said. The Chilean chapter of the Interbusiness Committee is headed by businessman and banker Javier Vial, while the Canadian section is headed by George Hunter, who arrived in Chile on Friday. At 1030 hours tomorrow morning, the opening session of the seminar will be held in the Conference Room of the BHC [expansion unknown]. Speaking at the session will be Miguel Kast, minister and director of ODEPLAN [National Planning Office], and Javier Vial. In the afternoon, the speakers will be Canadians Derek Chase, from Atomic Energy International, and Andrew Lindsay, from Corera, and Chilean Rolf Luders, among others. OIL SAVINGS CREDITS--The Production Development Corporation (CORFO) has established a line of credit for medium-size and small companies that have proposals for saving energy derived from hydrocarbons or for modifying their current systems of generating power based on oil in order to use other types of fuel. This information was released yesterday by the head of development of that national organization, Major Hernan Velasquez, who said that the credits have a minimum amount of 500 development units. Up to 80 percent of a project can be financed for up to 7 years at an annual interest rate of 10.5 percent. Velasquez also said that resources will be provided to finance the respective feasibility projects and added that CORFO is developing various programs for the purpose and in order to seek nontraditional forms of energy. Among others, he emphasized a study on the use of water resources in the southern and northern zones, on rivers with a low flow. He said that a project has been completed on the Pulelfu River and its hydrographic basin and that it has been concluded that it is economically profitable to set up small plants generating between 5 and 20 megawatts. The total power that might result from the massive implementation of these structures amounts to some 300 megawatts. Velasquez indicated that a cooperative in the region is ("I believe") completing studies for the installation of the first small plant with a generating capacity of 5 megawatts, called El Capullo. Another study which evaluates the use of fuel in the country could result in savings of up to 5 percent on the amount of oil consumed, meaning a savings of $50 million annually. This work joins another on solar energy for industrial use by means of which 4 percent of the oil used in the country could be conserved. This means a savings of $40 million annually. Velasquez reported that practical tests are being conducted with Chilean copper and molybdenum ores in Switzerland and that the results will be known by December. A third project has to do with the massive use of animal wastes, whose potential is the generation of alcohol amounting to 10,000 barrels (the equivalent in oil). The necessary investment is $200 million. The study will be finished by the end of the year. Finally, concerning geothermy, Velasquez announced the completion of a new technical evaluation study at El Tatio and Puchuldiza due to the fact that recent analyses have shown that the power plants will not supply all the energy generating potential which the wells have. He said that rights on El Tatio will be put up for bids as soon as possible to transfer the operating risks to private parties. [Text] [Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 30 Oct 80 p 1] 11,464

COAL RESERVES REPORTED—Chile has potential bituminous and sub-bituminous coal reserves amounting to nearly 1 billion tons, the equivalent of 300 to 400 million tons of oil. This announcement was made yesterday by the head of development of CORFO, Maj Hernan Velasquez, who added that these stocks mean a total energy supply of at least 50 years. The development official revealed the status of various coal projects in the country's 12th and 8th regions, emphasizing progress at the Pecket, Dorotea and Isla Riesco deposits in the 12th region and the Arauco and Lebu deposits in the 8th region. Velasquez said that to date, nearly $8 million have been invested in feasibility studies at five exploration spots and that the call for bids has already been made for Pecket. Six national and foreign consortiums participated in the bidding. Dorotea is still in the study phase and at Isla Riesco, analyses will be completed in 1981, at which time a decision will be made on whether to work the deposit or keep it as a national reserve. Concerning the deposits in the 8th region, Velasquez said that feasibility studies will be completed in November and December of 1981 and that after the initial prospecting is done, the path to be followed will be decided upon. Estimated reserves at each of the deposits are as follows: Pecket, 115 million tons (sub-bituminous coal); Isla Riesco, 800 million tons (sub-bituminous); Lebu, 60 million tons (bituminous coal); Dorotea (sub-bituminous); and Arauco (bituminous), as yet undetermined. The differences in heating potential between the bituminous coal in the 8th region and sub-bituminous coal in the 12th region are from 7,000 to 8,000 kilocalories per kilogram for the former and from 4,000 to 5,000 kilocalories for the latter. If Pecket begins to be worked, it is estimated that annual production will be about 2 million tons, while the figure will be 2 to 4 million tons per year at Isla Riesco. No estimates are available for the other deposits. Velasqudz reported that in order to achieve the level of production given for Pecket, an investment of $100 million is needed, in which case the average extracting cost would be between $50 and $55 per ton, compared with $65 to $80 per ton for deposits now being worked. PAPER DEPLORES COUNTRY'S 'MORAL DECADENCE'

PA082318 San Jose LA NACION in Spanish 29 Oct 80 p 12A

[Editorial: "The Rescue of Institutionality"]

[Text] No country or society in the world, regardless of its political creed, can survive without a legal or institutional system. When this system deteriorates or is flagrantly and openly violated society enters a crisis. Although Costa Rica is considered as an example of social and political democracy in Central America and the Caribbean, the truth is another thing.

For many years and under different administration the weakening of our institutions and democratic values has been obvious, along with a lack of authority and a widespread condoning of lawbreaking and subversion. There is also a fear of assuming responsibilities and a hostile attitude to judicial or police intervention to restore order and law.

Based on this symptom of profound decline, the weekly manazine U.S. NEWS [as published] says in its latest edition that even if the political violence in Central America has not altered life in Costa Rica, its moral decline can nevertheless affect its institutional life.

No matter how much it hurts, we must look back at what has been occurring recently in our country and admit that indeed we have a sick democracy. The violence in Central America has not reached us with the brutality that other countries in the area are suffering, but it has involved us, it has contaminated our republican way of life and our territory has become a sanctuary for guerrillas and leftwing and rightwing adventurers. The government does not have the military force, the means, or the political courage to put an end to this situation.

The recent conflict at the technological institute, created by a group of students who decided to challenge authority, was proof of that moral crisis and lack of authority which is eroding our democracy. For 2 weeks that group held a stronghold in the institute and refused to allow faculty members, administrative personnel or anyone else in. It was only yesterday morning that the police, with a court order issued by a judge in Cartago, ejected the students. After much talk and indecision, institutional and legal order, so seriously affected by this group of students, was restored in the country.

The institutional and democratic awareness of the country has been weakened to such an extent that many persons from various cultural and social levels had trouble discovering what is at stake with the takeover of the institute. Demagogic populism, temporizing, the strange tendency, unfortunately predominant now, to favor law-breakers when the authorities try to do their duty, and confused ideas and concepts to justify any criminal or subversive action are clear evidence of the "moral decadence" of our democracy.

Fortunately this time we have been able to save institutionality and legal order. However, we must not create illusions for ourselves. A mediocre, inefficient and leaderless educational system has produced high school and university students who are political illiterates. Our young people in general lack a clear knowledge of the institutional system of their own country. Often there is no way of telling whether this is the result of supine ignorance or of a vulgar activist Marxism which comes from a lack of political culture. This explains actions so openly criminal as the ones some students at the technologic institute of Cartago have just carried out.

In back of this situation is the gloomy idea that things are to be gotten in either a nice or a bad way, and that if one gets them the bad way this means having a revolutionary awareness and being a tool of change. This is why the threat of violence is usually a condition for dialog and negotiations.

U.S. ECONOMIC 'ATTACK' ON ECUADOR CRITICIZED

PA201857 Havana International Service in Spanish 2310 GMT 19 Nov 80

["Our America" commentary]

[Text] Imperious behavior has always been present in U.S. foreign policy. Washington has always thought it can do anything in the world, especially in Latin America and the Caribbean, to satisfy the interest of imperialist monopolies.

Although the Cuban revolution and other later revolutionary process have shown the northern enemy that imperialist arrogance is vigorously rejected in the present times, the United States does not renounce its policy of impositions, threats, blackmail and all kinds of coercion. Being a government of imperialist consortiums, any tennant of the White House can become furious as soon as any of the U.S. transnationals is held back in its depredations anywhere in the world. Many examples of this Washington attitude can be mentioned, but it is enough to recall its permanent hostility toward Cuba and the overthrow of the Chilean constitutional government of popular unity.

Now, Ecuador is the country that has been economically attacked. Its traditional tuna fish exports to the U.S. market have been prohibited by the United States. The measure, which greatly affects this South American country's economy, is a reprisal for the capture of U.S. tuna fishing boats fishing illegally inside Ecuador's 200 miles of territorial seas.

Like most of the Third World countries with coastlines, Ecuador proclaims 200 miles of territorial seas; that is, an exclusive economic zone. But the United States, which haughtily considers itself lord and master of all the seas, insists on disavowing this act of sovereignty by almost all coastal countries, which, in addition, have the support of the top international organization.

The economic aggression perpetrated today by United States against Ecuador has been known for months by Mexico, has been applied to Peru on several occasions as well as to other countries of the region which try to protect their wealth in the face of the U.S. transnationals' unlimited exploitation.

It is being assured in press circles of the area that these companies headquartered in California are encouraged by the victory of Ronald Reagan, former governor of that state and future president of the United States, who promised during his campaign that his government would send warship to protect the fishing boats fishing illegally in waters of Ecuador and other countries.

Ecuadorean Foreign Minister Alfonso Barrera Valverde replied to this aggressive statement when he said that there is no responsible government willing to dispatch warships to enforce compliance with something that is forbidden by law.

All of Ecuador's social sectors have repudiated this show of imperialist arrogance and have even asked the Quito government not only to embargo the catch of the pirate fishermen, but also to confiscate U.S. vessels engaging in this illegal activity. In addition, Ecuador has received generalized continental backing it its firm position of rejecting imperialist economic blackmail.

Whatever the cost, warned Ecuadorean President Jaime Roldos, our country will defend its sovereignty over the 200 miles of territorial seas.

COMMENTS ON VENEZUELAN DECISION ON BARBADOS BOMBING

Attorney General's Criticism

Havana JUVENTUD REBELDE in Spanish 15 Oct 80 p 1

[Interview with Idalberto L. de Guevara Quintana, Cuban attorney general, by Eduardo Gonzalez]

[Text] Because of the wave of indignation that the arbitrary acquittal of the criminals who blew up the Cuban airplane has aroused in our people and throughout the world, Idalberto L. de Guevara Quintana, Cuban attorney general, was interviewed.

He stated: "Like all the Cuban attorneys and like all the Cuban people, we are indignant about this maneuver against justice, this shameful act of the military court and the present Venezuelan Government. It was committed against international law and in open contradiction to all legal norms in all nations.

"This deed can be called a legal barbarism; it has been condemned by international public opinion. All honest jurists are indignant as are intellectuals and celebrities throughout the world, even in Venezuela.

"This is one more action against the revolution perpetrated by imperialism and the servile rulers who play its game. Acquittal of that gang of criminals is itself a barbaric crime.

"There is convincing evidence--as Venezuelan officials have revealed and as the proceedings of the trial revealed--that the accused are responsible for a crime that can be called genocide. It aroused the repudiation of the entire world, even the Venezuelan people. It is impossible now to say that these people are innocent."

[Question] What is your opinion of the position assumed by Judge Delia Estaba Moreno?

[Answer] Her statements are very valuable in exposing this clumsy maneuver because Delia Estaba knew about the case. She issued the arrest warrant for the criminals when the guilt of the accused became obvious from the evidence and clues.

From the very beginning, Delia Estaba had to withstand pressure and even threats without yielding. The removal of this case from her court to a military court is undoubtedly part of the maneuver aimed at freeing the guilty. Her recent statements reaffirm her just position in this case.

Latin American Criticism

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 24 Oct 80 pp 41-42

[Article by Mario G. del Cueto, based mainly on telephone interviews held by Radio Havana Cuba: "Crime of International Treason, Affront to Justice"]

[Text] Day after day, week after week, the number of opinions about the infamous decision made by a Venezuelan military court to acquit those accused of the abominable sabotage of a Cuban airplane which killed the passengers and crew 4 years ago continues to grow. These texts which BOHEMIA is publishing reveal energetic condemnation of the crime committed and unanimous repudiation throughout the world by those who clamor for justice.

Clodomiro Almeyda, secretary general of the Chilean Socialist Party, stated in a telephone interview: "Like everyone else, I was indignant to hear of that brazen acquittal of those guilty of such a hideous crime. What I noted most was that a Venezuelan military court had taken that position when they had sufficient evidence of the guilt of the accused. In the second place, it is clear that that decision of the Venezuelan military court was part of the foreign policy of the government of that country which, in recent times, has been against the interests of the people of Venezuela and the other peoples of Latin America and the Caribbean. It contrasts with Venezuelan policy during the administration of Carlos Andres Perez. The Venezuela of Luis Herrera Campins seems allied with the Salvadoran Christian Democrat military junta and connected with the anti-Cuban campaign orchestrated from the United States and carried out in the area in recent months."

Juan Mari Bras, secretary general of the Puerto Rican Socialist Party, had not recovered from his astonishment when he was contacted by telephone. He said: "It seems outrageous that a court would acquit those criminals who committed such a hideous crime which all mankind has condemned. It represents an intolerable escalation in international crime. We Puerto Rican socialists condemned that crime with all our strength. We hoped the Venezuelan authorities would respond to the universal clamor and assume a position consistent with a so-called civilized country. Therefore, we are indignant about the news that these villains, true international terrorists, have been acquitted by a Venezuelan military court which answers directly to the president of Venezuela, Luis Herrera Campins."

Rogelio Sinan, Panamanian playwright, poet and narrator, joined the protest, calling the acquittal of the murderers a "barbarism." "They should have been given the maximum sentence. It is a flagrant contradiction of the way the trial was handled initially under President Carlos Andres Perez. The present Venezuelan Government's procedure seems to me to be very harmful to the international prestige of that country. This is also true of the support that it gives to the criminal junta in El Salvador. The Venezuelan people themselves are asking their rulers to break off relations with that regime that massacres Salvadorans daily."

Alfredo Vazquez Carrizosa, former Colombian foreign minister, said that, legally speaking, "the case can be called a /denial of justice/ [in boldface]; that is, the sentence is in open contradiction with the facts. These facts are evidence that makes it necessary to sentence those who were guilty of a crime....In short, there is no reason not to punish a terrible crime known throughout the continent."

Leonidas Rodriguez, president of the Peruvian Socialist Revolutionary Party, expressed his indignation on the telephone also. He added: "This has unquestionably affected and moved all of Latin America because it is a dismal precedent. In our America and throughout the world, it was expected that these criminals would be appropriately punished....A decision of this nature is more or less tied to a position like that of the Salvadoran junta which is hurting the Salvadoran people and revolutionaries so much."

Manuel Galich, a Guatemalan intellectual and director of the Latin American Theater of Casa de las Americas, first referred to the position of the Venezuelan Government. He said: "First of all, I want to repeat something that everyone is aware of. I question whether the government of Luis Herrera Campins and the military system can be called Venezuelan now because, in reality, the foreign policy that this government has followed--especially its support for the Salvadoran junta, for example--is condemnable. Now, the request for acquittal of the Barbados criminals is absolutely against the will of the Venezuelan people who are indeed Venezuelan. I want to say that both cases--the support for the Salvadoran junta and the decision to acquit the criminals--do not really express Venezuelan interests, tradition or dignity. Consequently, I question whether this government and its military system can even call themselves Venezuelan." Galich added: "In the Barbados incident, world public opinion without any restriction or limitation--that is, massively, torrentially--has expressed its indignation."

Genaro Carnero Checa, secretary general of the Latin American Federation of Journalists, energetically condemned the injustice in his habitual style. He stated: "This is an affront to justice and to human rights. The judge of the military court, the army and President Luis Herrera Campins are implicated in it. Why have they done it? It is part of an anti-Cuban campaign. It is necessary to oppose it because it is not only shameful from a legal point of view but in defense. Herrera Campins is totally responsible. As a journalist and in my position as a representative of the Latin American press, I have appealed to the Venezuelan Journalists Association to declare him 'persona non grata' because he is a member of that professional institution. With his attitude, he not only mocks the human conscience but the code of ethics of that sector which prohibits support for criminals."

Former Dominican president Juan Bosch, a writer and novelist, had a stopover in Cuba. After giving his impressions of the meeting of Parliamentarians for Peace held in Bulgaria which he had just left, he said he had heard of the reprehensible decision of the Venezuelan military court when he was in Sofia at a ceremony given by the Bulgarian prime minister. Later he read in the press about the question we asked. "In the first place, I believe it is necessary to say that the sabotage against the Cuban airplane in Barbados, a truly abominable deed, must be viewed not as a personal action by two or three members of Crime and Terror International but as an episode in the world struggle, the battle, between capitalism and socialism. In this case, it is a battle on Cuban terrain; therefore, it is necessary to start from the assumption that the Barbados crime had deeper roots. I believe that that Caracas acquittal was not due merely to the whims of the Venezuelan military. In the first place, the military obey orders in Venezuela and someone gave them. In the second place, that someone was surely President Luis Herrera Campins; he, in turn, must have received them from a much greater power than his in Venezuela. I mean this is part of an international policy that is interested in having those who committed the crime released."

Gerardo Gonzalez, president of the Revolutionary Democratic Party of Panama--the government party--called it "surprising and inconceivable" that any court in Latin America, whether civilian or military, would ask for the acquittal of confessed professional murderers who killed innocent passengers on a commercial airplane, no matter what the nationality. It is known to the Latin American and world public that there were sufficient confessions and evidence to give the maximum sentences to the terrorists implicated in the shocking sabotage of the Cuban airplane in Barbados in 1976."

In a telephone conversation with the secretary general of the Costa Rican Popular Vanguard Party in San Jose, Manuel Mora Valverde expressed himself in these terms: "Naturally, we are not so stupid as to not understand that the Venezuelan Government is behind this verdict. It is inspired by a feeling of ill will, a desire to strike a blow against Cuba and against the entire revolutionary movement of the continent which the Cuban revolution leads. This base desire, this unfortunate position of a government that, in this way, joins its actions with the interests of U.S. imperialism and international reactionaries is actually the result of a political movement that is already giving bloody and painful demonstrations in Central America."

Guillermo Toriello, former Guatemalan foreign minister and a man of international prestige, is an unreserved friend of Cuba. After an analysis of the reprehensible decision of the Venezuelan military court in the Barbados case, Toriello concluded by saying: "A verdict dictated under such conditions--the flagrant violation of the procedural and substantive norms of International Penal Law for crimes against mankind and terrorist actions--is a verdict that constitutes a true legal monstrosity."

Manuel Maldonado, Puerto Rican writer and professor, said: "Venezuelan public opinion has been against that decision. I think that that verdict is also tied to the U.S. acquittal of the terrorists who killed Orlando Letelier. There is also the hand of certain international agencies in this which act under orders to do that type of thing....I want to use this occasion to energetically and firmly condemn this reprehensible acquittal of these criminals who committed an act of international treason."

POSITION ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS STATED AT UN

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 8 Oct 80 p 6

[Text] United Nations, 7 October (PL [Prensa Latina])--Cuba expressed the opinion that the achievement of an international accord, which would prohibit the placement of nuclear arms in countries in which they do not exist, would be to the benefit of international peace and security.

A response given by the government of Cuba to a petition submitted by the UN secretary-general to all countries points out that an international accord along these lines would constitute an effective way to control armaments.

"The nonplacement of nuclear arms in the territory of countries where those arms currently do not exist would be an effective contribution to the system of nuclear nonproliferation and would help strengthen the atmosphere of confidence necessary for the continuation of disarmament negotiations with the proper success,"the Cuban reply pointed out.

The text makes it clear that this measure cannot be understood in the sense that it would approve the existence of nuclear arms on the territory of countries which already have them and its adoption would have to be accompanied by certain guarantees.

It adds that all countries have the right to have the kind of weapons they consider pertinent to the defense of their sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity.

It underscores the fact that the renunciation of this right cannot be considered without the recognition of and respect for the ability of all countries freely to decide their destiny and to pick the economic, political, and social system that most suits the interest of their peoples and without an end being put to the hostile and aggressive actions which are being carried out against them.

To achieve the accord--the Cuban reply points out--it is indispensable for the imperialist powers to put an end to their policy of hostility and aggression against all countries, which would permit the existence of an acceptable climate of confidence, peace, and security.

The note adds that military threats, manifestations of "cold-war" policy must cease,furthermore, that foreign military bases must be dismantled and that it is indispensable not to impose any further and to lift existing measures involving unjust economic sanctions.

The accord, which would prohibit the placement of nuclear arms in countries which do not have them, must go hand in hand with another one preventing the use or the threat of the use of force in international relations and an instrument which would guarantee the security of states that do not have nuclear arms against the employment of such arms.

The Cuban reply asserts that nuclear arms, the constant growth of their number, as well as their dissemination and development constitutes the greatest threat facing mankind right now.

It also makes mention of the voluminous resources taken up by the arms race with the subsequent negative effect deriving from that regarding economic and social development as well as international peace and security.

UN Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim asked all countries for their opinions regarding the possibility of arriving at an international accord which would prohibit the placement of nuclear arms in countries which do not have this type of armament right now.

SOVIET COURSES FOR NUCLEAR SPECIALISTS DESCRIBED

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 9 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Juana Berges]

[Text] In order to train the specialists needed for the nation's nuclear development, soon selection procedures will begin to determine which pre-university students will study abroad, primarily in the Soviet Union.

Between the 15th and 20th of this month, pre-university campuses will begin receiving the forms for students to request enrollment in the nuclear-related majors and specializations, among which are:

Nuclear physics (theoretical and experimental): The study of the atomic nucleus and all the processes that are involved, such as radioactive disintegration, nuclear reactions, nuclear fusion, etc.

Radiochemistry: Oriented basically toward the production of radioactive isotopes and the study of their nature, behavior and practical applications.

Nuclear electronics: Involving the design and construction of the nuclear instrumentation necessary to carry out many types of experiments and research in the nuclear field.

Applied mathematics and electronic computation: To guarantee the mathematical, informational and technical accuracy of the computers used in the calculation centers of various institutions.

Nuclear reactors: Involving the projection, construction, assembly, operation, repair and maintenance of nuclear reactors.

Automation of thermal energy processes: The study of tasks involved in the automation, control and administration of nuclear reactors.

Requirements

The requirements for studying these nuclear fields are: Maintain a grade point average higher than 95 points, with the same average in mathematics, physics and chemistry during pre-university studies; satisfactorily pass the psychometric test that is given to applicants to measure their aptitude and personality; achieve good results in the teaching portion of the Preparatory School; and maintain a good attitude toward studies and other tasks directed by political and mass organizations.

This information was provided at the Ministry of Education headquarters by Comrades Miguel Alfonsin Fernandes, Angel Cardoso del Llano and Antonio Bolufe, all of the Executive Secretariat for Nuclear Affairs.

MEMBER REPRESENTATION IN WORLD BANK SCORED

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 8 Oct 80 p 5

[Commentary by Mario Blanco]

[Text] The joint annual meeting of the IMF and the IBRD--or World Bank--was held recently in Washington in the midst of unresolved contradictions between the industrialized capitalist countries and the underdeveloped countries.

It is clear from the closing speeches by Jacques de Larosiere, managing director of the IMF, and Robert McNamara, president of the IBRD, that the participants in that financial forum did not reach agreement on the increased financial needs of the underdeveloped countries, whose need for those funds is even more urgent now due to the economic crisis shaking the capitalist world.

The industrialized capitalist countries, which are maintaining their political and financial control over both organizations, flatly refused to increase aid to the underdeveloped countries and insisted that the IMF and the IBRD continue to be the "guardians" of the capitalist world's monetary and financial system.

On this occasion--as on previous occasions--the industrialized capitalist countries went against the demands of the underdeveloped countries, which were calling for better conditions in international trade, stabilized prices for their export commodities (above all their raw materials), and the elimination of political discrimination in the granting of loans by the IMF and the IBRD.

The economies of the underdeveloped countries are being affected by the system of reduced imports and higher exports that is being applied by the industrialized capitalist countries. Added to that are the granting of short-term loans at high interest rates and intensified protectionism.

The United States, for example, sends one-third of its exports to those countries while extracting raw materials from them at low prices. As a result of that and other harmful practices, the current balance of payments deficit for the underdeveloped countries as a group is expected to rise to $185 billion, while the general debt for all types of loans exceeds $390 billion.

On the eve of the meeting and also during it, the ministers of 24 underdeveloped countries, speaking for more than 100 countries in the same condition, called for a revision of the joint policy of the IMF and the IBRD. Their demand called for lifting the conditions on which loans are granted.

That "group of 24" proposed that the total loans be increased by $73 billion during the next 6 years. But the basic demands of those countries were rejected. The industrialized capitalist countries revised only a few of the less important conditions governing the obtaining of loans, leaving the system itself sacrosanct.

In the speeches by representatives of the industrialized capitalist countries, especially those by Geoffrey Howe, British chancellor of the Exchequer, Hans Matthoefer, West German minister of finance, and William Miller, U.S. secretary of the Treasury, it was made clearly evident that those countries wish to take advantage of the difficult economic and financial situation of the underdeveloped countries to force the latter to carry out "structural reforms" in their economies. What this actually means is that the latter must abandon their plans for developing their national economies and adapt them to the interests of the main industrial states of the West.

But those attempts encountered energetic resistance from the underdeveloped countries. Tanzanian Minister for Finance and Planning Jamal strongly condemned the spokesmen for the capitalist world for saying they favor "free" trade while in fact practicing the most blatant protectionism.

Liberia's Minister of Planning and Economy Nah-Tipoteh, who spoke in behalf of the group of African countries, said that the latter are alarmed by the serious worsening in the terms of trade. The price of export goods has declined considerably in recent years, while the price of import goods, services, foodstuffs, and petroleum has risen markedly.

For his part, India's Minister of Finance Venkataraman called attention to the fact that the capitalist countries place all kinds of obstacles in the way of exports of industrial products by the underdeveloped countries.

The meeting in Washington made it clear that the IMF's decisions are monopolized in fact by the five most powerful industrialized capitalist countries: the United States, Japan, Great Britain, France, and the FRG. Those countries control 40.49 percent of that institution's votes, and they also control 44 percent of the special drawing rights (SDR's), representing $22.7 billion.

That is in contrast with the position of the 17 most backward countries in the underdeveloped world, which as a group control 1 percent of the votes and less than $120 million in SDR's.

Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, and Venezuela have a vote equal to 5.8 percent of the total, and their SDR quotas total $2,395 million, or 6.1 percent.

All the Latin American countries together possess $3,754.9 million in SDR's--9.6 percent of the total--while their vote amounts to 10.37 percent.

Of the above-mentioned five most powerful capitalist countries, the United States holds the greatest decisionmaking power and the largest volume of SDR's (19.85 percent of the votes and $8,405 million (approximately 22 percent of the total) in SDR's).

Next in order of importance after the United States are Great Britain, with 6.95 percent of the votes and $2,925 million in SDR's; the FRG with 5.14 percent of the votes and $2,156 million in SDR's; France: 4.58 percent and $1.919 million; and Japan: 3.97 percent and $1,659 million in SDR's.

This recent meeting in Washington has proven once again that the underdeveloped countries cannot rely on the "help" of the industrialized capitalist countries and that their just demands are always frustrated.

The Washington meeting also showed that the demands for a complete revision of relations between the underdeveloped nations and the industrialized capitalist countries are continuing to grow.

At the same time as the meeting in Washington, the ministers of the Group of 77 announced that a meeting would be called in 1981 in connection with economic cooperation among the underdeveloped countries. The communique says that because of the current difficulties in their international economic relations and the sharp disagreements between the industrialized capitalist countries and the underdeveloped countries, it is necessary to strengthen cooperation among the latter.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION HEAD DISCUSSES 1981 MEETING

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 31 Oct 80 p 58

[Interview with Pio Carlo Terenzio, secretary general of the Interparliamentary Union, by Susana Tesoro: "September 1981, 68th Interparliamentary Union Conference"]

[Text] Mr Pio Carlo Terenzio, secretary general of the Interparliamentary Union, gave BOHEMIA exclusive statements about the 68th conference of that organization which will be held in Havana. Terenzio visited our country to make initial preparations for the event that will be held from 15 September to 23 September 1981.

Terenzio said: "I heard Fidel Castro speak for the first time at the United Nations; it was in the fall of 1960. I have known ever since that he was the inspiration for Cuba. At that time, I was a UNESCO official; I held several jobs there from 1948 to 1970."

[Question] Was that the beginning of your political career?

[Answer] I do not have a political career; I have not had a political career. I studied international law at the University of Rome and also at the International Law Institute in Geneva. In that same capital, I started as an official of the International Labor Organization. Then I went to UNESCO in 1948 and, in 1970, I began as secretary general of the Interparliamentary Union. I repeat that I do not have a political career because, as an international official, it is necessary to be above national interests of any country.

[Question] Then we will change our question. Was that the beginning of your political training in international work?

[Answer] That is more like it. If we call it training, I have spent 32 years training myself in international politics.

[Question] The Interparliamentary Union has existed since 1889. At what time did this organization change in favor of the developing countries?

[Answer] As you know, the union has existed since the end of the past century. Although those problems existed at that time, they were not mentioned. In 1889, the main thing was the organization of international cooperation for peace. Development was first mentioned in the 1950's. The first decade of development was considered to be from 1960 to 1970, the second from 1970 to 1980 and now the third will be from 1980 to 1990. Also at that time decolonization was first mentioned.

[Question] How has our country participated in the union?

[Answer] Cuba has very actively participated ever since it joined the union. For example, in Lisbon, Cuba presented a proposal on illiteracy that caused a great impression because Cuba has particular experience in this field. You began a literacy period in 1961 with one of the most intensive campaigns in the world. I believe that you have continued because a literacy campaign must be a permanent, constant effort. Cuba does this. Education is in the hands of the people and a minimum of ninth grade education is requested now. There has also been structured academic education because, in addition to adult literacy, primary, intermediate and advanced schools have been well developed. Another thing I can tell you: the Cuban parliament is already very popular in the union. With its serious and sustained work, it is gaining great prestige among the member countries.

[Question] Is it significant that a country that has been a member for only 4 years has been selected to host the most important activity of the union?

[Answer] It is; this is a sign of the prestige that the Cuban parliament has won in the union. Your country has distinguished itself as an excellent leader of the Movement of Nonalined Countries, especially in economic affairs in favor of the poor countries. Therefore, at the 67th Interparliamentary Union Conference held in Berlin in September 1980, one of the most important resolutions--the one on economic affairs--included the proposal President Fidel Castro made at the United Nations concerning the $300 billion that the industrialized countries should contribute to the developing countries.

[Question] What do you think of the conditions of the site for the 68th conference?

[Answer] I could summarize them in a single word: excellent. The Palacio de las Convenciones has everything needed for an event of this type. It has very good installations and quality equipment. In addition to the material conditions, I have found sympathy and support from Cuban Government authorities.

[Question] What would you compare this Interparliamentary Union Conference to?

[Answer] It is an event of similar scope to the sixth summit of the nonalined countries held recently in Havana.

[Question] What will be the main topics on the agenda for the 68th conference?

[Answer] Very generally, we could speak of development, energy and decolonization but, as you know, international politics can change from one minute to the next and the conference is almost a year away. More recent topics would have to be added. The union council will meet in Manila in April; the agenda for the conference can be better outlined then.

[Question] Terrorism and airplane hijacking were already discussed by the Interparliamentary Union. What were the results?

[Answer] In Bonn 2 years ago, the Interparliamentary Union Conference studied the phenomenon of terrorism and condemned it in all its manifestations through a resolution.

[Question] When these resolutions are violated, what does the union do?

[Answer] These resolutions do not have execution clauses. This must come from the parliamentary countries when something of this type occurs. It is hard to carry out our resolutions and this is decisive for the functioning of the union. We have an article in our statutes that, after the adoption of recommendations, the member states have the duty to do what they can so that the parliament in its country complies with the resolutions. If everyone helped in this, our organization would unquestionably gain effectiveness.

Results have been seen, for example, in the release of parliamentary members; in 37 cases of imprisoned parliamentary members, 27 were released, mostly in Latin America. The parliaments of countries that have really been interested in complying with the organization influenced this. We believe that it helps a lot when a resolution is dictated; it is the responsibility of the parliaments to comply with it.

[Question] What countries will participate in the 68th conference?

[Answer] The union has 89 member countries; also parliamentary members in exile follow our conferences. The members are invited although, at times, they do not all attend. More precisely, we believe about 1,000 people will attend the 68th conference.

[Question] What can you predict about the development of the conference next September?

[Answer] It is not easy to predict. However, if I base it on the work done by Cuba and the support, facilities and good will that the Cuban parliamentary members have contributed, I believe that the conference will go very well. Therefore, it will have encouraging results for world peace.

ICAP CELEBRATES NIGERIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 3 Oct 80 p 4

[Article by Pedro Costa: "20th Anniversary of Nigerian Independence Celebrated by Cuban Institute of Friendship with Peoples"]

[Text] The 20th anniversary of Nigeria's independence was celebrated at the headquarters of the ICAP (Cuban Institute of Friendship with Peoples), a ceremony presided over by Armando Acosta, member, Party Central Committee, and president of the Cuban-African Friendship Association.

Heriberto Feraudy, head of the African and Middle Eastern Department of ICAP, stressed the honor implied in the fact that the Cuban-African Friendship Association and ICAP were able to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the independence of Nigeria. He also emphasized the bonds of friendship which link our two peoples, bonds which go back to our common roots, because of the African presence in our nation.

The ceremony was also attended by Abdullaid Ibrahim Atta, Ambassador of Nigeria in Cuba, officials of that diplomatic mission, members of the board of directors of the Cuban-African Friendship Association, ICAP officials, and other invited guests from the Diplomatic Corps.

SPACE FLIGHT TELECASTS MADE POSSIBLE BY ATLANTIC SATELLITE

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 8 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Jose Gabriel Guma: "How It Was Possible For TV Transmissions Of The Space Flight To Reach Our Homes"]

[Text] This joint flight, from the television transmission point of view, has been more complex than previous flights of the Intercosmos Program. Because of the distance which separates Cuba from the USSR, it was necessary to use Atlantic stationary satellite Number 4. It is the operation of the greatest scope undertaken up to now by Cuban television.

From one end of the island to the other, the Cuban people have had the opportunity of sharing the emotions and tensions resulting from the launching of Soyuz-38, its docking with Salyut-6, the entrance by Lt Col Arnaldo Tamayo and Col Yuri Romanenko into the orbital station and the performance of a number of important experiments in space, through the clear pictures on television.

Television viewers, comfortably seated at home, since last Thursday, 18 September, have gone daily from Salyut 6 to the Flight Control Center or to the Moscow television center of Ostankino to follow the happenings of an event which is already a part of history.

However, behind this television transmission, which because it is a daily occurrence we may consider as something normal, is a problem of a technical nature that has required a broad and careful planning and an all-out effort by a large number of workers of the Cuban Institute of Radio and Television [ICRT], particularly from its television section and the national or international communications enterprises of the Ministry of Communications [MINCOM].

A Little Bit of History

The first antecedents of this vast effort took place 18 months ago when technicians of several fields in matters of telecommunications were informed of the need to begin to work so that Cuban television viewers could enjoy a suitable news coverage during the first space flight of a Latin American cosmonaut.

Since this was a matter of a new task, which was not easy for those who had to carry it out, help was sought where there was an accumulation of experience. Engineers, technicians, producers and television newsmen went to the USSR and Hungary at the time of the joint flight by cosmonauts from those two countries. They also returned to the USSR for the more recent joint Soviet-Vietnamese flight.

In Baikonur, Cuban personnel inspected technical and production aspects at the launch site itself, while in Budapest they appraised how the native country of one of the cosmonauts handled equipment and information.

As a next step, a committee was formed, which among other objectives, analyzed the experience accumulated in previous space flights. Moreover, qualified personnel were selected on the basis of their experience, years of service and dedication to work.

At the same time, a seminar was held for a group of newsmen and commentators so that they would learn with relative exactness how space flights were produced. Showings of video tapes and filmed material from Soviet television and other countries of the Intercosmos Program allowed them to learn what should and should not be done to make transmissions achieve the required quality.

A Complex Work

In a telephone conversation by GRANMA with the Ostankino Television Center in Moscow, Danilo Sirio, Cuban television program director, reported that from the point of view of television transmissions "This flight has been more complex than previous flights."

This is because Cuba is located on the other side of the planet and could only receive transmissions via satellite, while the socialist countries close to the USSR also have a microwave system, he said.

Since transmissions in both directions are made by the same satellite--from Moscow to Havana and vice versa--it was necessary to make tests and checks to reduce the time in which the direction of transmission could be changed. This period of "rapid switching" was reduced to only 5 seconds.

At the same time, the operation of transmission and coordination lines required a joint work between the Ministries of Communications of both countries and the State Television and Radiobroadcasting Committee of the USSR and the ICRT.

The Operation of Greatest Scope

Actually, in questions of transmission, Cuban television news management planned a number of programs from the USSR and Cuba during the time the joint flight lasted. After a check of their practicality and correctness, the initial ideas are the ones which have been placed in operation, according to Raul Noriega, assistant director of the National Television Newscast.

Up to now, the most ambitious Cuban television transmission, from the point of view of complexity, was the March of the Fighting People, which required sending the picture from 14 provinces to the entire country. It was thought that it was going to be very difficult to exceed that effort. However, once more life had its way quickly and the transmission of the space flight has already become the operation of greatest scope undertaken up to now by television.

One of the peculiarities of this work is the fact that Salyut-6 only has communications with earth when it flies over the immense Soviet territory or that nearby, which forces the use of that relatively short time--the orbital station moves at a speed of tens of thousands of kilometers per hour--for the transmission of television reports from space.

Explanatory Materials.

In addition to transmissions from space, television prepared a number of informative explanatory materials, filmed in the USSR by cameraman Antonio Gomez. Those materials allowed newsmen and commentators Pedro Ventura, Manolo Ortega, Eddy Martin, Tony Gonzalez Martin and Freddy Moro to make several reports on the interior of Salyut, the docking process and other aspects having to do with the new space flight.

Every day (or every night depending on the place on the planet on which we are located), transmissions were made from Studio Three of Ostankino of "Program Cosmos," which lasted approximately 2 hours and began at 2300 in Moscow (1600 in Havana). This program was transmitted to Cuban viewers in a delayed broadcast at 2030.

Since the Moscow signals are synchronized with those of the ICRT studio in Havana, which was especially adapted for that purpose, Manolo Ortega and Antonio Pera were able to appear simultaneously on the small screen despite the 14,000 kilometers which separate the Soviet and Cuban capitals. That synchronization also took place for the first time in the annals of Cuban television.

Daily Reports

Besides "Program Cosmos," interesting reports were transmitted daily for the National Television Newscast. In all this work there has been the extraordinary support of Soviet television, which has provided the transmission studio, the installations for the developing of film material, editing of films and video tapes and many other resources.

Actually, transmissions from Ostankino had two television directors: Danilo Sirio, a Cuban, and Valeri Kalbucevich of the Soviet Union, although the cutting of "Program Cosmos" was done by the Cubans.

All Cuban personnel, who worked at the Soviet television center at that time, maintained close coordination with codirector Guillermo Alemany, who remained in Havana in charge of a special group at a remote control unit which coordinated the "switches" and transmissions and participated decisively in the preparation of the listings of daily programs.

Twice in Space

Interviewed by telephone by GRANMA, Engineer Francisco Bernardo Zayas agreed that "this transmission system is even more extensive than the one used for the recent Olympic Games."

Television signals from Salyut-6, he explained, are received by television tracking stations in Soviet territory. From there they pass to the Space Flight Control Center and from there to the Ostankino Television Center. After arriving at the Dubna earth station 45 kilometers from Moscow, they return to space, this time to Atlantic stationary satellite Number 4. From there they go back down to earth to the Caribe station near Jaruco in Cuba. From this place the signals continue via microwave to the ICRT and to a color mobile unit located near 23rd and M Streets. In the final phase, they are distributed by the microwave network throughout national territory.

The stationary satellite has five channels for communications with Cuba: radio and television transmissions, coordination of those transmissions, transmission by Cuban newsmen from the press center in the Hotel Mir and direct liaison between the press center installed at the Convention Palace in Havana and Ostankino. These channels make it possible for the execution of the "Hatuey" experiment in which it was necessary to pierce certain types of capsules simultaneously in Havana, Moscow and Baikonur. Frank Deulofeu, MINCOM technician, was outstanding in the maintenance work servicing those channels.

Victor Uglov, assistant director for International Relations, and Slava Koslenko, official of that same office of the USSR State Television and Radiobroadcasting Committee, told GRANMA via those same channels, that Soviet television feels greatly pleased at having had the chance to provide its help to Cuban television on the occasion of this joint space flight, which, they emphasized, improves working relationships between both organizations--the ICRT and the aforementioned Soviet State Committee--at a space level.

Caribe Station

One of the places where intensive work took place during the space flight was the Caribe Station of the MINCOM. It is installed in an area characterized by a special microclimate near Jaruco. This unit is operated by 74 workers, 36 of whom are technicians.

Emilio Perez, chief of station operations, reported that personnel had been organized into three operational groups for the better handling of work 24 hours per day and to insure that the television transmissions were received by the Cuban people with the required quality.

"The total time of transmissions from Moscow to Havana and vice versa is several hours per day," he said. He recalls that personnel remained at the station on a state of alert for several days so that the television viewers and radio listeners could follow the principal activities of the occupants of Salyut-6.

Remote Control

In the long chain of elements, which remained in action so that we could all see Cosmonaut-Researcher Lt Col Arnaldo Tamayo, Cuban researchers, the way in which the space flight was taking place and the execution of experiments every day, all the links were important but among them the Television Remote Control Department was outstanding.

Remote Control went on the alert 7 days before the launching of Soyuz-38. It was necessary for a number of tasks to be performed to facilitate television transmissions from Guantanamo, Holguin, San Antonio de los Banos and the ICRT Cosmos Studio, the latter two in the capital.

Since they had to reach the MINCOM national microwave network, they went hurriedly to several strategic high points: Boniato and Gran Piedra in Santiago de Cuba; Loma de la Cruz in Holguin and Loma de Salon in Pinar del Rio. Color television units went up to those points.

At the same time, work was going on to prepare for transmissions originating from the street where the Tamayo family lives in Guantanamo; the "Sixtieth Anniversary of the October Revolution" combine factory in Holguin and the Air Brigade of the Playa Giron Guard.

More than 20 vehicles, counting color television units, trucks with telescoping towers, signal repeaters, lighting trucks, liaison cars, worker transportation buses and mobile machineshops, were sent to the aforementioned areas, according to Ezquiel Garcia Trapaga, Engineer Jose Ramon Diaz and Mario Riera, director, technical chief and telecommunications chief, respectively, of Remote Control.

A contingent of 80 men, consisting of video and audio technicians, cameramen, electricians, lighting technicians, tower men, drivers and auxiliary personnel occupied their work posts and contributed their efficient work so that not only the Cuban people, but also those of the USSR, could see the family of the first Latin American cosmonaut, his comrades of the Revolutionary Armed Forces and other pictures of today's Cuba.

"Indeed, it was a tense and difficult task but the workers of the Remote Control Department once more rose to the challenge and did their job," agree Alberto Zayas, Julio Pulido and Pedro Basso, secretaries general of the party, the union and the Union of Young Communists [UJC] in that department of the ICRT.

When asked for the names of some of those men who outdid themselves in that work, there were many of them but it was decided to mention only one as a representative of all of them: the veteran Clotildo Socorro.

The Greatest Incentive

This article could extend to the studio installed especially for the joint flight, the control rooms and many other sections of the ICRT and the MINCOM, however, as Ovidio Cabrera, television news director and director of its national newscast, said, the results of this hard work are seen daily by television viewers and this is the greatest incentive for continuing to work more and better so that there may be an increase in quality in national television and radio.

VEIGA CLOSES NATIONAL WORK, SALARY MEETING

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 6 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Evelio Telleria: "There Is Progress in Work Organization But This Activity Needs More Stimulus in Country"]

[Text] The Third National Work Organization and Salary Meeting held in Havana passed an extraordinary resolution. It showed total support for Commander in Chief Fidel Castro's recent condemnation of the Venezuelan Government's abominable action acquitting the perpetrators of the heinous crime in Barbados when 73 people on a Cuban airplane were killed.

This 2-day meeting was characterized by its analytical and critical spirit. It approved a general resolution recognizing "considerable progress as a result of the application outlined by our party line" in work organization and wages. It established a program of immediate tasks to stimulate that activity more and to complete all those pending which affect the progress of the recently dictated wage reform.

Those presiding over the meeting included: Lionel Soto, member of the Secretariat of the party; Roberto Veiga, secretary general of the CTC [Central Organization of Cuban Trade Unions], who closed the meeting and Faustino Perez, head of the Office for Servicing Local People's Government Organs, both members of the Central Committee; Joaquin Benavides, minister president of the CETSS [State Committee for Labor and Social Security], who gave the main report; and officials Enrique Gutierrez for the CETSS, Lazaro Dominguez for the CTC and Euclides Vazquez Candela for the Economic Department of the Central Committee.

Joaquin Benavides' Report

Joaquin Benavides, minister president of the CETSS, began his report saying: "So far this year, more than 500,000 norms have been updated and payment for yield has been implemented with more than 300,000 workers. In the first case, this is twice what was initially planned and, in the second case, it is 1-1/2 times more than planned. These, combined with the increase of more than 350,000 workers stimulated by bonus systems, the more rational use of norms as an instrument of economic management and the favorable increase in work organization—all within the framework of the activity generated by the General Wage Reform—guarantee a satisfactory evaluation of the work done."

Summarizing as of August 1980, there were 953,044 workers being paid for yield.

He added: "The organizations that have achieved the highest percentages of workers being paid for yield are MINAZ [Ministry of the Sugar Industry] with 61 percent, MINAL [Ministry of the Food Industry] with 61 percent and MINIL [Ministry of Light Industry] with 57 percent. In addition to these organizations, MIP [Ministry of the Fishing Industry], INTUR [National Tourist Institute] and the Ministry of Agriculture stand out for their increases in the application of payment for yield thus far this year.

"The organizations farthest behind and with serious problems in the application of payment for yield are MICOM [Ministry of Communications] (12 percent), MINED [Ministry of Education] (14 percent), the Ministry of Culture (24 percent) and CEATM [State Committee for Technical and Material Supply] (27 percent)."

Concerning the application of rewards, Benavides indicated: "During this period, in order to improve the application of payment for yield, the use of bonuses has increased greatly. This is one form of reward that connects the wages of the workers directly involved in production or services to the results of their work."

As of 31 August, 362,313 workers did work stimulated by bonus systems.

As to the application of the General Wage Reform, the minister president of the CETSS stated: "As of 21 September, there were 132 enterprises and 75 independent establishments with 138,085 workers authorized by the provincial committees. We feel this mediocre figure is acceptable if we take into account the short period for application and the requirements of Resolution No. 457. According to the figures provided by the provinces on application in those enterprises and establishments that are creating the conditions or have promised to this year, we can end the year with more than 800,000 workers and some 1,000 enterprises benefiting from the application of the wage reform."

The main report was approved by about 250 representatives of state organizations, people's government organs and leaders of the CTC and its national unions. They added their contributions to it.

The new tasks that will begin immediately include: continuing work standardization in all activities that can be standardized and revising those norms that are fulfilled outside the parameters of Resolution No. 236; incorporating all feasible workers in the plan of payment for yield; and continuing to improve the Work Organization Development Plan as a result of daily systematic and hard work.

The general resolution that was passed also included: the completion of all pending tasks which, one way or another, affect the progress of the wage reform; continued work to guarantee the training of technical personnel in work organization and wages in the shortest time possible; and concern for the rational use of labor resources and wage funds.

Roberto Veiga's Conclusions

When presenting the conclusions of the meeting, Roberto Veiga stated: "There is still a lot to do in work organization and wages. This is very true as is the fact, confirmed by this meeting, that, in the course of these few months, we have achieved as much as we did in the last 5 years."

The 953,044 workers being paid for yield include the agricultural sector where payment by finished field has been reimplemented, the construction sector where wages by agreement have been reimplemented, the transportation sector with the link in bus transportation and the restaurant network, trade and other services as well as some industries. Veiga announced: "Based on preliminary projected figures, we can have more than 1.3 million workers working under the system of payment for yield next year."

He added: "The number of workers receiving payment for yield is not the only indicator that lets us evaluate this activity positively. We must not let ourselves be dazzled by numbers. Experience teaches us that we achieve nothing by including the workers in this system if the requirements for carrying out this task are not met, if this link is not supervised and analyzed systematically in each place and if there is laxity."

He announced that next year they hope to add more than 300,000 workers to the bonus system which will give a total of more than 800,000 "which is a respectable figure." He exhorted them not only to direct their efforts toward quantity but also to watch for quality in this work. Every centavo paid in bonuses must correspond to a rational entry in savings, improved quality and increased material goods and services.

He also exhorted them to finish the process of revising norms throughout the country.

Discussing the General Wage Reform, the secretary general of the CTC stressed: "We must not lose sight of the fact that the expenses derived from the application of the reform to the workers in the administrative sector and the service workers in the nonproductive sphere help improve the efficiency of those activities although obviously they do not directly affect the production of material goods."

He added: "To prevent a possible internal financial imbalance as a result of the application of the reform to these workers, it is indispensable that the application and the expected economic efficiency derived from it do not delay the sectors that are directly involved in the production of material goods. This shows the vital importance of this demand in the industrial sector." (In the meeting, it was indicated that "the industrial sector shows the greatest delay in the application of the reform.")

Veiga ended saying: "We conclude the work of this Third Work Organization and Salary Meeting filled with enthusiasm and justified optimism. It encourages us and commits us to go to the Second Party Congress with concrete results in the fight to encourage work organization and wages and with the promising prospect that those results will be multiplied in the coming years."

CAMACHO CLOSES GRADUATING CLASS CEREMONY

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 6 Oct 80 p 3

[Article by Raisa Pages]

[Text] "We are deeply saddened by the absence of a student from this graduation ceremony who was an unequaled example of what a Marxist revolutionary should be and who was convinced of the need for attaining higher levels of knowledge, Comrade Celia Sanchez," said Julio Camacho Aguilera, member of the Central Committee Secretariat and first secretary of the Communist Party in Havana City, as he made the closing remarks at the graduation ceremony of the Fourth Class in Social Sciences of the party's Nico Lopez Higher School.

This graduating class--in which 138 leaders of the party, state and mass organizations were graduated--was given the name of Celia Sanchez Class by unanimous consent of student body, as a tribute to the fact that she had shared studies with them until the very last moments of her life and had offered an example of a disciplined, studious individual concerned about the effective functioning of the collective of students who carried out their work responsibilities simultaneously with political-ideological training.

With the concurrence of the school rectorate, Julio Camacho Aguilera delivered Comrade Celia Sanchez' degree in social sciences posthumously to Osmany Cienfuegos, member of the Central Committee and the Council of State.

Luis Pavon Tamano, rector of the school, gave the teaching staff's report on the course which began in March 1976 and lasted 4 1/2 years, 3 of which dealt with general studies and 1 1/2 with two areas of specialized study, ideology and economics, depending upon the duties and responsibilities of the students in their leadership role.

After referring to the upcoming celebration of the 20th anniversary of the founding of this higher school, Pavon said, "The party has taught us a great deal during these years, and we must continue to demand of ourselves that we meet the needs of the Revolution."

Later, the 138 graduates received their diplomas from the guest of honor on the speakers' stand on which the following persons were seated: Humberto Perez, Jose Ramon Fernandez and Flavio Bravo, vice presidents of the Council of Ministers;

Fabio Grobart, president of the Institute of History of the Workers Movement and the Cuban Socialist Revolution, and Lino Carreras, both members of the Central Committee; and Antonio Diaz, chief of the Central Committee's Department of Internal Education.

Jose L. Cuza, alternate member of the party's Central Committee, in the name of the graduates, said that this graduating class was dedicated to Celia Sanchez, to the party's Second Congress and to the most complete and proper revolutionary: Commander in Chief Fidel Castro.

Camacho Aguilera's Speech

In his concluding remarks, Camacho Aguilera made heartfelt comments about Celia. He said, "She demonstrated that neither the many responsibilities which weighed heavily upon her shoulders, nor the high position she held were reasons for her to fail to comply with the discipline of study.

"Celia," he added, "is an example for emulation by all of us who perform our duties in the party's ranks, for emulation by those of us who are leaders and teachers: to be just, objective and open; to leave no room for indolence, for inadequate methods in the analysis of situations and problems."

After emphasizing the importance of studying Marxism-Leninism to attain the highest levels in the building of socialism, he recalled statements made by Fidel: "We are not studying Marxism out of mere historical or philosophical curiosity. No, for us, it is vital, it is fundamental, it is decisive that we study Marxism."

He emphasized that the ideological battle will never end so long as the enemy exists and that to this end we must not only have a rigorous defense but must also carry on an implacable ideological offensive capable of maintaining us as the vanguard of the sweeping process of exalted political awareness exhibited in recent months by our people which reached its highest level in the Marches of the Combatant People.

Referring to the 20th anniversary of the school's founding, he recalled Fidel's foresighted decision to establish this center in the final days of 1960, in the midst of political and economic problems of great complexity and how during these two decades many of the party and state leaders cadres had been graduated from higher education courses.

Among the immediate perspectives of the school, he mentioned the qualitative and quantitative improvement of its faculty, emphasizing excellence in teaching and research work and the doctoral training of professors.

After taking up aspects of the international and national situations, he said that this graduation ceremony was taking place during preparations for the party's Second Congress and the last few months of the country's most important 5-year period as regards the tasks of institutionalization. He wished the graduates success in carrying out the tasks entrusted to them by the revolutionary fatherland.

FAR TRIBUNAL REVIEW CLOSED BY GUEVARA QUINTANA

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 12 Oct 80 p 44

[Text] The meeting of specialists of the Military Prosecutor's Office for the 1980-81 year of instruction was held from 22-24 September in the theater of the Economic Police in the City of Havana and was attended by chiefs and officers from the Chief Military Prosecutor's Office and the territorial and garrison military prosecutors and their deputies.

During the meeting, the principal aspects of the work developed by the Military Prosecutor's Office in all areas were evaluated, emphasizing the deficiencies which still persist as well as the search for solutions to raising the quality and efficiency of the tasks performed, shaped around the data announced for the execution of activities during the new year of instruction.

With this objective in mind, a thorough analysis was made of the methods employed in carrying out criminal trials during the instruction phase, as well as of the legality of procedures before the military courts and the internment of prisoners in disciplinary units.

There were also training sessions on the control and reporting of investigations when legal steps in the military units and institutions are completed and on other matters related to the tasks of the Military Prosecutor's Office. Again, among the questions treated, the causes and conditions which facilitate or cause crimes and other infractions were given preferential attention by the participants because of their importance in reducing crime and strengthening discipline and order among the troops, emphasizing the need for thorough study of these as well as of the objectivity of proposals made to the commands for their eradication as one of the principal ways to prevent crime.

The new Military Legal Education System, implemented during the current year of instruction, insofar as it involves consultation with instructors and control of program compliance in the units and the Military Education Centers, was also the subject of study, because of its novelty and importance, tying it in with the activities of the Military Prosecutor's Office in the fields of prevention and legal education.

Present at the closing ceremonies of the meeting were the attorney general of the republic, Idalberto L. de Guevara Quintana; Brigade Gen Ulises Rosales del Toro, a member of the party's Central Committee and chief of the Western Army; the deputy attorney general and chief military prosecutor, Col/Legal Services Mario Albarello Garcia; and the deputy chief of the National Revolutionary Police, Col Raul Garcia Rivero, as well as other chiefs and officials of FAR and MININT [Ministry of Interior].

In his summary, the attorney general of the republic gave a positive evaluation to the achievements of the Military Prosecutor's Office in the performance of its tasks, and he emphasized the need to eradicate existing deficiencies in the search for better results. In concluding he said, "I must emphasize the great need for each and every one of you to continue to broaden your knowledge of the various areas of work of the Military Prosecutor's Office, disciplining and controlling your subordinates in this area, to obtain ever more positive results in the elimination of the causes of and the conditions which lead to or favor the commission of crimes and other infractions of the law and to permit us to raise the quality and objectivity of the activities of crime prevention and legal education, as well as in the completion of the other missions entrusted by our party and our revolutionary government."

FAR OLYMPIC ATHLETES HONORED BY SPORTS UNIT

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 5 Oct 80 p 49

[Article by Ramon Garcia M.]

[Text] The closing ceremonies of the third methodological meeting of the FAR [Revolutionary Armed Forces] Sports Unit could not have had a better climax than the emotional tribute given the 13 military athletes who defended so honorably the colors of the fatherland and of FAR during the competition at the 22d Olympic Games at Moscow in 1980.

The aforementioned political and cultural activity took place at the training center for outstanding athletes and was presided over by Lt Col Eclio Lobaina Lobaina, chief of the FAR Sports Unit, and Lt Col Jose Mar Rodriguez, chief of the political section of MINFAR [Ministry of the Revolutionary Armed Forces] Special Units.

In this way the party cell, the commanding officers, the UJC [Union of Young Communists] and the unit's union section recognized the individual and collective efforts of the technical and methodological structures of this training center, which made it possible for the first time for such a large group of FAR competitors to represent us in an event of such magnitude.

The 13 athletes to whom diplomas were given for their participation in the Moscow event were warrant officers Adelso Pena Teruel and Rafael Rodriguez Avila (marksmanship); first sergents Orlando Cowley del Barrio (water polo); Jose Neninger, Juan Querol Miranda, Ramon Medina, Lazaro Jimenez, Juan de Dios Prendes and Jesus Agramonte (handball); privates Antonio Quintero (bicycle racing); Reinaldo Cunill Infante (rowing) and Rene Pedrosa (handball); and civilian worker Ruben Cuevas Cabrera (handball trainer).

Comrade Abel Lopez, secretary general of the party cell in the FAR Sports Unit, summarized the activity, transmitting congratulations and recognition to the military Olympic athletes on behalf of all the political and mass organizations, as well as of the members of the high command.

IMPORTANCE OF MILITARY SERVICE DESCRIBED

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 16 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Roger Ricardo Luis]

[Text] Among the major tasks which the working people are entrusting to the new generation is first and foremost preparation for the defense of the socialist fatherland.

One of the ways in which a great number of young men enter our invincible Revolutionary Armed Forces is Active Military Service [SMA].

Who as a small boy did not dream of firing a rifle, driving a tank, parachuting out of the skies or mastering the secrets of complex military technology?

With the Revolution, young men also have the opportunity to realize those dreams as they do their patriotic duty; and the SMA is an open door to that future.

Frequently, we hear derogatory comments about the worth of the mission being carried out by the SMA in the training of young men; however, such comments could not be further from the truth.

Military life in all senses of the term requires a great deal of dedication, discipline, character, courage, intelligence, initiative and spirit of sacrifice; and it is precisley all these things which contribute to the forging of the young man's character, to making him more mature, prepared for life, not to mention the fact that these things make military life more attractive.

Army Gen Raul Castro, in his summation of the Constituent Conference of the Patriotic Military Training Society (SEPMI) said:

"A military man is human and makes mistakes and fails; however, he is tenacious and picks himself up, trusts in his strengths, learns to use them and counts upon the collective for his advancement. Military life, with its strict hierarchy, does not separate men but rather unites them in the camaraderie which is forged in its ranks and can only be compared to the camaraderie which develops at work. The psychology of the young soldier is foreign to individualism, and the healthiest pride a young man experiences is that of the soldier who has done his duty for the fatherland and the people."

To Do One's Duty with Honor

This year, all male Cuban citizens born in 1964 will have to register for the SMG, as provided by 1973 law 1255, "General Military Service" [SMG].

Included without exception are all males born in 1964 who must register notwithstanding their work or study activities, including, logically, young men in Camilo [Cienfuegos] units, scholarship holders or other categories.

Those who are temporarily abroad can report to an embassy or consulate and sign the Military Register; later, when they return to Cuba, they can formalize their registration in the SMG by presenting the document which verifies their stay outside the country.

Young men who have an ailment must report to the Registration Committee and present official medical certificates verifying their condition. Doctors who are members of this committee will evaluate the case.

The parents of a young man who because of illness is unable to be present in person will report to clarify the situation with the Registration Committee and similarly will present verifying documents.

For registration purposes, the above-mentioned committees are established in every municipality and will be headed by the chief of the Municipal Military Directorate of the People's Government and will be made up of representatives of the party, UJC [Union of Young Communists], MININT [Ministry of Interior], the People's Government and a team of doctors from the Public Health Section who will conduct the registrant physical fitness examination.

As already stated [as published], the registration period will be from 1 September to 31 October, although the various provinces and municipalities may have particular deadlines within this time frame.

Young men with scholarships, must register in the municipality in which their study center is located. Once they have graduated, they must arrange for the transfer of their registration.

When a young man registers he receives his "Preinduction Certificate," This personal document verifies his situation as regards the SMG. The certificate shows the decision made by the Registration Committee and the result of his physical examination, along with other general information and the registrant's photo.

When he registers in the SMG, a young man is placed in the "Preinduction" category which he will keep until his future call into Active Military Service.

One of the preinduction registrant's obligations is to report changes of address or study center in a period not to exceed 7 days, attend preinduction courses given by the SEPMI and take treatments to restore his health, in cases where an anomaly is detected during his physical examination.

Finally, young men who register this year, in accordance with the law, may be called into service in 1981. However, common practice in most cases is not to call a young man into Active Military Service until he is 18 years old. This will permit him to complete his midlevel technical or preuniversity studies before doing his duty of preparing for the defense of the fatherland.

PCC MEETINGS HELD IN VARIOUS MILITARY BRANCHES

Casas Regueiro at Rearguard

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 5 Oct 80 pp 52-53

[Article by Rafael: "Organization and Discipline--Good Results"]

[Text] In delivering his concluding remarks, Div Gen Senen Casas Regueiro, first deputy minister of the FAR [Revolutionary Armed Forces], chief of the general staff, and member of the Party Central Committee, correctly analyzed the Sixth Party Conference of the Rear Guard Headquarters of the FAR, pointing out that the thorough critical and self-critical analysis of that event is an indication of the maturity achieved by the communists.

This quality was undoubtedly in evidence throughout this entire important party activity. But it was not just the depth of the analysis that counted; there are many more aspects to be singled out regarding these meetings, such as discipline, organization, flexibility, and synthesis. Punctuality was one of the main factors from the very beginning. At the scheduled hour, the strains of the National Anthem opened the top-level meeting of communists in the Rear Guard. The summary of the central report in a few pages covered the essence of the document, the subject that was really at the very center of the problem complex involved in this effort. Besides, it permitted those present to deliver their remarks in a direct and concrete manner, without digression. The report was discussed, point by point, and was the subject of a careful analysis by all delegates who introduced a considerable number of amendments and additions, thus helping to describe the fruit of the work done throughout this entire phase. We must also point out that the document, in each of its parts, listed not only the successes achieved but also pointed up those aspects where it is necessary to correct shortcomings which must absolutely be eliminated.

Upon completion of this part, the delegates considered the work objectives and the activity report of the committeed attached to the political section. The discussion of both documents was a repetition of the earlier one. All those present, in addressing the meeting, did so in such a manner that the conference stayed right on schedule, although with the same flexibility.

Thus, each speech was characterized by the acuity of its statements, not only to amend a particular point but also to add a new point, always in a spirit of objectivity.

Important moments in the conference were the election of the party committee attached to the political section and the committee of delegates to the Second Congress of the PCC [Communist Party of Cuba]. The chair announced the names that had been put in nomination and there were no objections to them; nevertheless, according to the rules, there was a direct and secret vote whose results confirmed the nominations.

But the conference was not just all analysis and discussion. There were moments of profound content, for example, a little show presented by the Pioneers of the "Nueva Creacion"School, during which the little Pioneer girl Niurka Molina read a salute to all the delegates. We must also single out here the presentation expressing satisfaction over the space mission by the crew of the spaceship "Soyuz 38," made up of Col Yuriy Romanenko and Lt Col Arnaldo Tamayo Mendez, the first Cuban cosmonaut. A motion was approved unanimously sending them greetings in the name of the communists at Rear Guard headquarters, plus a pledge to redouble efforts in future work.

The concluding remarks deliverd by Div Gen Senen Casas Regueiro ended this conference. In addition to what he said earlier, he stressed some aspects to be considered in the future so as to achieve more satisfactory results, for example, by continuing to elevate the mobilization and combat readiness; perfecting work methods where participation of all communists is vital. He assigned particular importance to competition as a means for providing impetus for the daily activities of the units and, at the same time, as a way enabling it to continue to play a significant role, as it has done until now.

In another portion of his remarks he talked about the achievements recorded in ideological work in the units of Rear Guard Headquarters but he noted that it is absolutely necessary to continue to perfect the methods with a view to achieving greater depth. He underscored the need for consolidating the work of the militants within their radius of action and stepping up party activities where this is realy required.

He furthermore underlined the need for closer bonds with the masses and their organizations--an activity in which the political organizations must give their assistance.

Colome Ibarra at DAAFAR

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 5 Oct 80 pp 50-51

[Article by Jesus Casal Guerra: "Greatly Strengthened"]

[Text] If we were to talk about the Seventh Party Conference in DAAFAR [Antiaircraft Defense and Revolutionary Air Force], we would undoubtedly be obligated to look into the work done by the units and political organizations, by the communists, in the light of the fact to be stressed here, the fact that the fundamental activities and tasks of this type of armed forces were meritoriously supported by the militants as they accomplished these tasks.

The central report without any doubt proved that the party base organizations were fully committed to providing support to the fundamental tasks assigned by higher headquarters and that there was the proper analysis, coupled with party measures, in response to the difficulties encountered.

The successes were announced only in a summary fashion. The discussions, the thorough investigation, the critical approach were devoted to the shortcomings, to the errors, to the problems that were able to influence better accomplishment of missions assigned to the units.

Among the aspects concerning internal party life, the one that attracted our attention most was the obvious concern with continuing the effort to perfect the direct activities of the communists and the political organizations among the troops; in this way we would also further develop the political-ideological training of each of the fighting men.

On that score, and through the remarks that were made, we were able to discover that there are many base organizations that have a working method spelled out in this relation on the basis of better planning. The same is true of the political sections on the various echelons which, to an acceptable percentage, managed to organize their work so that they were able to gain enough time to devote themselves to working directly with the men.

Another one of the aspects expressing this concern and emerging in the party analysis deals with the elevation of ideological work, above all in the units where the economic calculation system has been set up because of what this new element represents to good mission accomplishment in military enterprises.

During the remarks, we heard the very well-sustained opinion regarding the importance of party work along those lines for the purpose of guiding the vast working masses on this matter and, on the other hand, as a leading political organization, to serve as a channel for the exchange of experiences and information between the units with the purpose of promoting, together with the command, the better development of a new economic element in Cuba.

Although it is true that there has been satisfactory work during the recent period in the various aspects of party life, and in the vast majority of cases likewise, this kind of effort was also present in one of the central tasks (we might say, one of the most important tasks in the life of the units): combat and mobilization readiness.

On that score we critically took up the deficiencies which we face in certain units. However, in spite of the fact that no importance was assigned to this aspect in the analysis, the thing that received major emphasis was the position assumed by the party, through its own methods and style, in support of the command, so as to help in solving the problems that we faced.

The central report took up these situations rather roughly, but the conference was also somewhat rough in analyzing them.

One of the aspects that must constantly be stressed in party life undoubtedly relates to the long-range character with which the most important problems are tackled. And the communists who attended that conference, representing the entire militancy of the DAAFAR, knew how to take this properly into account.

We want to assure our readers on that point because we had an opportunity, above all in relation to the topic of combat and operational training, to look into an analysis of future developments, as presented by the participants, regarding the preparation of those who at these moments are being trained as pupils in the Camilo Cienfuegos schools and as cadets at military training centers.

The party did not lag either in the specialized advanced training of each of the technicians and engineers which is why, in its analysis, it stressed the need for maintaining and improving this aspect because of what it represents in the efforts to improve the degree of combat readiness and training of the units.

Matters relating to the maintenance and preservation of equipment and weapons were also at the focus of discussion at the Seventh Conference.

Although it is true that some party organizations are still facing deficiencies, which must be handled through their corresponding activity plans, it is no less true that the communists came up with resolutions in response to each of the situations that might have arisen. These decisions are generally, of course, covered in the pages of the central report delivered by the political section.

Listening to the debates, after analyzing the measures presented in all of their parts, along with the solutions, the studies and suggestions which came out of the base organizations and the political organizations in response to each situation that arose, we came to the conclusion that the communists worked vigorously throughout the period covered by this report.

Although it cannot be denied, as the conference brought out, that there are still some deficiencies and errors to be corrected, it is likewise no less true that there was, there is, and there will be determination on the part of the militants to eradicate them. This position, this strong determination, were always evident during the meeting.

The resolutions and pledges of the Second Congress, to be held soon, mark the beginning of a new period of work for the party in the DAAFAR units, a period, from which, we are convinced, each of the tasks assigned to the command by the FAR [Revolutionary Armed Forces] Ministry, will emerge greatly strengthened.

In presenting the concluding remarks on this evidence, Div Gen Abelardo Colome Ibarra, first deputy minister of the FAR and member, Party Central Committee, underscored the fact that the Seventh Conference is an important step in strengthening party activities and created conditions for the successful accomplishment of the tasks assigned as well as those coming out of the Second Congress.

Combat readiness and ideological work, he noted, are the two basic directions toward which the party organizations must direct their work in the DAAFAR.

Delegates to the Second Congress Elected at the Seventh Conference of the Party at the DAAFAR

Batista Santana at Eastern Army

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 5 Oct 80 pp 53-55

[Article by Lesmes La Rosa: "Premise for Point of Departure"]

[Text] The Sixth Party Conference of the eastern army has just ended satisfactorily. An unforgettable moment of that important party event came when the delegates, up on their feet, unanimously and solemnly approved a motion to send a message of greeting to the crew members of the spaceship "Soyuz-38," Lt Col Arnaldo Tamayo Mendez and Col Yuriy Romanenko, on the occasion of the portentous feat which they had been performing since the 18th in circumterrestrial space.

The conference head table consisted of Party Central Committee members Div Gen Sixto Batista Santana, chief, Central Political Directorate, FAR, and Jose Ramon Balaguer, first secretary, PCC, in the province of Santiago de Cuba. Others at the head table were Div Gen Julio Casas Regueiro, Central Committee alternate member, Lt Gen Sergey Krivoplyanov, chief of Soviet military specialists, FAR officers and personnel from the Interior Ministry, as well as party and people's government leaders.

After the chair had been approved and after the documentation and mandate committees had been elected, Lt Col Oscar Puig Cespedes, chief, political section, Eastern Army, read the summary of the central report which took up aspects relating to internal life, ideological work, combat readiness, combat and operational training, care, maintenance, and preservation of equipment and weapons, military discipline, living conditions, and other aspects of military life.

From Central Report

If there was anything that characterized this conference from its beginning to its end, it was the reliable exercise of criticism and self-criticism. The guiding document for this activity quite correctly pointed out that "in reviewing our past work, we are aware of our shortcomings...advancing reliably with optimism and confidence toward the future." In this spirit, the meeting felt that "the 3-year period just analyzed was characterized generally by the combined effort of the commanders, organizations, political apparatus, and the UJC [Union of Young Communists] for the purpose of doing political party work in connection with the mobilization of personnel for the accomplishment of resolutions and pledges of the First Congress of the Communist Party of Cuba."

The central report was precise and coherent and went right to the bottom of problems, the source of difficulties, and formulated the conclusions for each case. This is why, after analyzing the events from the party's viewpoint, it was noted that, as far as internal life is concerned, progress had indeed been made; the study of the documents that guide party life was a constant effort whereas criticism and self-criticism were exercised with greater frequency; all of this together adds up to an increase in the party's influence over the accomplishments of tasks and missions.

The conference also analyzed the process of open meetings which made it possible to correct shortcomings, to take stronger steps in the fight for current requirements, as well as to elevate the vanguard role of the communists. In spite of the difficulties encountered, more than 80 percent of the officials attained grades of "outstanding" and "good" in Marxist-Leninist indoctrination. Graphic propaganda was improved; but it was emphasized that it "must be more alive and direct" and that the technique involved must be improved.

Socialist competition provided impetus for the development of combat, operational, and political training and, during the period covered by this analysis, in general, political and party work was more profound.

Although we singled out some conclusions regarding internal life, it suffices to say that these were arrived at only after a very thorough critical and self-critical analysis. This happened in connection with all other aspects reflected in the central report likewise.

The document mentioned not only listed the points of criticism and self-criticism but also the remarks by the delegates. The discussion was preceded by a moving "show" by pioneers, students at the Camilo Cienfuegos School, CDR [Committees for the Defense of the Revolution] members, and representatives of the FAR.

For example, when the part relating to internal life was put up for discussion, the vast majority of speakers pointed out or further developed the critical or self-critical aspects. In other words, nobody was looking for a merely "well-turned phase" or a "little word that would sound better"; instead, they went right to the core of shortcomings and inefficiences.

As everybody knows, this type of party meeting is an important milestone in the generalization of past experiences. This also emerged during the Sixth Conference of Communists in the Eastern Army. A good example of this was the case involving a delegation that presented difficulties in the implementation of party courses. In this connection, another delegation had acquired valuable experience and presented it there for everyone to share.

Representatives from various delegations displayed their interest in the better reception of party publications and in the elevation of the content, quality, and presentation of military press organs. Other remarks related to combat readiness, combat and operational training, military discipline, etc.

A Satisfactory Event

After quickly reviewing the above elements, we can certainly say that the conference turned out to be a satisfactory event. It was held in keeping with the basic methodology. Consequently, everything took place quite normally, with in-depth treatment and dynamism and without any obstacles.

The report from the attached committee was delivered, discussed, and approved, the new committee was elected, along with the preliminary candidates for application to membership in the Central Committee and the delegates for the Second Party Congress. The latter were div gens Sixto Batista Santana and Julio Casas Regueiro; brig gens Nestor Lopez Cuba,

Victor Shueg Colas, Elio Avila Trujillo, Harold Ferrer Martinex and Gustavo Fleitas Ramirez; cols Orelfno Perez Pena, Roberto Viera Estrade and Wilfredo Rosales Aleaga; lt cols Oscar Puig Cespedes, Rafael Victoria Guevara, Enrique Alvarez Valdes, Pedro Camejo Castro, Manuel Carvajal Valverde and Arcel Ricardo Batista; and civilian workers Vidal Cantero Faure and Alberto Socarras R.

Other documents were also approved, such as the message to the CDR members, on the occasion of the coming 20th anniversary of the founding of that mass organization, and the message to the fighting men of the Eastern Army who are currently on internationalist missions.

On the other hand, a moment of memory for the conference sprang from the fact that, last May, in response to the threatening imperialist maneuvers, the Eastern Army was once again ready to carry out its sacred duty of defending the soil of the fatherland to the very last. One document noted that it is and that with each passing day it will be more stimulated by the growing awareness of its men and by the work done during those years by our people in the construction of socialism.

Important Premise

The results of this Sixth Party Congress of the Eastern Army constitute valuable premises for the accomplishment of the work objectives of the new phase which is now beginning. It includes the essential task of in-depth development of the analyses in order to turn them into efficient instruments of the party's political organisms and organizations, together with the strengthening of internal life, in order to guarantee party influence over the accomplishment of the tasks and missions assigned as well as the other aspects of military life.

No less important are the efforts which will be aimed at the study, application, and dissemination of the decisions and resolutions of the coming party congress and all of those issues that are related to the strengthening of the country's defense capacity. It is also the intention to fight tenaciously against subjective problems to see to the strict implementation of all plans, as well as to help the commanders in the creation and maintenance of the material study base.

As far as socialist competition is concerned, the conference approved the consolidation of its organization, development, and supervision, eliminating formalism and lack of objectivity in pledges, seeing to it that the inspections are carried out with the proper quality and by the established deadlines. The basic purpose here is to develop a close link between competition and the daily activities involved in combat and political training.

Other tasks help make up the broad work objectives.

Krivoplyazov's Message

Lt Gen Sergey Krivoplyazov [as published], chief of Soviet military specialists, addressed the conference in order to transmit warm congratulations to the communists of the Eastern Army on the occasion of their Sixth Conference.

He underscored important aspects which link the parties, governments, armed forces, and peoples of Cuba and the USSR. He said that the Soviet and Cuban people are looking forward to two major events, that is, the 26th Congress of the CPSU in February 1981 and the Second Congress of the PCC next December. He emphasized the following in this connection:

"We communists in the group of Soviet military specialists consider these dates highly significant. We will pass our experiences on to the political leaders and workers so that the combat capacity of the units and the FAR in general may be enhanced. We are very happy to see and we appreciate how the combat and mobilization capacity of the Eastern Army keeps growing every day."

Summary

This party activity was summarized by Party Central Committee member and chief, Central Political Directorate, FAR, Div Gen Sixto Batista Santana, who said that he was happy that the end of the conference had come with a multilateral and profound approach to the questions taken up.

He stressed that the central report had to be worded in keeping with the remarks by FAR minister Army Gen Raul Castro, on the occasion of advanced training in the Eastern Army, specifically noting that "it would be a serious mistake to think that everything has been resolved. We recorded considerable advances. Nevertheless, as you pointed out, some deficiencies still exist here and there."

The chief of the FAR Central Political Directorate underscored some tasks which are being carried out in the country with a view to the Second Party Congress and emphasized the role of the party base organizations in the exercises, training sessions, and maneuvers. He recalled that all results must be analyzed profoundly, that whatever was done wrong must be criticized and that the achievers must be stimulated.

In this respect he also made reference to the link between internal life and the party's activities among the masses and he touched on the idea that the collective must always know what party opinion is on all problems that might affect the life of the troops.

Concerning growth, Div Gen Batista Santana told the delegates that they must see to compliance with the provisions of the regulations and directives and involve the masses in the work of building their vanguard.

Other topics touched on in his remarks had to do with ideological work, Marxist-Leninst indoctrination, and the primary missions of the Eastern Army whose communists he congratulated on their magnificent conference.

Batista Santana at Central Army

[Article by Pablo Noa: "Work Review and Projection"]

[Text] A simple ceremony involving the placement of a floral offering at the obelisk, recalling the fighting men of the Old Militia Officer School, who fell at the Bay of Pigs, marked the beginning of the Eighth Party Conference of the Central Army.

The delegates had met in the Heroes of Giron Theater, of the army general staff, and critically and thoroughly analyzed the work done by the party during the period covered by this report.

Lt Col Ibrahim Alfonso Vitorero read the summary of the central report. The report evaluated the results of the assembly process carried out in the organizations prior to the conference and noted the fundamental deficiencies.

Progress was made in internal life and as well as in the exercise of criticism and self-criticism; these, nevertheless, the document points out, are elements which must be given systematic attention.

Regarding the growth aspect, the increase in the number of civilian employees who became militants--mostly workers--was noted as a positive point. Work on the political training of sergeants and enlisted men was also considered satisfactory, as was Marxist-Leninist indoctrination of officers. Still, emphasis was placed on the need for improving such aspects as attendance and methodological training.

In taking up the subject of instruction, the report listed the achievements regarding training, exercises, maneuvers, and testing. All of these reflected the work of the base organizations which helped elevate the quality levels in the process of execution.

The support given by the party committees and the people's government assemblies in the provinces was decisive in improving the reserve training activities during this period of time.

Regarding competition, the central report mentioned the positive aspects and the shortcomings in the development of competition and concluded that this must be taken care of in a systematic fashion.

In another part of the analysis, emphasis was given to the importance of continuing to strengthen the work of commanders, organisms, and organizations through military and labor discipline.

The report finally mentions the main successes of the army, stressing the valuable participation of the Soviet specialists as further proof of the solid brotherhood existing between the peoples of Cuba and the USSR.

A vibrant salute to the participants at the conference came when the Band broke into the strains of revolutionary marches and songs, together with pioneers, students from the Camilo Cienfuegos School, enlisted men, officers, and civilian employees.

The work objectives for the next period of time were then submitted to the delegates for analysis and approval.

In a brief review, the document suggests "that the work of the commanders, political organisms, and party organizations contributed to the strengthening of political-ideological and military education of personnel; to the increase in mobilization capacity and combat readiness of the troops, as well as the accomplishment of the sacred mission of defending the socialist fatherland and internationalist duty."

The election of the delegates to the Second Congress of the PCC was another interesting step on the conference agenda. The following were elected: Lt Col Ibrahim Alfonso Vitorero; civilian employee Dignora Borroto; majs Felix Gonzalez, Jose Ordonez, Amparo Pascual; Div Gen Raul Mendez Tomassevich; Lt Col Candelario Hernandez; Brig Gen Orlando Lorenzo; Col Sergio Perez; Lt Col Ruben Rodriguez; and Col Armando Saucedo. The army's representation was completed with the delegates elected directly in the military units and enterprises who deserved this election because of their outstanding work. This honor was awarded to Lt Col Efrain Dominguez, majs Julian Hernandez and Heriberto G. Herrera; and civilian employees Miguel A. Perez, Alberto Pereira, Pablo Romero and Alberto Perez.

Another point taken care of by the delegates was the election of the new members of the party committee attached to the political section; it was made up of nine regular members and four alternate members and Lt Col Fernando Udaeta Nogueiras was approved as secretary while Capt Jorge Garcia del Busto was made recording secretary.

After the presentation of the report from the mandate committee, the preliminary candidates for membership on the Party Central Committee were elected.

Joining the chair elected by the delegates were Central Committee members div gens Sixto Batista Santana, chief, Central Political Directorate, FAR; Raul Menendez Tomassevich, CG, Central Army; and Julian Rizo Alvarez, first secretary, party provincial committee, Matanzas; also at the head table were Raul Rodriguez, first secretary of the PCC in Villa Clara; Faustino Beato Morejon, president of the Provincial Assembly of People's Government in Matanzas; other commanders and leaders of the party and the government.

Div Gen Sixto Batista delivered the concluding remarks for this important party event.

He began by talking about the significance of the conference since it is a part of the organizational process aimed at the Second Congress; he praised the critical and self-critical spirit which prevailed not only during the debates but throughout the entire assembly process which is a fundamental factor--as he said--in eliminating insufficiencies and deficiencies. To that he added the good preparation of the delegates which influenced the achievement of the anticipated results.

Later he presented some considerations on the central report which was debated and approved.

"The Second Congress," he pointed out, "will impose new tasks which is why the political cadres must become systematic propagandists of those tasks."

In another part of his address, the chief, Central Political Directorate, FAR, urged everyone to pay more attention to the base organizations and to perfect work methods and procedures; he stressed the support that must be given to these organizations in order to solve the problems that come up on their echelon, noting the correct implementation of Leninist party leadership methods.

He alerted his audience to the increase in the war hysteria among ruling circles in the United States and noted what the role of the party must be; he said that the party "has a great responsibility in elevating vigilance."

He urged everyone to work every day to maintain and exceed the figures achieved in combat training and combat readiness, paying much attention to direct activities with the troops.

In conclusion he expressed his confidence in the work done by the communists in the army to guarantee the elimination of deficiencies analyzed. He also recalled the significant tasks which are approaching, including the accomplishment of the army's pledge in honor of the Second Congress and the celebration, next year, of such significant events as the 20th anniversary of the proclamation of the socialist character of the revolution, the 20th anniversary of victory in the Bay of Pigs, and the 20th anniversary of the creation of the Central Army. He told his audience that these events will feature the self-denial, enthusiasm, and responsibility of party militants in the central region.

Colome Ibarra at Western Army

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 12 Oct 80 pp 50-51

[Article by Jose Cazanas Reyes: "Toward New and Greater Victories"]

[Text] Aware that the activity review report is not an end in itself but a means for advancing to higher levels, the communists of the Western Army held their Fourth Party Conference last Friday, 26 September.

This day of work, held with a profound critical and self-critical spirit, was presided over by Div Gen Abelardo Colome Ibarra, first deputy minister of the FAR, member, Party Central Committee; Brig Gen Ulises Rosales del Toro, CG, Western Army, and member, Party Central Committee; and Col Manuel Penado Casanova, first deputy chief, Central Political Directorate, FAR, among others.

"Just 2 years and 11 months have passed since the last conference and in evaluating our activities today we must do so in a manner corresponding to the effort made by the communists side by side with the commanders, officers, sergeants, enlisted men, students at the Camilo Cienfuegos schools, and civilian employees of the major and minor units in accomplishing the multiple and complex tasks assigned," he said at the start of the summary of the central report which was read by Brig Gen Ulises Rosales del Toro.

In close consonance with the guidelines and teachings of the party and the commander-in-chief, to the effect that we must be demanding toward ourselves, the delegates to the Fourth Conference thus analyzed each aspect with a high critical and self-critical spirit, with profound debates, and with high demands, which constitute essential premises for arriving at better conclusions and spelling out future tasks aimed at strengthening the army's fighting capacity. This is why they placed more emphasis on shortcomings than achievements.

During the period which has just ended, the political organs and the party organizations aimed their activities at the accomplishment of the theses and resolutions of the First Party Congress and for the sake of that they planned the tasks connected with daily life, holding their meetings, analyzing work progress and spelling out measures in support of the primary missions of the units.

"There is no doubt," the central report points out by way of summary, "that progress has been made in directions, such as these: meetings, the party's leadership of the UJC, the practice of delivering activity reports, the conduct of more periodic analyses within the nucleus, a larger number of comrades joining the party, and the accomplishment of the change in party documentation which permitted the issue of the new membership card to the militants; but we know that there are some important things where results were not what they should have been."

According to the summary in the central report, the work methods and procedures of the political organisms and of the party's steering committees still do not guarantee systematic aid and support for the organizations and militants; there are many examples of shortcomings and violations of directives, including questions contained in the theses and resolutions of the congress.

In ideological work, Marxist-Leninist and political indoctrination constitute the two essential elements in personnel education. In this connection, the programs were accomplished satisfactorily and it is significant to note that, during this period of time, 521 comrades graduated from the basic and middle-level courses in party indoctrination and that 624 comrades finished their applicant courses.

In line with the standing and significance which the First Party Congress assigned to the effort to raise combat readiness, the communists made a tremendous effort in that direction, generally achieving satisfactory results during the tests conducted in this respect; progress was noted in the simple mechanization of equipment and resources which make it possible to reduce the time required for the accomplishment of missions; work was also done on drafting operational and combat documentation. When missions were assigned to them to protect certain facilities and to be ready to respond to possible aggression, those missions were accomplished satisfactorily; the same is true of missions assigned to some units in the accomplishment of internationalist duties.

By virtue of the nature and essence of the broad and hard work done by the Western Army, the commanders, political workers, and party and UJC organizations found themselves at the very center of each task or mission assigned. This is why there was no single aspect of the manifold activities of the army which the delegates did not analyze rigorously and profoundly.

There was much debating and in the end it was noted that the results obtained by the party during this period of almost three years were satisfactory which is why this effort deserved recognition from the minister of the FAR in a message transmitted to the delegates present by Div Gen Abelardo Colome Ibarra in his concluding remarks.

As part of this important party activity, and in accordance with the agenda, following a vote on the prior points resulting in unanimity, the new committee attached to the Western Army was elected; Lt Col Miguel Galan Fortun was elected secretary and [female] Capt Mirta Garcia was elected recording secretary.

There was also a vote on the candidates for the position of delegate to the Second Party Congress and the nominees were approved unanimously. The appointment of preliminary candidates for membership on the Central Committee was also approved by direct and secret vote.

During this Fourth Conference, a message was read, expressing appreciation of the successful combined Soviet-Cuban [space] flight, and the work done by the country's first cosmonaut was hailed effusively. Congratulatory messages were also read regarding the work done by the Soviet specialists assigned to the army and special appreciation was expressed to the fighting men of the Western Army who are carrying out internationalist missions.

In delivering the concluding remarks at this Fourth Conference of the Western Army, Div Gen Abelardo Colome Ibarra among other things pointed out that the communists in this army are in a magnificent position to overcome the deficiences that were pointed out and march toward new and greater victories.

Western Army Delegation to Second Party Congress

Santamaria Cuadrado at Navy

Havan VERDE OLIVO 12 Oct 80 pp 52-53

[Article by Ruben Fonseca: "Turning Criticism and Self-Criticism into a Daily Weapon"]

[Text] As part of the preparatory activities aimed at the Second Congress of the Communist Party of Cuba, the Revolutionary Navy held its Seventh Party Congress, concluding the assembly process of the party organizations and organisms on that level.

One of the issues to which the delegates paid most attention during the conference was mobilization and combat readiness. Looking at this important factor, the party's work--as was evidenced during this event--was aimed at achieving greater successes in the accomplishment of activities relating to the mobilization and complete combat readiness of major and minor units. The achievements enable us to look forward to greater efficiency.

Another one of the points analyzed was political and ideological indoctrination. On that score, emphasis was placed in the report on achievements, although stress was also placed on some difficulties which it will not be difficult to overcome during the next period in the party's work.

Care, maintenance, and conservation of equipment were other subjects of remarks from delegates who stressed the need for raising the individual sense of responsibility of each communist in complying with security standards and in working with equipment, which is why it is fundamental for the party to devote more attention to that if we keep in mind that the correct utilization of these resources constitutes a decisive factor toward the achievement of high combat readiness.

In an effort to carry out the pledges and resolutions of the First Congress relating to production and services, the conference emphasized the work of the political organisms and the party organizations. This effort was aimed at executing the technical-economic plans at the repair bases and directing the effort of the communists at improving the quality of production, economic efficiency, increasing work productivity, savings, and utilizing the working day properly.

During the reading of the central report summary, VAdm Aldo Santamaria Cuadrado, deputy minister of the FAR, commander-in-chief of the MGR [Revolutionary Navy], and member of the Central Committee, Communist Party of Cuba, said that "there has been a rise in the critical and self-critical spirit among the base organizations and various factors influenced that. Since this is a vital aspect of our communist training, it is indispensable for the political organisms and the base organizations to make sure that criticism and self-criticism will be turned into a daily weapon to achieve the greater strengthening of the party."

The conference, which was held at Military Unit No 2746, analyzed the work done by the party commission attached to the political section; it elected the regular and alternate members of that body as well as the delegates to the Second Party Congress.

The work objectives for the next period of time were also approved by the delegates after discussion.

The conference was attended by navy officers and civilian employees who had done hard work for the party throughout this entire period of time.

This has been an important event in her life as a militant for [female] Frig Lt Caridad Guzman Debano since she was able to note, upon the culmination of the conference, a great advance in the accomplishment of party tasks on the various fronts, as well as progress in relation to the prior period of time.

Maria Elena Reyes Laurencio, a civilian worker at Military Unit 5924, was impressed by the organization, by the way in which the communists presented their reports on the various aspects under discussion, and by the progress she was able to see. "The successes in the party's work during this phase," she said, "will help us to continue to perfect our work and to achieve new successes."

LCdr Diego Garcia Morales expressed the opinion that the party helped wipe out deficiencies and, in accordance with the lessons learned, the party is getting ever closer to the structure of the navy.

"We are working to achieve a higher skill level among party cadres and we hope that we will achieve a higher cultural and technical level in order efficiently to accomplish the task assigned to the Revolutionary Navy," he said.

Div Gen Abelardo Colome Ibarra, first deputy minister of the FAR, member, Central Committee of the Party, in presenting the concluding remarks, said that the conference marked the high point of the assembly process initiated several months ago from the base on up and that this is a special occasion because of its significance as a part of the process of preparation for the Second Congress of the Communist Party of Cuba.

He said that the MGR over the past 2 years has made a sustained effort which emerges in the form of the positive results during the inspections conducted by the high command.

He also talked about the importance of perfecting work methods and procedures; the assistance which the higher organizations must give to the lower ones, without taking their place, and he emphasized that "all of our work must constantly be subjected to the most profound critical and self-critical analysis."

He emphasized that the central report in a critical form took up the aspects which are within the sphere of action of the party and he stressed the depth with which the delegates discussed and analyzed the aspects taken up.

After talking about the most important tasks to be accomplished by the MGR during the near future and the role which the party is called upon to play, he noted that military, technical, political-ideological, and psychological training of personnel must always be in line with current realities.

IDEOLOGICAL TRAINING CENTERS, HAVANA EXPERIENCE NOTED

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 6 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Enrique Sanz Fals: "Political-Ideological Training Centers, Experiences in Havana"]

> [Text] "For us it is vital, it is fundamental, it is essential to study Marxism and teach Marxism. For the revolution, it is vital and essential to study Marxism and teach Marxism." Fidel

The Marxist-Leninist training of its cadres and members is the permanent objective of our communist party in accord with its leading social role. The systematic study of the principles of the ideology of the working class is a prerequisite for successfully confronting the complex tasks of the construction of socialism in our country, successfully developing the ideological battle and successfully combating our enemies and detractors.

The First Party Congress gave this task importance and analyzed and approved the thesis and resolution "on the studies of Marxism-Leninism in our country." These outlined the features and objectives for this in the coming years.

The resolution indicated: "To give this vanguard solid Marxist-Leninist training must be one of the basic objectives of the training policy of cadres and members of the PCC [Communist Party of Cuba]."

The First Party Congress thesis "on the internal life of the party" referred to ways of political-ideological training of party members and stated: "The work to be developed in the coming years will be aimed at the theoretical and political-ideological training of party members and aspirants through external courses in the CSPI [Political-Ideological Training Centers]. There will be one or more in each town. A percentage of members and aspirants which will be determined by the material possibilities and teaching resources at that time will take those courses."

It added: "These centers will constitute the fundamental theoretical and political-ideological training of party members and aspirants and outstanding workers."

The CSPI in Havana

In fulfillment of this mandate from the First Party Congress, the party in Havana has done positive and effective work which has led to 28 CSPI in the province. In the last 5 years, 29,591 comrades—20,788 party members and aspirants—have enrolled in them. The rest were members of the UJC [Union of Young Communists], outstanding workers, delegates of the people's government and cadres from the mass organizations.

According to projections for the next 5-year period, the number of centers will increase to 39 and, by 1985, all the members and aspirants in the province as of December 1980 will have taken some of the three types of courses taught in the CSPI: basic, intermediate and advanced.

In its first school year (1975-76), the Havana CSPI graduated 2,140 students. Already by the last school year, this figure had increased to 11,401; that is, it almost quintupled. According to projections, a total of 115,566 comrades including 80,978 party members will take the different courses from now until 1985.

One experiment that has had very good results was opening extension classes in certain work centers with very specific characteristics which meet certain conditions. In this way, the workers go to political-ideological classes after their work is finished. There are now 32 extension classes where the basic and intermediate levels are taught by teachers from the labor center itself who have been trained for this purpose. Advanced classes will begin in the future.

For example, these extension classes are given on ships in our fleets. The experiment started on one ship in 1977 and last year spread to a group of ships. Conditions are being created to open more classes in other ships of the Mambisa Fleet, Cuban Fishing Fleet, Tuna Fleet and the Caribbean Fleet in October. The 5-year plan is for all ships with appropriate conditions to have regular basic and intermediate-level courses.

The CSPI are directed by the party on the municipal level based on the agreements of the First Party Congress and the guidelines and agreements of the superior party organs.

Each center has an executive council that consists of a director, an assistant education director, a coordinator for each course and classroom delegates. Except for the director who is a professional, all the others—including the teachers—are activists. In each classroom there is a delegate, a person responsible for emulation and one responsible for internal order; they are elected by the students.

The students are selected by the party cells from among their members and aspirants, members of the UJC, union leaders and outstanding workers; they must have the approval of the party municipal executive bureau. The selection of students is made based on the following proportions in total enrollment at the center: party members, 60 percent; party aspirants, 10 percent; UJC members, 10 percent; union leaders and outstanding workers, 10 percent; and cadres from mass organizations and delegates of the people's government, 10 percent.

Each party cell receives a monthly report on absences, if any, and student evaluations. At the end of the year, it receives a complete report which is included in the party file of the member or aspirant.

Emulation in the CSPI

Emulation plays an important role in the encouragement and development of the tasks and activities of the CSPI and, at the same time, is an element of effective support for the education and development of the students.

Diogenes Hernandez, department chief of the party provincial committee, stated: "To a great degree, the success of these centers in Havana depends on the stability and systematization of socialist emulation. There are good examples of strictness, interest, enthusiasm and party discipline in the development of emulation as a way to encourage the fulfillment of basic tasks and objectives."

He stated: "It is necessary to add that this has been achieved due to coordinated work and the support that the party cells, the municipal bureaus and the executive councils of each center have offered plus the enthusiasm of each student who gives his best effort so that his center will meet the established indices."

The party leader indicated that the Havana centers, supported by emulation, have maintained an attendance rate of 90 percent or more since their beginning in October 1975. The general promotion rate has always been over 99 percent in all courses with grades of 87 percent.

Comrade Carmen Fernandez, an official of the Internal Education Department of the party provincial committee which supervises the CSPI, told us: "There is much enthusiasm in the centers; they strive to be named vanguard or exemplary. Emulation has helped a lot in these 5 years; it has been an important factor."

She added: "The centers have fulfilled their role and have been a necessity. They make it possible for the majority of the members and aspirants to advance ideologically. Their awareness is expanded and developed. The work of the teacher who is the anonymous hero of the daily effort cannot be forgotten. We can state that the centers have fulfilled their objectives. A great number of party members have been trained in theory. The work has been a success, a great experiment."

Referring to political-ideological training, Commander in Chief Fidel Castro indicated in his report to the First Party Congress: "In the coming years, we must work to convert the party schools, the schools of the UJC and the mass organizations as well as the CSPI into model institutions of Marxist-Leninist education."

The executive councils of the CSPI and the party officials in the towns and in the province who supervise this activity are involved precisely in this task: /to convert the CSPI "into model institutions of Marxist-Leninist education"/ [in boldface].

SUCCESSES, FAILURES OF 1976-1980 SUGAR PRODUCTION REVIEWED

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 26 Sep 80 pp 16-23

[Article by Andres Rodriguez: "Sugar, Review of a 5-Year Period"]

[Text] Subject

Despite difficulties in its final year, the 1976-80 5-year period more than exceeded its predecessor in sugar production, and not only that period but the other 5-year periods of socialism and the last two of capitalism, which were those in which there was the greatest volume of production in that failed system.

This is one of the subjects discussed in this article. As is indicated by its title, it consists of making a review of a number of items throughout the 76-80 period in the agroindustry which predominates in the Cuban economy and, therefore, is the mainspring of its development and the improvement of the standard of living of the people.

This means that in addition to sugar production with its sequelas of indicators: recovery, lost industrial time, cane ground and petroleum consumption, other important aspects will be touched upon, which are detailed in the summary of this article.

And all this has a common denominator. What was done and how was it done by comparison with the preceding 5-year period?

Production

During the first four sugar harvests of the period (1976-1979), sugar production volumes experienced a vigorous, sustained progress without regression, which, unfortunately, could not be continued in the closing season, that of 1980.

Among the causes, which despite vigorous efforts made caused that interruption, are the following:

The violent outbreak of the rust disease, which caused serious damage to one of the main commercial varieties grown in the country: the Barbados 4362.

Certainly the foregoing provoked an obvious reduction in the availability of cane in the country due to the amount of Barbados 4362 planted in our sugarcane areas, particularly in some provinces. On 31 December 1971, despite the demolitions practiced to eliminate the effects of the disease, the aforementioned variety occupied the following percentages in these provinces:

Sancti Spiritus	50 percent
Granma	41 percent
Villa Clara	37 percent
Cienfuegos	34 percent

On the other hand, however, it must be pointed out that until the destructive appearance of rust, the Barbados 4362 variety was highly regarded by many growers and sugar industry personnel because of its good points such as the richness of its juice, ease of handling in the mills and during harvesting.

Finally, as is known, the country is embarked upon the elimination of the results of the rust through the demolition of the diseased variety and its replacement by others which resist rust, among them a group from Cuba, the Jaronu and Mayari, which are now being introduced, depending on the agricultural technology established, at the same time that their results are checked in production.

The infestation by weeds of a considerable part of the national sugarcane area, resulting, among other reasons, from the pressure caused by the prolonging of the harvest season in 1979. On 31 July of this year, 50,000 caballerias of sugarcane were infested with weeds.

It is worth emphasizing, as a necessary complement, that the problem of weeds has been vigorously confronted in timely fashion this year. Our press has systematically covered that successful effort, which is so decisive for increasing the amount of cane in the 1981 harvest. As is known, noxious weeds are the worst scourge which attacks the sugarcane fields.

Imperfections in the estimates of sugarcane, with their negative effects on the availability of cane. In this respect, according to reports, there were enterprises which confronted considerable decreases in estimates, sugarmills such as the El Salvador (Guantanamo), Julio Antonio Mella (Santiago de Cuba), Antonio Maceo (Holguin) and Ranulfo Leyva (Granma).

A very generalized decline in an important indicator, industrial yield, caused by a number of agroindustrial factors, which still require more precise solutions and on which work is continuing. It is worth mentioning that the decline even affected a province with a traditionally high industrial yield: Cienfuegos. As proof of this let us look at the trend of the aforementioned indicator during the 1979 and 1980 harvests.

Cienfuegos	Yield
1979	12.38
1980	11.64

Industrial difficulties caused by problems in repairs as a result, primarily, of the late arrival of material supplies to a large number of sugarmills. As a counteraction to these negative causes, however, not only the great effort made by the workers of the sugar agroindustry must be indicated but also such obviously significant positive results as the quality of sugar produced, a noticeable reduction in the use of additional fuel (petroleum and wood) and the better quality of the raw material (sugarcane) provided for the industry.

It is worthwhile indicating in this context, the campaign undertaken against the use of petroleum, which allowed its use to be reduced in almost all provinces, a substantial reduction, as can be noted as an example in some provinces as compared with the 1979 harvest.

	Fewer gallons used
Holguin	6,000,000
Ciego de Avila	6,000,000
Havana	4,500,000

The outstanding feature of such a campaign, the result of its correct understanding from the beginning, has been the province of Cienfuegos, which has been drastically reducing the use of additional fuels (petroleum and wood) throughout the 5-year period. Let us look at it in detail.

Harvest	Rate of Use
1976	1.03
1977	1.21
1978	.67
1979	.27
1980	.13

However, while the sustained and vigorous increase in production during the first 4 years could not be repeated in 1980, the latter fact does not eclipse an objective conclusion explained at the beginning of this article. Sugar production during the 1976-80 period more than exceeded that of 1971-1975. While the former obtained an average per harvest of some 7 million metric tons, the other obtained 5.5 million.

And there is more. In the first 4 years of the 1976-80 5-year period alone, more sugar was produced than during the entire 1971-1975 period. Let us take a specific look at this.

	Millions of tons of sugar
1971-1975	27.7
1976-1979 (4 years)	27.9

Another element to be considered is that unlike the 1971-1975 5-year period, the subsequent 5-year period of 1976-1980 was characterized until its last year by a headlong growth without regression. Here is the proof.

Harvest	Millions of tons of sugar
1976	6.1
1977	6.4
1978	7.3
1979	7.9

It is too bad that this could not be continued in 1980.

Finally, there is a factor already indicated. Production during the 1976-80 period was also higher than that obtained in the other 3 5-year periods of socialism as well as that of the last two 5-year periods of capitalism, the best of that vanished system, if we go by the meticulous statistics maintained by the genius Moreno Fraginals.

Let us view the above statement in the light of statistics. Let us look specifically at the production average of the harvest of each period.

Capitalist 5-year periods	Average tons of sugar in millions of tons
1949-53	5.8
1954-58	5.1
Socialist five-year periods
1961-65	5.2
1966-70	5.7
1971-75	5.5
1976-80	7.0*

*Approximately

Cane Ground

As in sugar production, the volume of cane ground showed a growing and sustained increase during 1976-79. Viewed overall, that increase was shown in the following manner:

Harvest	Arrobas of sugarcane
1976	4,521,600,000
1977	4,882,400,000
1978	5,829,800,000
1979	6,352,100,000

At the same time, it is valid to add that such continuous growth during the first 4 years of the 5-year period we are discussing was also shown in the majority of the Cuban provinces with one or another exception. The reader can see this in the chart contained in this article under "Cane Ground."

Cane Ground (1976-79)

What was the standing of the provinces in this indicator during the first four harvests of the 5-year period?

(In millions of arrobas)

	1976	1977	1978	1979
Pinar del Rio	110.4	99.9	108.4	102.1
Havana	512.2	548.4	599.7	576.2
Matanzas	590.2	669.7	718.5	804.1
Villa Clara	568.1	601.5	725.3	758.6
Cienfuegos	250.3	284.8	370.7	379.3
Sancti Spiritus	293.5	307.6	334.4	337.1
Ciego de Avila	551.6	524.3	596.8	722.3
Camaguey	424.7	468.9	610.9	696.3
Las Tunas	348.8	427.3	551.5	564.7
Holguin	388.2	397.4	538.0	645.9
Granma	249.7	290.0	341.2	350.9
Santiago de Cuba	188.9	196.4	232.4	282.4
Guantanamo	44.4	65.6	101.4	131.7

Commentaries

As can be seen, the continuous increase in cane ground in almost all the provinces of the country is evident. This fact, symptom of a growing availability of cane, should not hide another fact, although more has been ground it has been without the due application of planned potential grinding norms. The outstanding aspect about this, and perhaps the exception, is Matanzas, the best grinding province in the country up to now. In short, although most of the provinces continuously increased the volume of cane ground, most of them are still far from a high and stable rate of grinding as is required by an optimum harvest.

Since the chart contains the facts, we shall not interrupt our march and shall go on to the next indicator.

Recovery

It is worth emphasizing, or rather repeating, that from the technological point of view, recovery is the most important indicator of industrial efficiency. It is simply a formula whereby a calculation of the percentage of the sugar brought by the cane from the field and recovered in the sugarmill is made (polarization).

As has also been said, recovery experienced a serious decline as of 1969 and reached its lowest point in the 1972 harvest when the skimpiest percentage of the previous 30 years up to that time (79.4 percent) was obtained. Subsequently, that indicator began to recover and by 1975 it left that critical situation far behind, when a national percentage of 84.28 was attained, an increase of almost 5 full percentage points in three harvests.

The 1976-80 5-year period, it is fair to say, at no time showed the declines of the previous period nor much less the unfortunate percentages we have just seen. Even in the first 4 years it never went lower than 84 percent, although it did show a decline in the 1980 season. This included Cienfuegos, the most outstanding of the Cuban provinces in the matter of recovery and was frankly surprising given the tremendous world record set by the people of Cienfuegos in that respect, precisely during the 1976-80 period. Let us take a look.

Cienfuegos Harvest	Recovery
1976	86.62
1977	88.32
1978	89.00
1979	89.16
1980	87.37

The influence of the lack of quality of repairs in the problems experienced by the industry in the 1980 harvest has already been mentioned. To that must now be added, while we are on the subject of industrial efficiency, the influence to a significant degree, of operational difficulties.

There remains no alternative for the future but to win back the ground lost and advance much more, and this not just as a mere slogan, because actually the experience of the Cuban sugar industry itself shows that much has to be done yet with respect to recovery. Despite the sustained progress during the course of the first 4 years of the 76-80 5-year period, it must be remembered that in 1966, under socialism, a percentage of 86.04 was obtained in that indicator.

Lost Time

Something similar to what happened in recovery happened in lost industrial time. We must first explain, however, that in that concept we are considering its two principal manifestations: breakdowns and operational interruptions.

Both manifestations opened the 1971-75 5-year period with an extremely high percentage overall (19.25 percent). Later it began to decline positively, although it was as of 1976 that such a decline became particularly significant. Actually, the contrast between those two 5-year periods is obvious. Let us see.

Breakdowns-Operational Interruptions

1971-75 5-year period	Percentage
1971	19.25
1972	15.54
1973	13.02
1974	10.21
1975	9.67

1976-80 5-year period	Percentage
1976	7.43
1977	6.43
1978	6.05
1979	6.24

However, just as in recovery, the positive declining level recorded in the previous 4 years was not maintained.

It is not idle to reiterate the marked effect the poor quality of repairs had in this; the result, mainly, of the tardy arrival of materials to a good number of mills. To this negative phenomenon was added the fact that in some cases some of those resources were not of the required quality either. There were even cases of unfortunate negligence such as that of the mechanical plant of Santa Clara, which sent two left jacks [virgenes] to the Perucho Figueredo sugarmill and two right jacks to the Primero de Mayo, with the subsequent troubles of having to adapt them.

Finally, although not decisive, another difficulty among the problems previously expounded, must be included. We refer specifically to the prolonging of the 1979 harvest, with the implications it had with respect to time available for the accomplishment of repairs and investments. Actually, that harvest was the most prolonged of the 76-80 5-year period, recording an average of 182 days of operations.

Petroleum Consumption

Although there has already been reference to this subject, its importance obliges us to speak of it again. If we go by objective reality, the first 3 years of the 76-80 period do not show proper behavior in that respect, although in the last two, primarily in 1980, as was indicated, that situation improved considerably.

In our opinion, a magnificent contribution by the 76-80 5-year period with respect to additional fuel in the sugar industry resides in the fact that the essential and real causes leading to that consumption were identified and eliminated.

In a pamphlet published in February 1979 with the title "General Considerations On Fuel Consumption in the Sugar Industry," the ministry of that industry said the following: "The factors which take part in the problem of additional fuel consumption in the sugar industry can be divided into objective and subjective; although on a national level we are convinced that in more than 90 percent of the cases this is due to factors of a subjective nature."

Prominent among these subjective factors were insufficient administrative requirements, weak coordination among the various departments of the mill and operational shortcomings. All of these, we repeat, were eliminated as a result of a systematic campaign waged by the party, a campaign which has been maintained without a lowering of the guard.

Obviously, that campaign will be maintained from now on until a final solution to the problem of fuel is found. There is no other alternative to the problem for three cardinal reasons:

1. The effect of allocating to other branches of the economy, which need it, the excess of petroleum still being consumed by an industry such as the sugar industry, which produces its own fuel: bagasse.

2. The deficit in petroleum being faced today, together with its very high prices on the world market, which thanks to the solidarity shown invariably by the Soviet Union, are not being paid by our country.

3. On the final solution of the petroleum problem depends the industrialization of an important byproduct of sugarcane: bagasse.

Afcer 50 Years

After half a century of silence, the country is beginning to build, as of 1977, four modern sugarmill complexes. The important thing is that it did it with its own efforts.

For some time, particularly since the 19th Century, the Cuban had shown his skill and experience in producing sugar, but he had not proved his ability to plan and build sugar factories by himself. Now he has proved it.

Two of those mills, the 30 de Noviembre in Pinar del Rio and Batalla de las Guasimas in Camaguey, have just been inaugurated. The remaining two, located in the provinces of Granma and Cienfuegos, are having their construction process speeded up.

Forty-two percent of the equipment of those four new enterprises was produced nationally, while 58 percent came from abroad.

The structures of the buildings, the tanks, the quadruple vats, heaters, clarifiers, crystallizers, pumps of various types and other equipment and tools are made in Cuba.

From abroad come the boilers, turbogenerators, centrifuges, cane juice filters, and other implements. Moreover, 72 percent of this equipment comes from the socialist community, particularly the Soviet Union, the GDR and Poland.

This means that only 28 percent comes from countries of the capitalist area, which represents an expenditure by the country of $7 million. That is what the building of each sugarmill costs in foreign credits. The total cost of each mill is 43 million pesos.

These are four modern mills equipped with a majestic tipple on which one of our smaller mills could almost fit, a completely electrified grinding plant with a grinding capacity of 7,000 metric tons of cane (600,000 arrobas) every 24 hours, a mechanized bagasse storage building, continuous centrifuges and an automated system for weighing cane, juice, bagasse, molasses and sugar.

In addition to producing sugar, the Cuban is also engaged in building the means of production which make sugar. He has engaged in the creation of the material base for the engineering of complete factories and of a plan of national scope for confronting the growing demands of the Cuban sugar industry itself. And he has accomplished it.

Bulk Sugar

During the 76-80 5-year period, the system of bulk-sugar shipping received a considerable boost. Four bulk-sugar shipping terminals were inaugurated and placed in operation during that time in the provinces of Havana, Guantanamo, Granma and Las Tunas, with a loading capability of 700 tons per hour.

Thus, the effort begun by the revolution in the decade of the 60's continues unchangingly. It began when it completed and placed in operation two bulk-sugar shipping terminals inherited from capitalism, and built one more in Cienfuegos, the latter with a tremendous loading capacity of 1,200 tons per hour.

As is known, such an investment effort not only has the purpose of mechanizing the loading of sugar, which allows the loading of a 5,000-ton ship in 10 hours, for example, as compared to the 5 days it used to take with the traditional system of loading sugar in sacks. It has other implications, among them the humanization of work, increase in productivity and the advantage of a quick sailing with the subsequent saving in foreign credits.

Increasing Importance of Byproducts

The industrialization of sugarcane byproducts calls for attention and requires it more and more because of its significance in the integral use of the large number of byproducts of the sugar agroindustry. The progressive crystallization of such use is of greater significance when there is the certainty that by means of it a contribution is made to the satisfaction of material and spiritual needs of society on the basis of a renewable and inexhaustible raw material such as sugarcane in a world where there is the danger of exhaustion of certain important raw materials.

This means that such integral use has the particular advantage that it can be done on the basis of a raw material which is not only/renewable and inexhaustible/ [in boldface] (the emphasis is ours) but is broadly distributed throughout the length and width of national territory.

In honor to the truth, 1976-80 could be described properly as the 5-year period in which the industrialization of sugarcane byproducts began. This statement is supported by the following facts:

Construction of nine modern torula yeast plants with an overall production capability of 90,000 tons of yeast. These plants, in the important area of animal feed so that there can be proper human nourishment, are distributed in the following provinces:

Matanzas	1
Villa Clara	1
Cienfuegos	1
Sancti Spiritus	1
Ciego de Avila	2
Las Tunas	1
Granma	1
Holguin	1

A 10th plant is also under construction in Santiago de Cuba Province.

Following the same line of the use of byproducts for animal feed, in these 5 years a large number of molasses-urea-bagasse and predigested bagasse plants have been built, among them the large plant of 200 tons daily of predigested bagasse built in the area near the Camilo Cienfuegos sugarmill complex of Havana Province.

Also, although in the line of bagasse industrialization, two modern bagasse panel plants have been built, each producing 120 tons daily, in the provinces of Havana and Ciego de Avila, while a third of 240 tons per day is under construction in the province of Las Tunas. It is worthwhile to emphasize that bagasse panels are an important industry because of what they contribute to the solution of the problems of household furniture.

Sugarcane Harvest

In the 1971-75 5-year period, as well as in the following of 1976-80, mechanization of the sugarcane harvest continued its upward climb without regression, which is what is important. Let us now look at that climb in the language of numbers.

1971-75 5-year period	Percentage
1971	2
1972	7
1973	11
1974	18
1975	25

1976-80 5-year Period	Percentage
1976	32
1977	36
1978	39
1979	42
1980	50

At first sight, certainly, the obvious and significant fact is noted that mechanization of the sugarcane harvest has grown in one decade from 2 to 50 percent. As will be remembered, because of a necessary period of apprenticeship and acquisition of experience, that mechanization could not exceed 3 percent in the 1966-1970 5-year period.

On the other hand, mechanization did not pass through the same system of harvesting in both periods. The needs of sugarcane production itself caused us to go from burned cane in 1971-75 to green cane as the predominant method in the next 5-year period. And this, it could be said, meant a change in harvest technology.

It meant a change in concepts, it could also be added, under conditions of an increase in agricultural yields. The predominant change to harvesting green cane meant a greater pressure for combines because of having to face a greater vegetable mass. This objective reality taught the correctness of adapting the combines to the conditions of the agricultural yield of the fields. Obviously, it is not the same thing to introduce a combine into a field of green cane yielding 80,000 arrobas per caballeria as it is into one yielding 150,000.

The work done in the country on two elements of extreme importance for the success of the mechanized harvest was significant during the course of both 5-year periods: the suitable conditioning of the sugarcane areas and the proper training and qualification of all personnel, particularly operators and mechanics.

Despite that effort, however, it can be stated that there has not been the proper ratio between demand (combines) and supply (prepared areas and skilled personnel). Also, as a result of the foregoing, in some places the normal process of harvest mechanization has been interrupted.

However, in a general sense, as has already been noted, mechanized harvesting has maintained its advance uninterruptedly. The most important thing is that it has been playing its role with respect to a substantial saving in manpower in canecutting. It must be remembered that in 1970 the country was forced to marshal a gigantic force of approximately 350,000 machateros. At that time only 2 percent of the total harvest was done by combines.

Within this framework, it is necessary to deal with an important event which took place in the 1976-80 5-year period. This was the placing in operation of the KTP-1 sugarcane harvesting combine factory, which was inaugurated in Holguin on 27 July 1977 by Commander in Chief Fidel Castro.

The opening of this installation, the legitimate result of Cuban-Soviet cooperation, insures the future of Cuban sugarcane harvests and obviously contributes to the systematic expansion of them. With it is created the national base for the uninterrupted advance of sugarcane harvest mechanization and an important step is taken in the development of the machine-building industry.

When it is operating at full capacity, that factory, which bears the glorious name of "60th Anniversary of the October Revolution," will be able to produce 600 combines per year in addition to parts, pieces and accessories amounting to 1,000 tons. The latter is also very important to insure the operational effectiveness of the harvesting machines. In this respect, it must be pointed out that in the 1977 harvest, to cite an example, 19 percent of the time lost by the KTP-1 because of breakdowns and maintenance was due to having to wait for repair parts.

PARTY CALLS FOR EXTRA EFFORT TO MAKE UP FOR RAIN LOSSES IN PINAR

FL182030 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1902 GMT 18 Nov 80

[Text] In view of the rain of the past several hours, the provincial party bureau in Pinar del Rio has issued a call stating that the province is facing the resulting situation inasmuch as rain levels in our territory are reaching historic records for November. There are tobacco municipalities, such as Sandino, where more than 500 mm of rain have fallen, affecting the progress of the harvest which had had a great beginning, the call says.

As of 12 November, 223,000 seed beds were totally lost and 119,000 were affected. This includes both the state and peasant sectors. Of the 226 planted caballerias, 129.6 were lost and 50.7 were affected. The party document adds that these losses might increase. It states that the situation brought on by the rain demands an extraordinary effort from all those involved in the tobacco harvest and from the people in general. This way, 358,900 seed beds can be irrigated from now until 10 December so that enough seedlings are available to finish work on the 3,000 caballerias called for by the province's plan up to 31 January, the document says. This means, it adds, that 249,000 seed beds must be irrigated before the end of the month and 110,170 more from 1 to 10 December [figures as heard].

There have been damages and losses in other areas of Pinar del Rio's production, especially in vegetable production, where 16,800 seedlings were affected in the state sector and 3,931 in the peasant sector.

The party's call says that the rain has made the coffee beans mature faster and fall from the bushes between (Gajalbana) and San Andres. An estimated 32,000 arrobas must be picked as soon as possible.

The document adds that the situation calls for the utmost efforts to fulfill the new schedule that must be established in keeping with the present circumstances as well as to recover from losses and damages in the vegetable, coffee and tubers areas.

The provincial bureau reaffirms its confidence in the fighting spirit of the people of Pinar del Rio who have always come through in whatever tasks they have undertaken. If we work in an organized and disciplined way, use the right techniques and make the most of our resources, we will achieve our purposes, which are to plant and harvest the 3,000 caballerias of tobacco in honor of the second party congress, the document concludes.

GARCIA FRIAS ADDRESSES CIEGO DE AVILA MEETING

FL190042 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 0000 GMT 19 Nov 80

[Text] An awareness of protection of flora and fauna must be created in the people because this is a task of society and the new generations will thank us for the effort we are making, commander of the revolution Guillermo Garcia Frias, member of the PCC Politburo, stated in his closing remarks at the establishment of Ciego de Avila Province's Scientific Council for the Conservation of Flora and Fauna in a ceremony held in Ciego de Avila City.

The vice president of the councils of state and ministers noted that the environment is a part of the entire socio-economic, cultural and historic development of the country and, because of this, man should not be the one who destroys it. All citizens must achieve such a level of culture which will make the conservation of natural beauty possible. In that sense, Garcia Frias stressed the incorporation of all people, especially the pioneers and youths, into camping or other activities so that their love for nature may develop as a part of man in socialism.

Garcia Frias also spoke about the need to protect some species of our fauna which are in danger of extinction, and noted that cayo cocos, located north of the province with an area of 33,000 hectares, will be stocked with all the animals and trees that can live there. He also stated that next to cayo cocos are romano and sabinal keys, which are part of a natural protection barrier for the country against wind and salinity, a good reason for protecting their respective flora and fauna.

Dr Abelardo Moreno, president of the Cuban Scientific Council for the Conservation of Flora and Fauna, stated that great attention must be paid to the salinity of the soil, to supervising the exploitation of the quarries and guaranteeing the availability of a residual treatment plant for every industry in order to protect the environment. For his part, Rafael Valdes Valdes, first party secretary in the province, said that the residents of Ciego de Avila will spare no efforts to make a reality the guidance emanating from the meeting, especially when flora and fauna are extremely important for the development of the territory.

NEED TO IMPROVE REPAIR SERVICES DISCUSSED

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 31 Oct 80 pp 44-47

[Article by Susana Tesoro: "Systematization, Key to Service"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in boldface]

[Text] The word "services" is as complex as it is general. There are medical services, gastronomical services, commercial services and so on ad infinitum. We are going to study the part this time that has bothered the people for a long time: repair services. We are going to limit ourselves to Havana Province where the largest number of shops, objects to repair and, naturally, problems to solve are concentrated.

At one time, the repair of any domestic appliance (mechanical or electrical) was so difficult that some customers debated between buying a new one or sending the broken one for repairs. Although it is true that there has been work to improve this situation, it is also true that the people have suffered innumerable annoyances through delays, poor work, losses and other singular and small tragedies.

Background

Beginning in 1977 when the people's government organs were created, there was a change in the structure of this branch. The shops, receiving offices, etc. were under the Ministry of Domestic Trade but passed to an office of the people's government called services. It covers from pressure cookers to refrigerators and includes the repair of furniture, clocks, shoes and everything else that has to be fixed. This office also covers beauty shops, barber shops, cleaners, etc.

As can be assumed, the change made adjustments and new methods indispensable. There had to be a system that would please and help the people who, in the end, are the ones who pay for the work and who suffer from the possible failures of a certain method.

During all these years, improvement in services was strived for. The affected customer does not believe that those mechanisms that seemed diabolical at times were the product of ill will; one has to put oneself in the place of the director of one of these enterprises and then judge his work. It is not always easy to make positive changes and to do things the way one feels they should be done. We have verified that experience and the actual resources have been used to try to satisfy the people.

Unforeseen Growth

If we go only 5 or 6 years back and compare the quantity of equipment, objects and appliances sold to the people, we will see that the quantity and variety of articles offered have grown rapidly. First there was the pressure cooker sold as a bonus of the CTC [Central Organization of Cuban Trade Unions]. Then came the flood of refrigerators, televisions, washers, fans, radios of every type, record players, etc. Today, in 1980, the majority of those articles are on the open market and more are sold each day.

What does this have to do with services? A lot, because when an article is sold, there must be enough shops and parts to guarantee the repair and maintenance of those objects. This is a large part of the problem.

The existing shops, mechanics and parts did not correspond with the massive sale of domestic appliances. One of the hardest tasks of this office was to try to balance possession with shops.

To give an idea, we will list the approximate numbers of radios, televisions, refrigerators, washers and stoves in the hands of the people of Havana.

There are 600,000 /radios/ and 11 shops.

As of 31 July, there were 400,000 Soviet /television/ sets; that is, 80 percent of the families have a television.

About 77 percent of the families have /refrigerators/. There are 387,000 in the capital, of which 55 percent are from capitalist countries, 36 percent are from the USSR and 9 percent are from INPUD [National Industries for Domestic Products and Utensils]. There are five shops to service them.

There are about 101,000 /washers/ from the USSR. Twenty percent of the families in this province have washers although there is only one repair shop.

/In stoves/, the situation is as follows. There are 22 shops of which 21 are for kerosene stoves and 1 for electric stoves. The variety of stoves owned by the people breaks down as follows: 36 percent have pressurized or gasified kerosene, 11 percent have kerosene with wicks, 28 percent have liquid gas, 22 percent use processed gas and 3 percent have electric stoves.

Problems and Change

There were and are problems although there are fewer each time. The basic necessities included parts and materials, mechanics, adequate transportation and shop capacity.

There were 24,219 television sets needing picture tubes, flyback and other components. This happened not only because of the parts shortage but because of the need for adjustments in forms of payment, the new work system and other basically organizational measures.

One of the first favorable measures was to tie in all the mechanics and then change the structure totally. Now there is one mechanic per zone. This means that a mechanic always services the same area and, therefore, knows the problems of the equipment that he usually repairs better.

The mechanics that service a zone form a brigade which has a chief. Then there is the shop chief who is responsible for the brigade chiefs. A mechanic's work is inspected and approved by the brigade chief.

This new system has managed to expand service in the customer's home which makes the customer more satisfied because he can see what is done to his set and it is not taken out of his house to a shop.

In September there was a campaign to fix television sets since parts that were needed for some time had been received. The result of this marathon was really surprising. From July to September, an average of 800 picture tubes were put in per week and it is expected that the delay in television repairs will be eliminated by the beginning of 1981.

Another influence in this change is the fact that a good part of the technical personnel for television repair has been changed. This presented a critical situation at the beginning of the year. Now 231 comrades have graduated specializing in transistorized equipment and there is a course for repairing color televisions. Also 77 recent graduates from technological institutes have been retrained.

Another factor that will improve television repair is the sale of different components from socialist countries so that the customer can fix his own television. That center will be at No. 667 Habana between Luz and Acosta in Habana Vieja.

All the radio jobs from mechanic to receiver have been tied in. The brigade chief is in charge of inspecting the equipment after the mechanic has finished. This results in faster attention, shorter delivery cycles and better use of shop capacity. All the shops already have this system. The results show that the repair cycles are down to only 24 hours; in case of very complex repairs, the cycle takes from 3 to 5 days.

One interesting detail is that with the present method, it is the brigade chief who determines the complexity of the repair. Before, the mechanic who repaired it did this and then collected for it. This means control that the fee for each job is for what needed to be done.

There was instability in refrigerator repair due to lack of parts. As of 31 July, there was a great quantity of equipment to be repaired. The brigade by zones is also being applied here and has yielded very good results.

The implementation of a new system, already being applied experimentally in Boyeros, is being worked on. When the repair of an appliance requires shop attention, the enterprise rents a new refrigerator. The customer pays 1 peso a day while his appliance is being fixed.

The situation for stoves is not very promising now since there is a shortage in supplies. The low quality of fuel frequently conspires against kerosene stoves. Five new shops are being prepared for gas stoves, three of which will open this year.

For smaller appliances—irons, fans, pressure cookers, etc.—the method is to take the article to the shops. In the next 5-year period, the necessary parts will be sold so that the customer can repair his own appliances. There are still many problems with insufficient parts at the shops, poor quality of repairs and lack of compliance and supervision of consumer standards. There should also be a review of the price policy and a systematic analysis of the return rate.

There is also work to improve the quality and speed of clock repairs. The repair is done by steps in the shops and there is a labor tie which expedites repair. Kiosks will be opened to do minor repairs immediately like change the crystal, the stem or the dial and verification of correct timekeeping. These kiosks will be in central locations throughout the city.

Proposals to the Executive Committee

In the last regular session of the Provincial People's Government Assembly, this service office made the following requests to the Provincial Executive Committee in order to guarantee a good job: to give priority to an indispensable automobile pool, to finish the projects being carried out, to continue the selection of personnel in shops, to deliver the necessary model for adequate control and to recommend that intermediate education update its study programs so that a technological graduate can go directly into a shop without taking another course.

Something That Affects Enterprise, Customer

As we have already said, this is a complex task. A truly singular phenomenon has occurred. With the perhaps unexpected speed in repairs now, repaired equipment has accumulated in the shops. Some customers are not picking it up and do not receive it at home. The enterprises have notified them by telegram, telephone call and visit but there is no solution.

The most serious thing is all the repaired equipment that has been in the shops for years because the customer has not picked it up and, at times, does not receive it at his house. This keeps the enterprise from fulfilling its quotas since it does not collect for fixing these articles. Also the equipment that has been stored for so long deteriorates because storage conditions are not optimal.

Why hasn't some measure been taken concerning these customers? Because this office does not have legislation that permits it to sell this equipment, use it or collect a surcharge for storage from those who do not pick it up on time.

The legal department of the Ministry of Domestic Trade is working on a legal instrument that would authorize the service office to decide what to do with articles not picked up on time. In the same way, we hope there will be a law for the customer when the enterprise does not comply and takes longer than promised to repair something.

Some customers allege that they do not have money at the time and others state that they will pick up their equipment later. In downtown Havana which is most affected, this situation represents a total of 102,786 pesos in radios, televisions, refrigerators and clocks and 90,670 pesos in smaller appliances. One alarming provincial figure is that 12,800 clocks have not been picked up for a cost of 102,500 pesos.

The above can be less serious for this office if we compare it to the development and printing of photographs. In downtown Havana alone, there is an accumulation of 4,400 orders worth about 100,000 pesos. In this branch, if the person does not pick up his pictures, the enterprise totally loses the money because no one is going to buy the photograph of someone that he does not know.

Prospects

If the resources are maintained and present measures are strictly followed, the future of repair services will be promising. At this time, a shop complex that will fix motors, a problem that still delays some deliveries, is being constructed. Next year this will be considerably alleviated.

We asked comrade Roberto Garcia, director of services for Havana: "How can we assure the people that this change in services will continue improving?"

Garcia stated: "First, we must systematize what we have achieved. We are going to continue with the work offensive, the demand in quality and the appropriate operation of services. There will be an improvement with all the new shops that we are going to open and with all the youths who are studying in the different specialties. In other words, in addition to creating the organizational systems, we are building shops, giving priority to repair parts, training the work force, receiving a new automobile pool and receiving tools and instruments. This, logically, will be a very favorable response /and, in 1981, services have to improve/."

PEOPLES GOVERNMENT LOCAL ORGANS EIGHTH MEETING ENDS

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 20 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] Several matters directly related to the population were debated during the Eighth Meeting of the Office for Peoples Government Local Organs, assigned to the Executive Committee of the Council of Ministers, with the chairmen of the provincial assemblies, which took place Tuesday and Wednesday at the Palace of the Revolution.

The meeting was chaired by Faustino Perez, member of the Party Central Committee and chief of the above-mentioned office. The agenda began with the study of cash control, the income and expenditure situation and the implementation of the budget, a matter that is very closely linked to the development of the restaurant and trade sector.

Faustino Perez, in his introductory remarks, stated that this analysis comes under the constant scrutiny of the struggle for efficiency and high standards. This is a battle that we must win, considering the lack of control that is evident in these areas.

He added, by way of example, that it has been learned that a considerable amount of the products assigned to the restaurant network for some reason do not reach the public. It is essential that we find out what has caused this situation, given the impact it has not only on the economy and on the people's daily lives, but also on collective morale.

Francisco Garcia Valls, chairman of the State Finance Committee, said in this regard that audits undertaken by his committee in 1979 and 1980 in a large number of establishments in several provinces had shown that there is poor control.

Garcia Valls added that it has also been learned that consumption standards for food products are not being complied with in some establishments; in some cases products were discontinued and did not appear again, and in other cases products that did not meet standards were served to the public, and then income quotas were exceeded.

These problems become even more apparent when it is noted that there were considerable shortages during the first half of this year in the units subordinate to the Peoples Government in local areas.

The entire situation has a common denominator, added the chairman of the State Finance Committee: the lack of control and the possibility of diverting money, food and consumer goods, which leads to criminal activity among unscrupulous elements of society.

In the debates on this issue, in which several Peoples Government chairmen and officials of the National Bank of Cuba, Domestic Trade, Light Industry and the Economic Police all participated, many objective and subjective problems involved in these irregularities were discussed.

In the first place, although it is true that a great effort has been made to combat these shortcomings and many managers and workers have been punished for negligence in the past year, there is no doubt that the degree of disciplinary problems among administrative leaders is still high, that supervision is inadequate, and that in these areas there must be more rigorous standards to correct these problems.

In addition, there is a series of objective issues that are preventing adequate action, and efforts to solve the problem should be stepped up. These difficulties include the lack of cash registers and numbered receipts and the lack of more permanent provisions for audits.

However, it was made clear that there are sufficient economic mechanisms to take action against these problems, and there are administrative possibilities for improving the situation through rigorous demands in all cases, and popular supervision and control.

In the budgetary analysis, Garcia Valls also pointed out the failure to comply with the budget, both in terms of income from business earnings and the restaurant tax.

In that regard he indicated that this situation has resulted from a lack of financial discipline in the payment of taxes, and deficiencies in the municipal finance offices which do not meet requirements in time. He reported that a decree-law is about to be passed that will permit fines for delays in tax payments by establishments.

He also stressed the distortions that are taking place in several provinces that are not meeting their planned income quotas; they spend more, and resort to state subsidies as a result of inefficient management.

Attention to Harvest Problems

Another topic discussed at the meeting was support by Peoples Government Local Organs for the sugarcane harvest by means of help for the physical grounds, lodgings, dining rooms and other facilities associated with plants and agricultural enterprises.

In general, this area has witnessed apparent success with the solution of numerous social problems, according to officials of the Ministry of the Sugar Industry, and the Group for Coordination and Support of the Commander in Chief.

The study presented was summed up by going into detail about the issues related to human services, such as material provisions, food and recreation in order to ensure effective productivity of forces.

The speakers also urged support from local government organizations to guarantee the finishing of plant repairs, which at this time are being carried out efficiently and on time in 130 of the sugar mills that must begin the harvest by the end of November or early December.

Problems of Domestic Fuel and Stoves

The overall situation of domestic fuel was also studied by the provincial chairmen of the Peoples Government, under the direction of the Basic Industry Ministry, headed by Joel Domenech, chief of that department, and Marcos Lage, minister of the Sidero-Mechanical Industry.

Joel Domenech reported to the chairmen that progress has been made in studies of the problem, in terms of the consumption of kerosine, manufactured or liquefied gas, as well as electricity.

He indicated that 70.9 percent of all nuclear families use kerosine stoves, and that this fuel will be used in this country for many years.

He explained, however, that an effort must be made to solve the problems of fuel quality, inefficient stoves and annoying delays in distribution among the population which cause people to reject these products.

For this purpose, work must be done to create the necessary conditions for the adequate distribution of the fuel; the problem is not that not enough kerosine is produced, but lies in storage and limited capacity in the marketing network.

Another solution is to improve the gasification of the stove and make sure it is properly maintained, according to Domenech.

Marcos Lage explained the possibilities that are being developed in the production of kerosine stoves, pointing out that to date only the Piker type is being emphasized, along with repairs of stoves that have fallen into disuse.

He reported that at this time an investment has been made in the old National Industries for Domestic Products and Utensils (INPUD) in Santa Clara in the form of a new stove plant that will produce a top-grade type with one, two and four burners. There will be different stages during the next 5 years. The stove has good gasification, and needs to be preheated only once a day, which makes for greater efficiency of use and considerable alcohol savings.

Work is also being done on the Estrella Roja factory to produce a Piker stove in an improved design. The economic feasibility of producing a new, improved stove right there to replace the Piker is being discussed.

Joel Domenech repeated that the country had no recourse but to use kerosine, a fuel which costs even more now on the world market than gasoline or natural gas, because there is no alternative for the moment.

He added that liquefied gas is experiencing technological difficulties in the refineries where it is produced, as well as inefficiency in the exploitation of gas and other problems in the extraction of the product. The result has been supply delays, which prevents the country from increasing current capacity.

With regard to manufactured gas (from the street), which can be obtained only in the city of Havana, the head of Basic Industry indicated that this is one of the worst services provided, due to the myriad problems associated with maintenance and poor quality gas.

He stated that this service will grow very little in the coming years, and that criteria for investment are geared toward improving current service.

School Progress

The progress of the school year and particularly the organization of school transportation, the distribution of books and other educational material, and the repair and maintenance of schools were subjects of discussion at the meeting.

Jose R. Fernandez, member of the Central Committee and minister of education, pointed out that the measures adopted in the provinces for school initiatives were good, and there was better organization. There have been very specific problems which have been pinpointed, and efforts are being made to solve them.

The different experiences in the use of school transportation and difficulties with some texts due to printing problems (in the ninth grade, for example), were debated by the chairmen.

The same occurred with the critical situations of school maintenance or repairs; topics discussed included lack of resources, although it was pointed out that local government agencies have tried to minimize the possibility of closing down facilities because of this problem.

The problem of moving Oriente students to the Isle of Youth was another topic of discussion; it extended also into the debates on the schools of Matanzas and Pinar del Rio. It was agreed to postpone the debates so that this situation can be studied in an integrated manner by the Ministries of Education and Transportation and the Peoples Government Local Organs involved.

Analysis of Five-Year Plan

Other matters which were discussed include those which affect services to the people, such as construction materials sales, repairs to domestic appliances, production of local industries for domestic consumption and export, the maintenance and repair of highways, and end-of-year supplies.

With regard to construction materials sales, it was learned that there has been a substantial improvement on all levels; even though some quotas were not met, the national plan was 58 percent completed as of July.

In these figures, for example, one outstanding statistic was that of large-scale cement marketing (as of July 75 percent of the annual quota had been met), whose increase was felt in almost all provinces, with the exception of Santiago de Cuba and Havana.

Concerning the home appliances repair situation, there was an exchange of opinions among the chairmen and officials of the Central Planning Board and Domestic Trade regarding delays in spare parts supplies and the lengthening of the repair cycle, as well as the efforts being made in the country to acquire the principal components to be able to improve this service.

The production of local industries for domestic consumption and export has experienced shortfalls, which prompted speakers to urge local agencies to increase the funding for exports, considering the demand for these products on foreign markets and the foreign currency potential of these exports. The need to raise quality was stressed.

The Peoples Government chairmen also received a detailed report on plans to respond to hurricanes, and various comments on the deficiencies found during the disturbances caused by Hurricanes Frederick, David and Allen.

Another topic covered at the meeting was the current situation of the Argentine fishing plants.

It was learned that of the 1,500 modules acquired by this country, at this time approximately half have been installed, so much remains to be done with these investments.

Fernandez Guervo, minister of the fishing industry, explained that given the needs of each municipality or locality, it is possible to make better use of these facilities, and expand their use in the preservation and marketing of meat and dairy products in the commercial network, so that all their refrigeration capacities can be utilized.

Finally, the provincial chairmen spent all day Thursday with the leaders of the Central Planning Board, headed by Humberto Perez, studying and discussing various aspects of the 1981-1985 5-year plan, particularly the 1981 plan.

FURTHER STEPS TAKEN TO COLLECTIVIZE PRIVATE LANDHOLDINGS

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 7 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Orlando Gomez: "From Small to Large Cane Cooperatives"]

[Text] What has been happening for some months in the process of agrarian collectivization in Cuban private agriculture can, undoubtedly, be described as a qualitative leap with respect to the type of Agricultural and Livestock Cooperative (CPA) which up to now had emerged from among our peasants.

The fact that in the last 3 or 4 months 17 medium and large sugarcane cooperatives were formed, which have as a minimum an area of 34 caballerias and in which several tens or a hundred small farmers are always associated, undoubtedly corroborates what we said in the first paragraph: a qualitative leap within the process of creating agrarian cooperatives in Cuba.

This new phenomenon, the result of the merger of 50 small sugarcane CPA's, whose basic crop is the most important of those we have, was exactly what the country, the ANAP [National Association of Small Farmers], the party and the state had been promoting from some time ago up to now.

Actually it is precisely in those CPA's, where the areas of cultivatable land are large and compact and with large memberships, that conditions exist for the application of technology (machinery, chemicals, irrigation and so forth) and large-scale work organization.

Moreover, only if a sugarcane CPA—of which there are more than 300--is large and with many members and, therefore, productively and economically strong, can it obtain the financial resources it needs to buy from the state all the equipment, machinery, services and materials it needs to improve the working conditions of its members and their material and cultural standard of living. We have an example of this when the time comes for the necessary grouping of the houses of the cooperative members and the construction of the cooperative's town, a decision which requires substantial expenditures.

The present and successful process of unification of small CPA's specializing in the cultivation of sugarcane began in Las Tunas Province with the Leningrad Cooperative of the Colombia township. It was founded with 133 caballerias of area, of which 37 were devoted to sugarcane at that time.

It was immediately followed by the Revolucion de Etiopia CPA in Ciego de Avila, the largest in the country with 139 caballerias until a few days ago, when three medium cooperatives of the Matanzas valley of Guamacaro in Limonar joined it, thus making it the largest in area nation-wide with 151 caballerias, of which 66 are devoted to sugarcane.

At the beginning of the cooperative process approximately 4 years ago, some comrades told this reporter of their concern that many of the cooperatives being created were very small and that their parameters in land area, number of members, means of production and other factors were too scant to achieve significant achievements in aspects as important as production volumes, agricultural yields, labor productivity, cost effectiveness, profitability and income yield. These aspects, they said, would show whether those CPA's were really superior and more advantageous in all respects than the old and obsolete method of private, single-crop method of working the land.

With the passage of the minimum time necessary for the advances, regressions, virtues and defects of a complex social mass process to be observed with a certain objectiveness, it can now be said that there are no reasons for concern since what is happening on the levels or parameters of the CPA's is what the country needs.

Not only are small and medium cooperatives merging successfully and becoming large and technically well-supplied CPA's, like the 17 which appear on the list accompanying this article, but the small ones devoted to other crops less liable to extending their areas as in the case of sugarcane, also grow in area and membership, the national average of area per cooperative of this larger type now approaching 13 caballerias and 27 members.

It is logical that this qualitative leap among the CPA's will show up first and in greater degree in those which devote themselves primarily to growing cane, because cane, of all the agricultural products of the country, together with rice and citrus, is one of the products which most justifies being grown in large area units where the degree of mechanization and technology in all aspects can be high. Moreover, to this is added the fact that the degree of sugarcane knowhow among our peasants in cooperatives is considerable, which makes it even easier for them to devote themselves primarily to this vital crop of ours.

At this time, the total area of cooperatives in peasant agriculture is 13,000 caballerias, land in which some 26,000 cooperative members in more than 1,000 CPA's work with enthusiasm and faith in the future. The immense majority of the CPA's are very prosperous in their productive and economic results, not to speak of what it has meant, and above all, what it will mean,in the social progress of our peasant family.

It is only fair to recognize the encouragement and help represented by the complete support of the MINAZ [Sugar Industry Ministry] to this important aspect of the emergence of medium and large sugarcane cooperatives.

Undoubtedly they are convinced in that ministry of the great productive successes on the horizon for these cooperatives of the proper size and equipped technically with everything that the state within its possibilities can now offer those small cane cooperatives which merge and become a medium or large cooperative with more than 60 percent of their area devoted to sugarcane.

Our sugarmills will receive more than 47 million arrobas of sugarcane from these 17 new and large cooperatives in this their first harvest as such. This in no way means all the potential reserve of sugarcane production existing in them.

If we calculate the percentage of land devoted to cane in those CPA's, we will note that they only use 59 percent of their total area for it, which means that simply by extending that crop as much as possible (there are areas for self-consumption and pastures and untillable areas in each CPA) a few more million arrobas of sugarcane could be produced among those 17 large production cooperatives.

And all this without even mentioning what would be achieved through the varietal improvement of their rootstocks, complete irrigation and other technical and chemical factors which can be obtained in this type of cooperative socialist enterprise to improve the quantity and quality of sugarcane and industrial yields.

What is happening this summer of 1980 in the cooperative movement of our peasants with the merger of small cane cooperatives and their transformation into large cooperatives with more capable and experienced management bodies--the management of the small cooperatives was for them a school in the management and organization of collective work and for the accumulation of valuable lessons--undoubtedly marks a new phase within the national agrarian cooperative process; the leap in quality we waited for so long.

These are the 17 sugarcane CPA's which began a new phase within the agrarian cooperative process in the country:

Name	Total Area (caballerias)	Area in cane	Estimated 80/81 harvest production in millions of arrobas	Provinces

ANAP EXPECTATIONS FOR COOPERATIVES EXPLAINED

Havana JUVENTUD REBELDE in Spanish 13 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] The National Association of Small Farmers [ANAP] wants the process of creation of the agricultural-livestock cooperatives (CPA) to be concluded in the coming 5-year period in the country, and to have 1,000 of these groups with 100 caballerias of areas each as a maximum.

Some questions arise in this matter, questions as to the present status of the creation of the CPA's.

If reference is made to the plan proposed by the organization itself, it could be said that there is an obvious delay, and this, despite the recommendation by the First Party Congress that the peasants go on to superior production methods, would mean a delay in the development of socialism.

However, the recommendation has as an unavoidable premise the Leninist principle of voluntariness and spontaneity, without a trace of compulsion which would defeat the purpose.

The availability of resources has been a limiting factor, but operational management has played an important role in providing the CPA's with machinery, equipment, electricity, construction materials and others.

There is no doubt as to the revolutionary character of the farmers, the work which supports the revolution and their understanding of the urgent tasks posed to them by the revolution. To unite them is not only a matter of their willingness but of the objective conditions which surround them.

What objectives are attained by the creation of many CPA's if they do not attain at least acceptable economic results?

It is necessary that the economic movement be maintained as up to now.

The immense majority of them are efficient. Proof of this is the checkup made in 162 of them up to 31 July. It is emphasized that only eight of them had losses and that nationally the cost per peso produced was 67 centavos.

The productive contribution of the CPA's increases every year and their greater efficiency and productivity allows a growing participation in the overall volume of the production of the sector. While the area of the cooperatives is 9.3 percent of all the land, they contribute, for example, 27 percent of tubers and roots, 18 percent of truck garden products and 16 percent of the grains consumed by the people.

Nevertheless, the CPA's have a large quantity of useful land which is not being used to full capacity. A greater material and financial support by the state will make it possible to extract that potential, turning it into more food for the people and better living conditions for the cooperatives.

So that there will remain no doubt as to the importance of these questions, there is the example of the cane cooperatives which this year have been merging into medium and large cooperatives, made possible because all the necessary resources were allocated for it.

What is the reason for large-size CPA's?

The second objective, that of merging the small cooperatives or that of creating the large ones has obvious advantages for intensive cultivation because it allows greater development of agricultural-technical methods and the attainment of better yields, which in turn results in economic efficiency for the benefit of the membership.

It is proper however, and experience shows this to be true, that the CPA's begin their life with small areas because it allows the new management to train in this task.

It is a fact that up to now there have been no problems in this respect because the management cadres emerge from the CPA's themselves and in that process they acquire the initial experience. When they merge into large CPA's later, these progress at a rapid pace.

The party has issued instructions on the subject, saying that the CPA's must be an example of economic efficiency for the rest of the country and this is possible because of all the foregoing.

Is there actually some difference between a cooperative of the new type (with 100 caballerias of area) and a state enterprise?

The difference is observed mainly in the influence of the decisions made by the members of the cooperatives and the commitments they acquire for the compliance with a plan. This has led to the present efficiency of the majority of the CPA's.

What difficulties are being encountered in trying to be an example?

A survey was made recently of 20 percent of the CPA's formed. Among other things, this survey showed the following:

Eighty-one percent do not have their housing grouped because of a lack of assignment of habitational modules and because of the high price of materials. Seventy-six percent do not have electric service in their homes (it has not been planned for until 1981).

It is necessary to accelerate the consolidation of their areas; however, difficulties in deciding on exchanges, usages or necessary purchases from the state prevent this.

It is necessary to perfect the mechanisms for planning and to have better levels of reliability.

Despite the slow development of the plan (1980), the endeavor to form the peasants and their lands into cooperatives under higher forms of production is moving at a gradual pace with positive economic results. Let us look at the situation: There were only 197 CPA's formed up until 30 August out of a goal of 481, however, with respect to the extra plan of making large ones out of small ones, there are more than 30 of them (20 of them grow sugarcane) and all of them show an obvious quality in their management.

Up to now there are 985 CPA's with an area of 12,450 caballerias and 25,529 members. The average area is 12.5 caballerias and 26 members. Those which have larger areas as an average are those devoted to growing cane, with 15 caballerias; livestock, with 14.9 caballerias, and the smallest ones, the citrus-growing CPA's, with around 10 caballerias.

The cane CPA's, which devote a little more than 55 percent of their area to growing cane, have the greatest degree of specialization. The livestock CPA's have a higher percentage, but land with natural uncultivated pastures predominates in them.

In coffee and tobacco, the CPA's have the lowest rates, with only 25 and 23 percent of their areas suitable for those crops.

There have been great advances in the cooperative movement since the Fifth Peasant Congress held in 1977 (time when the peasants pledged to perform the task assigned by the First Party Congress). There are also many lessons, which are pointed out in the foregoing. The results of everything that has been done during these years will be analyzed shortly in a national meeting which will discuss the subject profoundly.

From it will come the decision, in keeping with reality, on the recommendation to give greater celerity to the development of our rural areas. The peasants have the experience and have obtained encouraging results; the force which will attain the objectives in coming years will rally around the medium-term decisions made.

PCC CENTRAL COMMITTEE 15TH ANNIVERSARY HAILED

[Editorial: "15th Anniversary of Our Party's Central Committee"]

[Text] Fifteen years ago, on 3 October 1965, the Cuban Communist Party's first Central Committee was presented to the people. The unification of all Cuban revolutionaries, which had been the dream and aspiration of the many generations of fighters that had followed one another in our country since 1868, attained a higher and definitive degree on that day in October.

It was only through the victorious revolution of workers and farmers, under the firm policy of unity conducted by Fidel, that they could realize the objectives for which the finest sons of our fatherland had for a century constantly struggled. The creation of the Central Committee expressed the fact that there now existed in our country only one kind of revolutionary, with only one party and only one ideology: Marxist-Leninism.

As the most eloquent proof of this, one of the first resolutions adopted by the Central Committee, unanimously acclaimed, was to assume the treasured name of Cuban Communist Party from that moment on.

It was on that memorable occasion, on 3 October 1965, that, during a moment of indescribable emotion, Fidel read the letter sent by Commander Ernesto "Che" Guevara in which he announced his decision to go ahead and combat imperialism in other countries.

In the course of these 15 years, in the building of our socialist system, our Central Committee has borne on its shoulders the burden of enormous efforts in the fields of the economy, politics, education, defense and the country's social and cultural development.

The second of the Central Committee's two resolutions, also made public by Fidel during the presentation ceremony, was the creation of a new newspaper in lieu of the two politically oriented newspapers that had been published until then, HOY and REVOLUCION, one which would assume the nature of an official party organ and whose name, as Fidel noted on that occasion, would be "a symbol of our revolutionary ideals and the path we intend to follow."

And so today, GRANMA too is celebrating its first 15 years of existence.

The Central Committee's 15th anniversary occurs at a time when our party and the entire nation find themselves at the doors of the Second Cuban Communist Party Congress and when the political awareness, working spirit and enthusiasm of the masses are keener than ever.

In the future, we can and will make a great deal of progress, but we will always have to turn our eyes with emotion and gratitude on those years of struggle during which, with Fidel and the Central Committee in the forefront, the heart and soul of our revolutionary process was forged, its guarantee of continuity and victory: the glorious Cuban Communist Party.

This will always be the great value of our First Central Committee.

FINAL RESOLUTION OF UJC SECOND CONGRESS REPORTED

Havana JUVENTUD REBELDE in Spanish 8 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] On 7 October 1980, the year of the Second Congress, the Ninth Plenary Session of the Union of Young Communists (UJC) National Committee was held, even while the vibrant emotions produced by the historic voyage of one our sons into outer space were still fresh in the hearts of our people.

Of humble origin and having endured a harsh childhood, born in Guantanamo with a black skin, a member of the Young Rebels Association, a scaler of Cinco Picos, a lieutenant colonel in the Revolutionary Armed Forces and active member of our Communist Party, Arnaldo Tamayo Mendez has become the first Latin American to travel in space.

All our young people lay great value on this unique event which once again confirms the fact that only the socialist system and the principles of international proletarianism can render such feats possible and reaffirm the undiminishable friendship that exists between Lenin's and Marti's countries, whose fraternal collaboration has today taken the sky by storm.

Added to this joyous moment is the awarding of the 20th Victory Year Prize to the UJC, conferred on the latter by the Political Bureau of the party Central Committee for meeting its commitments for 1979.

The National Committee's Ninth Plenary Session discussed the progress of the work engaged in during the past school term and the first months of this year, and more particularly the tasks being realized in homage to our Second Party Congress, and reached a number of conclusions which, insofar as they gather material strength through the action of the hundreds of thousands of young people who constitute the membership of the UJC, will to a great extent contribute to the effective performance of the tasks we have set ourselves in homage to that great Cuban Communist event.

In discussing the younger generation's participation in the events that have occurred as a result of what took place at the Peruvian and Venezuelan Embassies, the plenary session has confirmed the high esteem expressed by our party. These events and the departure of those antisocial elements from the port of Mariel have given rise to a magnificent demonstration by the masses in which the young people's readiness to fight and moral strength has been displayed, these young people who saw in them a nostalgic opportunity to defend the victorious revolution in the front lines. The newspaper JUVENTUD REBELDE, the Cuban youth daily that is getting ready to celebrate its 15th anniversary in the next few days, played an important role at this conference as an organizing and mobilizing force.

And now the organizational talent and ability of the young people must turn the fighting spirit of these unforgettable days into productive exploits, educational achievements and a deepening of political awareness, flying the colors of competition for the Second Party Congress.

In evaluating the results of this past school term, they were able to claim, with satisfaction, that all educational levels had maintained or exceeded their promotion quotas with the exception of higher education.

Our students and young workers in the field of education, inspired by the party's soon-to-be-held Second Congress, must redouble their efforts during the term that has just begun in order to maintain and improve on the results obtained in terms of promotion, furthermore, fighting for the retention of academic [standards], elimination of academic fraud, consistent application of the principle of tying studies in with work, social and formal education and political preparation of students through mass associations and student plenary sessions.

The plenary session felt that the Student and Pioneer Competitions, dedicated to the Second Congress, constitute an important element in the mobilization of students for the different activities and tasks, noting that they have improved in terms of quality, mass membership and enthusiasm. This movement must go on strengthening itself, resolving the security problems that threaten its development.

In discussing the progress made in meeting the commitments made by the UJC within the framework of the competition for the Second Party Congress, the plenary session confirmed the advances that have been made as well as our young people's broad participation in the effort. Nevertheless, in the remaining months the competition will have to be much tougher, there will have to be extensive realization of this fact and there must not be a single young revolutionary who does not every day strive to be a better worker, student or fighter, through his efforts offering his homage to the party and the nation's most important, decisive and responsible congress.

The plenary session considers the following to be the tasks the UJC, in the presence of our party leaders plans to commit itself to performing in homage to the Second Congress, the execution of which is necessary to guarantee maximum quality and priority during the months that separate us from that important event:

First, to continue the struggle at a higher level through the example of active participation, particularly as concerns realization of the plans resulting from the historic Seventh National Committee Plenary Session.

Second, development and strengthening of the transformations that have been introduced into the methods and manner of working and in the adaptation of the contents of the organizations, in their operation and in attention to the rank and file organizations as a fundamental organizational link.

Third, realization of the growth plan on the basis of quality in the new ventures as well as the policy of increasing our manpower without reducing the relative percentage of workers in the population, at the same time responding inasmuch as is possible to union with the Pioneer Organization.

Fourth, consolidation and improvement of our handling of the Jose Marti Pioneer Organization, particularly in the development of directions and movements as strategic tasks in the communist training of children and adolescents and in the optimal utilization of camps and administrative buildings.

Fifth, contribution to the achievement of technical-economic plan goals for each enterprise or institution, particularly in the priority sectors, beginning first of all with the exemplary attitude of each active member and his influence on the rest of the young people. Special attention will be devoted to the 17 shock actions the young people will be facing.

Sixth, decisive participation of our members and o all young people in the coming harvest chores, the first harvest of the second 5-year plan, by directing our main effort to the machine operators.

Seventh, promotion of scientific and technical activities, making efforts in terms of increasing the creativeness and inventiveness of the Young Technical Brigades to encourage solutions to the specific problems of each work center and providing continuity to contributions that will make possible the successful holding of expositions of the achievements of those who are forging our future.

Eighth, control and regulation of the organization of members who have not yet reached the sixth grade, thus guaranteeing their incorporation into the study, assistance and development programs.

Ninth, the perfecting of mechanisms for the ideological job to be done, paying special attention to the political preparation of members and young people, which will be assisted by radio and television programming for young people, the newspaper JUVENTUD REBELDE and the news publications system the organization relies on.

Tenth, attention to the political processes relating to the start of the school term and the promotion of additional efforts by students and teachers to set in motion a course of study that can equate with the party congress.

Eleventh, intensification of the Second Party Congress propaganda campaign, putting at its disposal all the means the organization has available to it.

Twelfth, promotion of the youth march along the Maceo Road from 22 October to 7 December in commemoration of the Lieutenant General and his armies 85 years ago and the 62-km march next 26 October in homage to the 21st anniversary of the creation of the National Revolutionary Militias.

The people of Cuba and its youth will come to the Second Party Congress engaged in the battle for economic and social development in a climate of creative effort, enthusiasm, moral purity and political-ideological strength.

Cuban youth regards the Second Party Congress as its own congress. Our Communist Party, the vanguard of the working class, is the natural leader in this march toward socialism and communism.

There is no greater aspiration for a young communist than to join the ranks of our glorious party. The confidence that Fidel and the leaders of the revolution have in their youth organization is for us a source of great pride and perpetual commitment.

As we meet today only hours before the 13th anniversary of the day the Heroic Guerrilla Fighter fell in combat, the reverberations of rebel rifles traverse our great nation. To the then unique Cuban revolution have been added the very recent and vigorous processes in Grenada and Nicaragua and the uncontainable force of revolution is making itself felt on the continent with redoubled impetus.

Cuban youths will never forget the incalculable lessons they have learned from Commander Ernesto Guevara's life and work. At this time of work and effort, we borrow a programmatic line from his ideology that is today the banner of thousands and thousands of members and young people and also of our whole nation: "The UJC must be defined by a single word: Vanguard."

[This resolution was] adopted by the Ninth Plenary Session of the UJC National Committee on 7 October 1980, the year of the Second Congress.

CASE STUDY REVEALS EFFECTS OF DIVORCE ON CHILDREN

Havana JUVENTUD REBELDE in Spanish 5 Oct 80 p 6

[Article by Ada Mendez: "A Violent Upset in the Lives of Two Adolescents"]

[Text] "All parents know from their own experience that nothing in life involves more passion or responsibility than raising a child. Each child is the most personal and legitimate product of the family which brought him into the world, protected him and taught him, beginning with his first word and first step toward the moral precepts and ideological values which make the man, the citizen and the revolutionary" (Raul Castro at the founding of the Society for Patriotic-Military Education (SEPMI), January 1960).

"Invariably, whenever a case occurs in which a young person's conduct has strayed and deteriorated, the neglect and tolerance of the family can be seen; the saddest part is that some militants and leaders too are guilty of such neglect. Due to lack of time, they say, and due to irresponsibility, according to the general consensus, they do not devote proper attention to the education of their children. They can hardly educate society if they are incapable of educating their own children" (Raul Castro at the constituent assembly of the SEPMI, January 1980).

This is a real case. All of the protagonists exist and the stories were provided by them and tape-recorded by JUVENTUD REBELDE. Only the names have been changed and the locations of the homes and work places of those mainly involved have been omitted. Our purpose is not to place blame, but to pass on an educational message, calling attention to what happens when improper application of the principles set forth in the Code for Youth and Children by the family, specialized state bodies and mass organizations leads young people like those described here, who have the possibility of studying, of becoming engineers, doctors, technicians or skilled workers in our country, begin to deteriorate and are transformed into potential anti-social elements.

The patrol car halted suddenly. A PNR [National Revolutionary Police] agent got out and proceeded, almost at a run, toward a group of boys. After a brief exchange he took out his handcuffs and carefully manacled two of the boys. He put them in the car and they left.

A few months later, Olga told the sad story. "I had to watch in silence, standing in the doorway of my home, while my son, 14, was taken off in handcuffs to the police station. They charged him with complicity in the theft of a tin of cookies, precisely a kind he does not eat because he does not like them.

"He was reported by the daughter of the president of the committee and there were those who told me not to pay any attention, but I answered that the revolution has no reason to do this.

"I understand that there have certainly been many problems on the block. Sometimes my children have been to blame, but the charge this time was false, because as they are not in school and spend the day wandering, people are already prejudiced against them and blame them for everything that happens, because once you get a reputation you are stuck with it."

In fact, this is what happens when young people lose respect, I thought.

The Story

The relations between the parents and the children in that home developed normally until divorce caused a violent upset in the lives of the children. In brief, Olga Perez, an employee at a consolidated primary school for 10 years, and Raul Martin, currently a driver for a business, had been married for more than 5 years when their union was dissolved 5 years ago. There were serious disagreements between them, but they are not pertinent to this work of ours. The four children of this marriage are the focus of the whole matter. After all, one can divorce a spouse, but one can never divorce the children. They all stayed with their mother. The father remained for some time in Havana and then went to another province to work and make a new life. Later he married again.

"The children were doing well and Raul was a good father, waiting for them when he came from work and sometimes taking them out with him. They loved him very much, especially Juan, the littlest, who was seven when we separated. Rauli adored him too, and both of them were very close. The girl, Grisel, had just turned 10, and Ernesto, the oldest, was already 12."

Ernesto

"I do not know why things in Ernesto's life were always different. Currently, at 17, he is already a militant in the UJC [Union of Young Communists]. He finished the 8th grade and studied radiotelegraphy to go into the SMG [General Military Service]. He had a nice job and he gave me almost all the money they paid him—some 40 pesos—which, although it is not much, was a help."

He spoke little but to the point. He told me of his concern about the behavior of his two brothers and he understands that they need material and spiritual care. His aspirations? To work so that the country can emerge from underdevelopment and to be able to help his mother and the children.

Grisel

"The girl turned 15 last 31 August, and wanted to take pre-university training. I found it necessary to advise her to choose a better career, so she could begin to work right away. Finally she decided on planning and she has now enrolled in an economics school. I was happy, although within myself I was sad at having to discourage her desire to study what she wanted because the fact is, Comrade, I only earn 75 pesos, and the father sends them an allotment of 46, but it really is not enough for us. They are still very young, and they want to dress and look good--in brief, I understand that it is thus, but I can almost never please them."

Juan and Rauli

"It is not only the money that is hard . . . because of the separation I began to notice a deterioration in the behavior of the two youngest boys. It all began with an escapade at school by Rauli. He went to Lenin Park to swim in the lake, and took Juan with him. He could have drowned there!

"The teacher sent for Raul to have a talk, but he did not go, claiming that he had a great deal of work and party meetings. I began to realize that the father of the children had changed. It was as if the separation from the household had alienated him from the children as well in the affective aspect. His visits were increasingly infrequent.

"I think that if the children had felt the support of their father, his insistence, advice and aid at that time, they would not have deteriorated, because it is certain that they have. Nowadays, they are far from what is right for their age, both from the school and the social points of view.

"The first escapade was followed by others and still others, until finally Rauli dropped out of school. The younger one, given this example, did the same. The others remained enrolled in the school where I worked and I made a great effort to keep them there, my comrades are my witnesses, but they constantly slowed my work with their running away and conduct in general. The time came when I could no longer control them, because I needed to attend to my work. This was the most urgent thing in order to be able to support them, and then I began to wonder why I had to struggle alone with the problem since they had a father.

"One night, already half-insane, I decided to go and talk with the comrades in the cell of which Raul was a member. Raulito was 'out of control.' He didn't obey anything I said and the problems with his behavior occurred daily. I told Ernesto to come with me and we went out in the middle of the night, with 40 centavos in my coin purse.

"I only wanted through this talk to bring the father closer to the children. I asked them to help me along this line, and I explained to them that the children needed a great deal. I seriously think that to a great extent the present situation is a result of his lack of care. I never received any response although the comrades who talked with me promised to look into it."

Another Error

"However I must say that Raul made efforts to get them into school, and succeeded, but in that school too the older one caused trouble. I decided to leave him there to adjust, but one day he ran away and came home, and 2 days later it was I myself who took him out of school, because the administration there had not even noticed that he was missing. How can one be calm then with a problem child so far from home and without anyone checking on him? I preferred to be constantly behind again rather than risk losing him for good.

"However, Juan began to adjust to school well and suddenly it seemed that, discredited by the conduct of his brother, they dismissed him without any reason at all. This occurred at the Followers of the Mambises School in the Siboney district, something like 3 years ago. I did not make any claims and I went back to zero again. Perhaps I was wrong, but I saw no other solution at that time."

"Indeed, Olga, you should have gone to the school administrators to ask to have the matter clarified and to voice your complaints about both cases, on the immediately higher MINED [Ministry of Education] level, so that they could take action," I told her frankly. She fell silent and indicated that I was right by a slight nod of her head. Nor did she enroll them this year because she was plagued by the eternal fear that they would run away after getting in trouble. This weakness is costing her very dear now, as we will see.

The Consequences

Things went from bad to worse and today, Olga can tell tales as sad or more so than that we told in the beginning, because sometimes now the protagonists, her children, are indeed responsible for the conflicts.

She reiterated that it was no life thinking of the things they might do, spending the day in anguish fearing the occurrence of further trouble to be dealt with. She went on to tell me: "With children one can never rest, but it has been more than 4 years now that I have been struggling with this situation all alone, since I have no family in Havana. The father comes when a court problem arises and I call him, but then he leaves again and months pass when he is not in touch with the children, either by letter, because he does not write them, or by telephone, because he does not call them."

Juan and Rauli wander around, meeting with all kinds of companions, and on occasion, as their own mother says, they have committed deeds which if they cannot be regarded as criminal are very close to it.

Juan completed only two school cycles, and abandoned his studies 4 years ago, shortly after beginning the primary cycle, and naturally, his memory has not been capable of retaining anything he learned. Raul (called Rauli) is also undereducated. He is only on the 5th-grade level and he is now 16 years old.

The worst thing of all is that it is now very difficult to go back to school. They are afraid and feel ashamed at the thought of being in a primary-cycle classroom, with children between 6 and 10 as their comrades.

The concern of the mother about the future is therefore understandable. She knows that if she does not deal with them somehow, within a very short time it may be too late. Their friends are like them, young people who neither study nor work, spending the day idle, inventing amusements and observing bad examples. Time passes, the country advances and they are moving off in the other direction.

Teaching by Example

Indeed delinquent children are a serious worry for society, but there are adults who, far from helping to rescue them, chastise them, so that what is achieved is to make them still more rebellious. There are those who have not realized that work with minors must always be persuasive, prophylactic, optimistic, persistent.

This happens, unfortunately, on the block where the adolescents in this story live. There are neighbors, this mother says, "who continually harass my children, when they see them commit an error, instead of calling me to tell me of their complaints or talking with them and trying to teach them. They humiliate them, censure them and even threaten them with violence and then they claim to be revolutionaries! I can give you concrete examples . . . "

Olga paused and fell pensive. I respected her silence and thought then of my talk with Juan, who corroborated what she had just told me. He is a traumatized adolescent. It seems as if he is beginning to be aware of what his true situation is and this hurts him deeply. Our talk was too brief, he did not provide an opportunity for more, but he said two things which I filed away in my mind. "I want to study, but it is painful for me," and again, "I would like to be a member of State Security to persecute all those on this block who have hurt us, my mother and the rest of us." He wept. I was well aware that there is a mixture of chaotic and senseless thoughts in his head. And he, at the center, is turning in a vicious circle. I suggested to his mother that he urgently needs a psychologist's care.

"I told you that I have had bitter experiences with adults contributing to the further deviation of troubled children, and I will mention one. Not long ago, a neighbor boy and Juan had a fight. Do you know what the father's reaction was? Speaking to a group surrounding him he shouted contemptuously: 'What this one needs is a few real blows to finish him once and for all!'

"On the other hand, fortunately, there are conscientious neighbors on the block who respect me and help me, because they have seen and they know that I have worked very hard but no one can accuse me of any improper conduct.

"There is a family on the floor above me to whom I am very grateful. They moved here about a year ago and since then I have felt safer. I am not as alone as before. They are good and affectionate to my children.

"Carmen says she suffers for Juan and every day when she comes from work she calls him, talks with him and keeps him at her house so he will not go out wandering again and get into trouble, and she does the same with Rauli. She cheers me up so much! I know that she is helping them, I see it in the way they talk about this family, with respect, with love.

"They have done a great deal with the boys, gaining their confidence, something very few know how to do. This has been a determining factor in these relations and in the manner of influencing them. There they do not feel bad."

At Carmen's House

The tone of the "good nights" opened the real door, that is that of the home, more important than the cold slab of wood which gives access to the house, for me.

Carmen seemed to me like an incredible grandmother who is no more than about 30. Can her youth be a reflection of her spirit? It seems to be. What is certain is that she soon won me over and on hearing her say "please sit down," I felt as if I were with an old friend.

Her talk was quiet although never losing the warmth of frankness. "It is my belief that if a communist does not feel human, he is not. This does not mean softness or sentimentality, but is only a matter of analyzing and acting justly.

"Olga is a working woman, decent and revolutionary. Her low cultural level, linked with the fact that she is facing life and struggling for her children alone, make her weak in certain realms of action. This must be noted, but with the kind of criticism that helps, not crushing her as some do erroneously and unjustly, including the comrades in the very committee of which they are members, because despite the fact that they are not properly educated in the ideological realm, these boys are revolutionaries.

"This is a factor both she and the father were able to see to and although it seems a contradiction, they are outstanding CDR [Committee for the Defense of the Revolution] members. They never miss guard duty and they cooperate with their mother in everything connected with our mass organization," she said with satisfaction.

Carmen Diaz, a party member and worker, is the organizer of their CDR group.

Her words clarified much for me. She knows the situation of her neighbor very well, because she undertook to work with the children, as needed to be done. Along the way she came to love them, because she realized that there is noble material to be shaped and she regards this as a communist task.

Rauli is the most difficult because he is at a critical age and also he spends considerable time in the company of individuals who are bad for him and who try to win him over to their cause. This makes the path of recovery more arduous, but "I expect to succeed!" she said with certainty.

"Juan is easier for me to deal with personally. He is all nobility, as I found out only by offering him a little of the affection he did not have and so much needs. Thus it annoys me to hear it said that these children are bad. In reality they are only victims of the errors of their parents, who did not know how to pursue the process of divorcing intelligently."

Lucy, Carmen's daughter, knows how to behave as a result of her status as a young communist. On coming from work, although she has a 2-year-old son, she arranges her time so as always to have a "little while" to devote to Juan. She is giving him lessons in reading, writing and arithmetic.

"With Rauli, as his mother said, everything is a little more difficult. He is older and also more rebellious, but despite everything, I do not regard him as a bad boy either. He respects and obeys us. I think it is simply because we know how to treat him."

Raulito

I asked to talk with Rauli, and then I had a talk with all of them. He was to be found, as always, on the corner with his "peers." Ernesto, on hearing my request, did not wait to be asked but went off willingly to find his brother. However, the latter refused to come to Carmen's house. Nor, later, did he want his picture taken.

Lucy, in a warm gesture, went into the house to change her housecoat for a suit in order to go down and get him. This seems a small thing, but it was about 11 p.m.

"At what time do you get up to go to work?" I asked.

"At six."

"It seems to me you are taking a great deal of trouble here," I said, embarrassed.

By way of response the young woman answered: "No, Comrade, this is my duty. I believe it is necessary to do this and much more to help them." She was already halfway down the stairs.

Suddenly, the words of Che Guevara came to my mind: To be revolutionary is the highest form of being human. His lessons were visible here!

Carmen interrupted my thoughts, calling to me from the balcony: "How about that? Here come Rauli and Lucy."

To be sincere I must say I was more favorably impressed than I expected. He is a very attractive young man and was clean and neat. His appearance did not put me off in the least, quite the contrary, and he pursued the conversation with seriousness and consistency.

I learned from his own lips that he likes and has a facility for learning languages. He studied Russian once but then abandoned it. I talked with him a good while and he accepted some advice I tried to give him. One final reaction of his really impressed me: he was willing to go along with a promise to take up his studies again, to try to reach the sixth-grade level as soon as possible and to provide himself with a worthy future.

He told me that he was thoroughly alienated from his father, so much so that he attributed his straying from the proper path to his separation from him.

In Search of the Father

"Attention passengers. Cuban Aviation informs you that in a few minutes we will be landing at the airport. Please fasten your seat belts . . . "

The calm voice of the stewardess brought me back from afar. However I could not put my thoughts aside. In truth I had fallen somewhat in love with this case. Time and time again I found myself thinking of these children and I also felt a responsibility to contribute in some way to ensuring that they did not stray one whit farther afield. It was worth the trouble. They can still be saved.

My first talk was with Antonio Pomares, who serves as secretary general of the party cell at the labor center where Raul Martin, the father of Ernesto, Rauli, Grisel and Juan, is employed.

Raul is a member here now and is revolutionary orientation secretary of his base-level organization. He earns a basic wage of 155 pesos, but since it is norm-linked he can exceed 200. He is a driver, because when he was appointed shift foreman some time ago, he honestly explained his lack of understanding of the job and asked to be transferred.

If the reader will permit, I will tell the story in chronological order as the talks occurred, because this will add clarity. The talks were extensive and enlightening, much more than I had expected, since a high sense of responsibility prevailed from the very first moment among the comrades in the cell, who joined the conversation one by one to enrich it, to recall past facts, recent details, and everything related to the situation in one way or another, with a view to the most precise objectivity, as befits true communists.

Pomares was aware of a part of Martin's problem: he had told him something along personal lines, although he had not done so, at least since he became secretary general just 7 months ago, within the cell. A recent visit by Raul to the capital in connection with Grisel's 15th birthday was still fresh in his mind, and he knew about his efforts to resolve the problem of purchasing two beds.

I told him that Olga had a high opinion of her husband as a worker and revolutionary, but I also made it clear to him that she had apparently been misunderstood when she tried to bring about closer relations between the father and the children. In other words he had seen it as an abandoned wife still nurturing some hope of winning her man back, although the real fact is that sometimes Martin spent a number of months without seeing the children, learning anything about them, calling them or writing them. To the point that his son does not know where he works. The wife's complaints always focused on his almost total abandonment of his son, the lack of concern which the facts and his conduct make evident.

I recall my conversation with Olga about the difficult times experienced by the country when the catastrophes wrought their havoc, when the father showed no concern as to whether the two problem children might be in any danger or trouble, or if they needed to be rescued from any effort of persuasion on the part of the anti-social elements with which he knew Juan and Rauli associated.

The Opinion of the Cell

Pomares, after hearing our arguments, undertook to give me his view. "As a worker he is excellent. Moreover, until December of last year he was secretary general of this cell, which says a good deal about his political position."

"But militant membership presumes integrity," I interrupted.

"True, and therefore I am surprised to hear these questions, because you see, he has a stable home here, his wife has a degree in Marxism and he has a child with whom he has good relations."

I fell to thinking and suddenly it was as if I thought out loud. "If he is concerned about this child, he should have even greater interest in those he has there, for in addition to being his, they need him because they face problems."

Raul Martin asked for permission from the center to go to the capital on several occasions, saying that he had problems to resolve there in connection with his children. This was confirmed by more than one cell comrade. Specifically, he came when Olga summoned him because something was going badly, but once the specific situation was resolved, he returned to his normal life, without even following up events later. He admitted this later, in a talk with the JUVENTUD REBELDE reporter.

Thus his administrative supervisors failed to understand certain attitudes. They were all in agreement that an approach to the cell to inform it more fully would have avoided certain difficulties, because its members had always helped one another. The administrator suggested the efforts and adjustments necessary in order to be able to allow him a few days' leave so that he could go there in August, for the birthday of his daughter. On this occasion Raul was presented with 80 pesos in order to be able to buy a radio.

A Response Which Never Came

Now it was a question of recalling who headed the cell when Olga paid a visit to this labor center 2 years ago to ask for help. We recalled that the mother of the boys never even received an answer on this subject. Someone should answer for it, because this was an error.

With what I viewed as a high sense of duty and a truly communist attitude, the militants with whom I talked reconstructed the leadership in that era and Pomares had those people called in to clarify the facts and establish responsibility.

And so it was that Emilio came to the small party premises where the group had already grown to six. He proved to be the man we were seeking.

"In fact, this comrade came here asking for the secretary general, which was myself," he said. "She said she faced an extremely difficult situation which regard to her former husband, who had failed to send the allotment, who paid no attention to the children, who needed a thousand things, and who were in addition unmanageable when he ignored them thus. I promised her to discuss it with the cell and to get back to her.

"Some of the problem was already known, and he had traveled to Havana frequently to help them, and even had two of them in school here, the daughter and the oldest son."

I mentioned to him that Grisel's mother had told me the girl wanted to leave her father's house because she did not get along with the stepmother and also for other unknown reasons. Ernesto left an ESBEC [Basic Secondary Farm School] there. They had not known that.

"That was a memorable meeting," he told me, "above all because of the impassioned way in which Martin defended himself against these charges. He said that the business about the money was untrue because he sent it regularly. He said that this lady had been trying for some time to make life impossible for him, and he gave an account of his trips to the city. Finally, he made it clear that where she was concerned, she was trying to destroy him.

"We examined the matter at length and saw the proof of the trips. As he said he also visited the children frequently, it was decided not to check. We did not believe this necessary because he is a militant and we, as such, have great faith in the communists. We did not check on anything, but were guided solely by what he said. If this was not the truth, we are at fault because we did not know what else happened there."

"Excuse a last question," I said, "but why then didn't you inform the comrade about those talks? Because if it was all false and you believed it so, I think you should have challenged her, at least telling her that the matter had been clarified and criticizing her activities against the militant."

"I fully agree with you," he whispered. "I can say personally I did not have this concern. I let myself be convinced by unilateral judgments. I supposed it was one of these common cases of women who want to make life impossible for a man. Now I think that we should have appointed someone to check on these facts, because there was no evidence of anything. I hold myself entirely responsible."

"I consider your self-criticism very correct," I told him. "You know that the party, faced with any problem, checks on the truth, particularly when contradictory views are presented, as is the case here."

From his seat, Pomares made a gesture of approval. Then he added: "It is logical that this comrade would think that the attitude of the cell left much to be desired." The administrator expressed approval of his words.

The Father

"You are Martin?"

"At your service."

The secretary general of the cell explained the purpose of the interview and after informing him of the issues discussed concerning him asked his view, inviting him to speak openly on the matter.

"It may be true that there was neglect on my part with regard to the concern I should have devoted to my children, but the matter is not as represented. It is possible that distance . . . after all, it is not the same to be in Havana as to be elsewhere, although if I lived there, they would have to come to see me, because I would not go to that house to be involved in problems."

He wanted to expand on this and he explained: "I separated from the mother of my children something like 6 years ago. I might have been in prison today if I had been a violent person. Our situation was intolerable. She devoted herself exclusively and solely to her children and her house . . . "

He did not complete the statement, but went on to say: "No one can say that during that time I did not devote attention to the children. They were given everything, they were my life, but that woman changed so! She insulted me and slandered me, in fact my life was intolerable. And I had to get away."

He went on: "I took Raulito and Juan and put them in school. This caused new difficulties, very difficult situations until she went to the school and took out the older boy, although the difficulties he had there were more or less the same as any other. In a word, he was taken away to harm me, to do me damage.

"Another time I took the girl to my mother's house in Santiago de Cuba. She had everything there, but she got it into her head that I should bring her back.

"I never failed to send them their monthly allotment, and concerning economic support, if it was not much, whenever I could I bought them clothing. Also whenever I go to Havana I see them. Sometimes it has been 2 months between trips, but when I go I visit them.

"If I have not given them the warmth the boy needs, it is a result of this situation I am telling you about. We are rather far apart but I insist that she has tried to create difficult situations for me. But it is true I have been neglectful."

"Apart from all this," I asked him, "because it is logical that those who do not get along get divorced, what do you think about this behavior of yours?"

He bent his head and responded in a low voice: "Although my attitude is because of her character, this does not justify my having adopted an attitude harmful to them. This has tormented me considerably and for some time."

"Do you write to them?"

"Oh, Comrade, I sometimes go 6 months without writing even to my mother. It is very hard work for me to write a letter."

I told him, with apologies for the criticism, that this was not intelligent because it means some contact with him, which the children needed very much, that the comparison with his mother was pointless, and that through correspondence he could have an inestimable link through which to influence the children, but above all, to show them his love.

Martin had nothing to say. He lowered his head and I went on to another question.

"What do you think about a possible solution? Can you take the children?"

"I know that I must resolve this, and I think that this might be a solution. But look, it is not easy. I will speak with you honestly, I think I would have to get a divorce . . . "

"How so?"

"Yes, I think of talking with my comrade about the children, but this house is not mine, it is hers. She is accustomed to an organized life, different from what they lead . . . "

"I think your attitude is defeatist," I told him. "If your wife is willing, has the proper level and understanding of the problem, I think that the time has come to help you. You should not be pessimistic . . . You will find the solution."

The conversation became very difficult when this point was reached. I knew I was bordering on a very delicate and personal subject, but he admitted that this helped him. I realized that this man, who is a great worker, a militant with more than 9 years of experience, was profoundly discouraged. He proved this with his words, when he admitted a part of the responsibility for the deterioration of the children and his agreement that action in time could have alleviated the difficulty.

Pomares, showing evidence of political maturity, broke in to say that at the next cell meeting the responsibility which falls to Martin in the specific case of concern for his children will be discussed, so that together they can propose some kind of help. Similarly, the reason no response was provided to Olga will be discussed. These words of his brought the interview to a close: "This is not a problem just for Raul Martin, but for all of us, his party comrades. It is our obligation to resolve it definitively."

CENSUS PREPARATIONS DISCUSSED BY NATIONAL DIRECTOR

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 5 Oct 80 pp 38-39

[Interview with Maximino Gancedo, director of the 1981 National Census Bureau, by Eliseo Alberto; date and place not given]

[Text] In the near future, a preliminary registering of housing and people will be made throughout the country. This is considered the most important initial step in carrying out the second population and housing census, to take place in 1981. In view of the magnitude and importance of these activities, it is essential to have the cooperation of state organizations and the participation of people's organizations as well as the wholehearted support of our people in each of the tasks planned. In order to publicize the event, we interviewed Comrade Maximáno Gancedo, director of the national bureau for the project.

[Question] Comrade Gancedo, could you explain the basic objectives of the census?

[Answer] The 1981 Population and Housing Census has six basic objectives. First, to give the party and government complete and up-to-date figures which will have great importance at this time, since they will be in keeping with the new political-administrative division. The results of the census will also enable us to have information about the population to aid in drawing up the next group of five-year plans by providing documentation pertinent to our strategy for development with a view to the year 2000. Moreover, the census will enable us to determine to what extent we have progressed when compared with the 1970 census figures; this depends on our being careful to use the same methodology so that the various subjects to be investigated in the 1981 census will give results similar to those of the previous census where similar methods were used.

Another basic objective is to fulfill our international commitments. Both the United Nations and CEMA recommend that a population and housing census to be taken every 10 years. The results of the census will be sent to those two organizations. We have tried to combine the methodological concepts of both organizations. As would be expected, in areas where their methodologies disagree, we have given priority to CEMA's ideas while leaving open the possibility of complying with the United Nation's wishes. For example, in the case of the economically active population, there are differences in concept; so we shall handle that aspect separately in order to be able to satisfy both criteria.

Lastly, the census will provide a new reference point for future surveys through spot-checking.

[Question] How were the plans for the survey drawn up, Comrade Gancedo?

[Answer] The census is not just the work of the State Committee for Statistics to which the Executive Committee of the Council of Ministers assigned the responsibility of preparation and execution. In the preparation of the documentation it was necessary to consult and discuss with various state organizations, listen to and heed their recommendations and thus arrive at a plan of action approved by the committee. Once the plan was finalized, census trials began in various municipalities.

[Question] What importance does the National Census Bureau attach to these trials?

[Answer] Once the documents were drawn up and the methodology established (this the work of many years), it was essential to test the methods. The municipalities chosen were: Cerro, in Havana City; Majibacoa, in Las Tunas; and Guisa, in Granma.

[Question] Were these municipalities chosen for a specific reason?

[Answer] Yes, indeed. The selection of these three municipalities made it possible to achieve the following objectives: in the case of Cerro, it was our intention to try the methodology in a densely populated urban center representative of Havana City Province (where we find approximately 20 percent of the country's population); Majibacoa is a totally rural and simple municipality without any unusual housing group, and this offered us the possibility of studying the implementation of the census in an area characteristic of our countryside; and in the case of Guisa, we found a typical example of conventional rural people with an urban center in a mountainous area whose topography gave us a number of problems.

[Question] Did the results of these trials offer anything new?

[Answer] Undoubtedly. I shall give you an example. The female labor force in Havana City is exceptional. During the first days of the trials it was found that about 25 percent of the houses visited were closed because both the man and woman were working. As a result of this experience, we found it necessary to change the schedule of the census-taking in Havana City so that the census personnel could call at a more convenient time.

[Question] Comrade Gancedo, people are asking two questions: Will the survey be repeated in municipalities where trials have been made, or will the information already obtained be valid for the purpose of the 1981 census?

[Answer] That is a good question. The census will have to be repeated. Why? Because people are born, grow up and die; the census aspires to be a photograph taken at a specific moment. The methodology determines a specific day and, more than that, a specific moment: the hour 0000 is the critical moment on the day of the census. All information is in reference to that moment. Therefore, all persons who were living at 0000 on the day of the census are included in the census, which also includes those who died after 0000 and those who were born up to 2359 of the previous day; births at 0001 are not counted for the purposes of the survey.

[Question] How long is the census-taking expected to take?

[Answer] The ideal would be to take the census in a single day through a system of self-numbering; but on this occasion it will be taken in 1 week, although the information will be tied in with the first day. We must be careful in this situation to avoid confusion.

[Question] In the general strategy of the census what role will be played by the preliminary registering of housing and population?

[Answer] The preliminary registering is one of the most important tactics for the successful outcome of the census, for it is mandatory that every housing unit in the country be visited in 1981. The registering consists of dividing the national territory into zones, and this should permit some 12,000 comrades to make an accurate report of the exact location of each housing unit. Only in this manner shall we determine the precise location of visitors as a part of the census. This is easy to say, but we have to think of the difficulties involved in locating more than 2 million housing units situated between Maisi and San Antonio.

[Question] In the case of a collective dwelling, is the building considered as one unit?

[Answer] No. It is considered as a housing complex. Each apartment or quarter must be recorded and its address precisely noted as to level or storey, for in taking the census every housing unit must be visited. The registry will enable us to determine the group of dwellings to be contacted by each interviewer. Basically, the municipal territory has been divided into areas of supervision; there are about 2,880 areas of supervision and each of these is divided into sections (4,300 in the urban portion and 5,900 rural sections). The sections are somewhat similar to the electoral subdivisions of the People's Government. For example, one section can have about eight manzanas [1 manzana = 1.7 acres]. It is essential to give the details of each of these sections. Great effort was required by our districts and municipalities to achieve this. To give an example: we needed an up-to-date group of maps. It was necessary to coordinate all the documentation with organizations responsible for this work so that on the day of the census every censustaker would have a precise map of the section he or she was to handle.

[Question] Comrade Gancedo, what plans does the bureau have in the case of comrades who are far from home during the week of the census? For example, I am thinking of those who are abroad on international missions and of members of the FAR [Revolutionary Armed Forces] in their permanent units.

[Answer] The 1981 census will be a residential census. The 1970 census was a so-called mixed type, that is, it recorded double information: the individual at his or her residence and the individual where he or she was at the time of the survey. In the 1981 census the information will be obtained at the home. There the head of the family, or the lady of the house, will provide the information requested about the residents and whether or not they are in the housing unit at the time of the visit.

Special Note

The preliminary registering of the housing and population is the most important preparatory task connected with the census and consists of properly recording all dwellings, work places and census nuclei throughout the country, noting the number of permanent residents in each unit. The results of the registration are making it possible to calculate in advance the number of personnel and material resources necessary for the subsequent taking of the 1981 census scheduled for October of this year.

Census Nucleus

"Census nucleus" is the person or group of persons, with or without kinship, who have a common budget, cook for the group and live in a normal way, occupying a single dwelling or part of a dwelling. "Census nucleus" should not be identified with "chief provider."

DEVELOPMENTS AT CAMAGUEY UNIVERSITY NOTED

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 17 Oct 80 pp 7-9

[Text] The training of new cadres of scientists, teachers and professionals in a developing country that has freed itself from imperialist and neocolonialist domination, should be geared toward an integral and coherent education so that the demands of economic, social, humanistic and scientific-technical development implied by the construction of a new society can be effectively met.

This is the direct role of higher education: to train highly qualified professionals capable of organizing, developing and guiding the economy, science and culture based on Marxist-Leninist principles and a genuine proletarian spirit.

Naturally, these cadres have an obligation to ensure the progress of this vast educational process, which at the same time implies the transformation of traditional university structures. The mission of educating cadres no longer meets the requirements of an economic structure deformed by neocolonialist conditioning; rather, it responds to the growing needs of a society in constant, complex change. Thus, we need a drastic reorganization of specializations and professional profiles, of educational and informative concepts, and also of the scope of the higher learning centers. The latter must be expanded to the various regions of the country so as to encourage production.

It is apparent that a revolution cannot have macrolocalized and microlocalized economic and cultural development without the parallel development of the educational-instructional requirements that are directly tied to the former type of development. It is not surprising, then, that new higher learning centers are emerging, and that these centers have a highly academic orientation, directly related to national and local needs.

First Steps toward Creation of University

In keeping with these principles, in 1967 higher education was launched in the old province of Camaguey.

In the 1967-1968 school year instruction was begun in agronomic engineering, medicine (for a group of students in their final year) and basic pedagogy under the auspices of the Universidad Central de Las Villas.

In 1970-1971 the Economics Institute was established in Nuevitas, and the majors of Higher Education Pedagogy and Animal Sciences were instituted.

In 1972 the Ministry of Education passed a resolution creating the Camaguey University Center, and by 1974 the initial stage of the present university facilities was begun.

Students were transferred to those facilities from Nuevitas, and in the following academic year from the Martires de Pino Tres Technological Institute. During that phase, the rest of the agricultural and technological fields of study were also transferred there.

This process finished on 8 May 1975, when Law 1294 established the University of Camaguey with 14 majors and 4,321 students. This figure has increased by 21 percent in the 1979-1980 academic year, for a total of 5,212 students.

With regard to graduating classes, there were 214 students graduating from five schools in the 1975-1976 academic year, while in 1979-1980 544 students graduated in 11 majors. This means an increase of 155 percent, which clearly reflects the level of academic yield and utilization.

Structure

The fourth center of higher learning in the country is part of the national higher education system, of course. It is attached to and directed by the Ministry of Higher Education, and receives its funding from the state budget.

Its structure consists of the Rectorate, the Deanship or School, and the Department.

The general administration or government of the institution is composed of the executive director, the post held by the rector; the executive vice-director or first vice-director; the chief of instruction or instructional vice-rector; the chief of research or research vice-rector; and the chief of administration and economics or economics and services vice-rector.

With regard to the academic structure, the University of Camaguey is made up of the following Schools:

--Animal Sciences School, which includes the majors of Livestock Engineering and Vetrinary Medicine.

--Energy and Chemistry School, with majors in Thermal Energy Engineering, Electrical Energy and Chemical Production.

--Construction School, including Architecture and Structures.

--Medical Sciences School, including Medicine and Dentistry.

--School of Economics and Social Sciences, with Licentiate in Economics (in final stages) and Licentiate in Accounting.

--School of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, with Licentiate in Mathematics. A major in Economic Geography is being prepared, and mathematics, physics and chemistry are also taught to students in other schools.

--Language Teaching School, where Russian is taught to Cuban students who will study in the USSR, and Spanish is taught to foreign students who are studying here.

--Directed Education School, which deals with the organization and instructional processing of files and the evaluation of directed study courses in the Licentiate in Law and Licentiate in Accounting majors.

In addition, within the academic structure are the Departments of Law and of Marxist-Leninism, within which are the Licentiates of Philosophy and Scientific Communism (in final stages).

All instructional work is carried out by the Instructional Vice-Rectorate, which in turn controls and designs curricula that are developed in the various fields of study: There are daytime courses for young graduates of the middle-higher education system who pass directly on to higher education, regular courses for workers, evening or night classes, seminars and directed study courses.

The Instructional Vice-Rectorate is in charge of the pedagogic and didactic improvement of the faculty; research planning and consultation on plans for instructional texts and publications; and the supervision of the scientific-instructional work of the students.

Faculty Categories and Professional Improvement

The faculty categories are one of the primary phases of the organization of the faculty.

This process was initiated with the passing of Law 1296 in May 1975; its enforcement is being carried out under Ministerial Resolution 410 of February 1976.

The four faculty categories established are full professor, associate professor, assistant professor and graduate instructor. There are two complementary categories: associate instructor and technical-instructional associate.

The University of Camaguey has five full professors, 16 associate professors, 102 assistant professors and 202 graduate instructors.

The professional improvement program has already begun in the form of the organization of postgraduate courses in various fields for the graduates of this center as well as others.

In the 1975-1976 academic year the faculty numbered 317; the following year it grew by 12; 1977-1987 saw an increase of 29 faculty members; and 1978-1979 reached a total of 451. That means an increase of 43 percent in only four academic years.

Scientific Activity

All scientific activity is carried out through research which serves to provide consultation on problems related to the country's socio-economic needs and the specific issues of provincial and university development.

The various departments of the university schools plan the process, which is directed and executed by professors and students in conjunction with production and service agencies.

Research results are published in the university's scientific magazine, RCUC (REVISTA CIENTIFICA DE LA UNIVERSIDAD DE CAMAGUEY), where both faculty and graduate articles appear.

Students participate in Scientific Programs that are held in the various schools, and in university-wide scientific events.

The Scientific Information Center provides documents for instructional and research activities.

The center also has a library with a 130,000-volume capacity for approximately 410 users, in addition to individual study cubicles and group study centers, as well as a periodicals room.

It also has departments of photography, reproduction, translation, exchanges, publications and movies.

The scientific movie center can hold 103 persons, and is also used for lectures, screenings and thesis defenses.

For the purpose of improving the scientific skills of the faculty, there are agreements providing for joint research projects with Soviet higher learning centers and similar institutions in Hungary. For example, there is one with the V. I. Lenin State University, the Agricultural Mechanization Institute and the B. B. Kiubuchev Economic Institute of Minsk, Byelorussia, and with the Agricultural Sciences University of Godollo, Budapest.

Student Activities

In addition to their educational activities, the students hold other functions that contribute to their integral training, such as scientific, sports and cultural events. The latter are held in conjunction with the various municipal, provincial and national festivals.

The Artistic and Cultural Education Section of the university establishes cultural brigades in the different fields of art and literature.

These groups put on shows on or off the university campus, thereby promoting relations between the students and workers and peasants.

This section is organized into workshops for the study of literature and plastic arts, and is in charge of activities designed to expand the general cultural awareness of the students.

Student and Faculty Living Conditions

The students enjoy a system of free scholarships which include room and board; there are a total of 2,000 scholarships. There is a recreational center with gamerooms, reading rooms and general recreational facilities.

The cafeteria can seat 60 people, and all the students are guaranteed medical and dental care at the institution, through regular doctor visits, nursing care and visits to dentists.

The faculty benefits from a state housing program, so that professors who do not yet have housing can live on campus.

Oh, Camaguey!

This is the new university for the new Camaguey, cradle of lofty patriotic and cultural values, the "gentle region" where our own poet, Nicolas Guillen, was born. But today, the "gentle region of shepherds and sombreros" is witnessing an impetuous development, a perpetual motion of old legacies and structures to create a dynamic economy, science and culture. Perhaps today Guillen could write new lines about his province, his city, but in them we would certainly read what all Camagueyans remember: "I have come to walk and here I'll stay,/ with my people./ I come with my memories,/ I come with my wounds and my verses."

SUGAR HARVEST WAGES--Resolution Number 529 of the State Committee for Labor and Social Security establishes different forms of payment for canecutters, who will voluntarily choose one at the beginning of the sugar harvest and may not change from one to another for the duration. This is to prevent a disruption of the implementation of new wage rates. A canecutter may opt to receive the wage he was earning at his original place of work without any additional payment. He may choose to be paid on the basis of the rates and system of payment established for manual canecutting. In this case, he will receive an additional 40 percent computed on the basis of his average wage at his original work center. Non-sugarcane manual and mechanized workers who are mobilized in canecutting will be paid in accordance with the latter formula. [FL131710 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1508 GMT 13 Nov 80]

CALL FOR AFGHAN SOLUTION--Speaking about the so-called Afghanistan issue, Cuban Ambassador Raul Roa Kouri has asserted at the United Nations that only a negotiated political solution can reinforce peace and security in that region. Roa said the situation in Southwest Asia is of serious concern for his government, first of all, because of the way U.S. imperialists are exploiting events in Afghanistan and, furthermore, because it confronts the states of the region to the detriment of the genuine interests of their people. Roa recalled that for that reason Cuban President Fidel Castro decided to send his foreign minister to deliver personal messages to the leaders of Afghanistan, Iran and Pakistan to explore possibilities of a peaceful, negotiated and fair settlement of the problem that has emerged in the region. FILM OUTFIT'S ASSISTANCE--The technical resources of the Cuban Institute of Cinematographic Art and Industry [ICAE] have been placed entirely at the disposal of the Salvadoran revolutionary cinema, with the aim of processing and widely disseminating the films on the heroic struggle of the fraternal Salvadoran people. This information was released at a news conference held today, Wednesday, at ICAE headquarters. At the news conference were Salvadoran film makers who are participating in the Second International Festival of the new Latin American cinema, which is being held in Havana. The Salvadoran film makers said that the nation's movies respond to the needs of the revolution and are aimed at disseminating internationally the atrocities being committed by the military-Christian Democratic junta and the heroic actions of the people, who are engaging in an armed struggle against the regime's barbaric actions. They also announced the formation of the Film Institute of Revolutionary El Salvador [Instituto de Cine del Salvador Revolucionario], which includes filmmakers who are firmly participating in the antioligarchic and anti-imperialist struggle. OCLAE SOLIDARITY WITH NICARAGUA--The secretariat of the Continental Organization of Latin American Students--OCLAE--has sent a message to Nicaraguan students conveying fraternal and combative greetings. The note adds that on behalf of the Latin American students, the organization wishes to affirm the broadest agreement of solidarity with the Nicaraguan people and students in their struggle aimed at building a new society in a free fatherland. Elsewhere the message states that imperialism's maneuvers, stepped up by the creole bourgeoisie, will not be able to check the advance of the Sandinist revolution because the working people and the progressive sectors, led by their people's vanguard, the Sandinist National Liberation Front, will guide them to a new life. The message further states that the Nicaraguan people have the unlimited support of hundreds of thousands of Latin American students who, from their trenches, are also fighting against imperialism. PUERTO RICAN 'VICTORY'--The Puerto Rican people have won an important victory as they frustrated U.S. Government plans to transfer to that U.S. colony in the Caribbean thousands of dangerous antisocials of Cuban origin. This was confirmed in Washington by the Department of State when it announced that plans to transfer at least 5,000 antisocials to Fort Allen have been suspended indefinitely. The military and civilian personnel who had been assigned to this installation to guard the prisoners [as heard] will be transferred elsewhere and the costly installations prepared for the antisocials will be abandoned. The decision followed constant demonstrations and protests in Puerto Rico over the plan and a legal battle which even has reached the U.S. Supreme Court. Puerto Rico emphasized in its legal action that the initial Yankee decision--now ruled out--violates its rights and, furthermore, it was a threat to security, peace and environment in Puerto Rico. The antisocials of Cuban origin will continue to be held in military camps in the United States, primarily in Fort Chaffee in the state of Arkansas. YOUTHS REPORT THREATS--The Farmworkers Federation (FTC) has reported that death threats were received by over 80 youths from Tepecoyo unless they showed up at the office of the local commanding officer to register for the draft. The FTC report says that 80 youths were summoned at 1400 on 30 October to the Tepecoyo commander's office in La Libertad Department. The 80, the FTC adds, had been recruited by the area's sergeant or commander. He threatened them with death if they did not show up. The youths, the FTC goes on, "are telling the people of their protest over the commander's demands." They said they don't want to become henchmen of the exploited and oppressed people. All the youths live in Tepecoyo. [Excerpt] [PA070241 San Salvador EL INDEPENDIENTE in Spanish 4 Nov 80 p 4]

AGRICULTURE-BASED INDUSTRIES SOUGHT

FL131500 Kingston DAILY GLEANER in English 10 Nov 80 p 16

[Text] St George's, Grenada, Nov 7 (CANA)--Grenada is pressing forward with an agricultural development program, aimed at improving conditions for estate workers and farmers, and setting up agriculture-based industries.

The island's first processing plant--the million-dollar establishment at True Blue--is expected to begin production by mid-month.

Some 400,000 dollars (15,000 dollars US) worth of equipment has been installed from the United States to produce juices, nectars, jams and jellies, mango chutney, marmalades, nutmeg syrup and hot sauce.

Up to 1,000 pounds of fruit will be processed daily by the plant to satisfy both domestic demands and an export market now being tapped.

Government officials have indicated that there are good prospects for hot sauce sales in Britain, where there are large immigrant communities from the Caribbean and Asia.

Grenada is already exporting mangoes and other exotic products to the United Kingdom.

Fish

In addition to fruit and vegetable processing, the government has also set up a fish processing plant, which is already turning out salted fish.

Government officials have reported excellent response to the salted fish, affirming that the supply is still insufficient to meet demands.

However, officials expect that with 10 more fishing trawlers due to be handed over to Grenada from Cuba as gifts, fish output could be increased to supply both the fresh fish market and the processing plant.

The Grenada Government, which took power in a coup d'etat in March last year, has emphasized the value of agro-industries as a means of cutting imports, increasing self-sufficiency, and saving foreign exchange.

Prime Minister Maurice Bishop has said that agriculture, tourism, and agro-industries would be key sectors of the economy his government is building here.

Touring

Mr Bishop, together with Agriculture Minister Mr Unison Whiteman, has recently been touring agricultural estates here to bolster workers' morale and urge increased production.

As part of incentives towards such increased production, Mr Bishop has announced a profit-sharing program for workers on government estates, under which the agricultural laborers will receive one-third of the profits of the estates.

But he regretted that the government cannot now afford increases in the wages of agricultural workers, pointing out, however, that government was making other benefits available to them.

These include the house repair program where 1,000 dollar (370 dollars US) loans are provided for house repairs, with recipients repaying only two-thirds over a 15-year period.

Classes

He also announced that agricultural workers will be given one hour off work every day to attend literacy classes being held on estates here as part of a national literacy drive.

Mr Bishop reported plans for bulk purchasing of boots to help reduce their cost, and said a sample shipment was expected from Czechoslovakia.

Grenada's dependence on agriculture is reflected in the fact that last year, the island earned 57 million dollars (21 million US) from exports of cocoa, bananas, and nutmegs.

NIGERIAN AID--St Georges--Grenada has received $45,000 in assistance from Nigeria following a request for aid to revitalize the island's agricultural industry. The funds were handed over by Nigeria's acting ambassador to Trinidad and Tobago F. C. Nwoko to Grenada's Prime Minister Maurice Bishop at a ceremony held in St Georges earlier this week. The request was made following damages to the industry last year by heavy rains. [Text] [Georgetown GUYANA CHRONICLE in English 1 Nov 80 p 5]

ANNIVERSARY OBSERVED--The 7th anniversary of bloody Sunday was observed last night with a ceremony at the Cuban Institute for Friendship with Peoples [ICAP] in Havana. Grenadian Ambassador William Richard Jacobs told the guests of the events of 18 November 1973 which marked a new stage in the unity and consolidation of the revolutionary struggle against the tyrannical regime of Eric Gairy. Kamau McBarnette, a member of the New Jewel Movement's Central Committee; (Lynden Ramhanny), member of the Grenadian Revolution's State Council; and Jorge Gallardo, vice president of the ICAP, presided over the ceremony. SEAGA MOVES TO FREE FOREIGN EXCHANGE

FL131455 Kingston SUNDAY GLEANER in English 9 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] Prime minister, the Hon Edward Seaga, on Friday night announced two short-term beginner measures to relax the economic stringencies and free-up the flow of foreign exchange in the hope of closing the US150 million foreign exchange gap for the remainder of the year.

Under the measures announced, to applause from several hundred businessmen in the Jamaica Pegasus Hotel, New Kingston holders of no funds permit will be issued with certificates making it legal for them to use these permits to import raw materials, capital goods and "specified items."

Banks have also been asked not to question the origin of foreign exchange being deposited by persons in possession of such monies but to "grab it."

Explaining the measures to the businessmen gathered to honor the Hon Abraham Issa, O.J., Prime Minister Seaga said that some businessmen had been using no-funds permit to import raw materials and capital goods with "no questions being asked" as to where they were getting the foreign exchange to pay for the goods. But this was illegal, Mr Seaga said. Because it was a violation of the law some people made use of the device while others did not.

By issuing holders of no-funds permit with certificates which would indemnify them of any violation of the law, the government would be encouraging the flow of foreign exchange, he said. No questions.

On the second measure, the prime minister said that it had come to the attention of the government that questions are being asked when holders of foreign exchange go to the banks to deposit, as to the origin of the foreign exchange. As a result many people who would deposit foreign exchange or wanted Jamaican dollars instead, are dissuaded from doing so. This gave rise to an illicit market in which those persons who are to be paid for the export of a certain illegal item (which he did not name) ask their purchasers to pay them in Jamaican dollars and leave a certain amount of foreign exchange on the market to be "mopped up in other ways."

"We are therefore asking the banks not to ask these questions when anyone comes in to deposit foreign exchange. Don't accept it, grab it!" Mr Seaga said to applause.

Mr Seaga said that he had received good news from the tourist industry that bookings were picking up and in some areas were surging. He had learned from the governor of the Bank of Jamaica that on the day after the general election certain lines of credit that had been closed to the country before the elections, "suddenly reopened."

These were signs, Mr Seaga said, that foreigners were expressing a renewed confidence in Jamaica. This was a positive development, particularly in the face of the problems being experienced by the country, he said. Mr Seaga added: "They are not nice problems. Indeed they are worse than we imagined before we had a chance to get an in-depth look at them."

He hoped that the foreign exchange gap for the remainder of the year could be closed "otherwise we face a very difficult period in the short space of time we have to the end of the year." He said, however, that he believed that he could rely on the goodwill of the country and the international community, and went on to outline what measures his government would take toward easing the problem.

Mr Seaga said that he looked forward to working with the new administration in the United States. As a new administration it would have the opportunity of starting afresh in rethinking the problems of the Caribbean, Mr Seaga said.

As a guide to the U.S. administration, Mr Seaga, said: "We are faced with the prospect of endeavoring to borrow our way out of a serious financial crisis." But he said the country and the Caribbean should be able to earn their way out as they could not borrow their way out.

He added that in order for a country to earn its way out of the problem, it was natural that such a country only 900 miles away, offshore the richest country in the world, should look to that economy as its natural market in terms of boosting its export trade.

The prime minister warned of the "counterview" arising from increased U.S. protectionism which would greatly affect Jamaica and asked a delegation of American businessmen attending the function to carry back the message that the Caribbean, and Jamaica in particular, were deserving of special consideration. He said that Jamaica would not only be looking to the "helping hand of aid, but more so to the greater helping hand of trade."

OPENING SESSION BOYCOTT--Jamaica's opposition party, People's National Party--PNP, will abstain from participating in the opening session of the new parliament to protest that former minister of national security Dudley Thompson has been illegally deprived of his seat. The boycott was announced at the conclusion of a meeting of the PNP Executive Board. In the announcement it is pointed out that despite the fact that Thompson achieved a victory in the elections, the seat was given to the Labor Party candidate. It adds that after the initial count, the ballot boxes were illegally opened and the number of votes deliberately altered to cause Thompson's defeat. Jamaica's PNP will boycott the swearing-in ceremony to emphasize its rejection of the governing coalition. [Text] [FL182159 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 2126 GMT 18 Nov 80]

GALLIMORE AT OAS ASSEMBLY--Jamaica will be represented at the General Assembly of the Organization of American States by minister of state in the ministry of foreign affairs Dr Neville Gallimore. Dr Gallimore left the island on Friday last. The meeting will consider matters of pressing concern, particularly aspects of cooperation for development between the member countries. TRADE AGREEMENT WITH USSR DEFENDED

PA100353 Panama City MATUTINO in Spanish 8 Nov 80 p 6-A [Column by Ricardo Lince: "The Canal and Neutral Trade"]

[Text] The Panama Chamber of Commerce, its affiliate in David, the National Council of Private Enterprise, and the Panama Chamber of Construction have condemned a trade agreement signed between the Panamanian Government and the USSR. They fear that along with Russian products we will get Russian ideology. This fear is based, perhaps, on the sad experience we had with the United States, which first introduced its trade, then the groundwork for the canal, and then its flag. These private sector groups reject the annex of the agreement, because it grants the Soviet trade mission privileges and immunities.

The rejection by those sectors of the agreement--signed a year ago and published now, and which will be submitted to the National Assembly of Corregimiento representatives for approval--is strengthened by Mister Reagan's election as president of the United States because he has announced a general onslaught against the socialist countries. However, we can surmise that the private sector's real concern is based on what the competition of Soviet products will mean to their business. The Soviet-made Lada automobile has been well received in the Panamanian market. The Panamanian private sector has a distribution center in the Colon Free Zone for Russian products, which are sold even in the most conspicuously capitalist stores. What the government is doing is legalizing, with an open mind, the existing situation which can and should benefit our poor.

According to international law, governments can create missions abroad. The most common are trade missions which exist in all countries. These offices are used by most countries to conduct their transactions with foreign countries, and are different from trade missions belonging to permanent embassies and led by commercial attaches. That is why the statement that the entire trade operation will have diplomatic immunity is false.

The privileges and immunities granted to the USSR in the trade agreement or in agreements already signed with other socialist countries are practically the same as those granted to trade missions and their members according to the Vienna Commission signed by Panama and most UN member nations. The USSR trade mission in Costa Rica has more than 50 officials. This fear of ideologies, if carried to extremes, leads to the burning of books in a typically caveman gesture. Russians have been going through the isthmus for many years, and as far as we know, this human contact has never provoked any democratic schism. Regarding trade, Panama would do well to examine any new option so that the people could buy cheap goods (we still remember the so called Casas Japnesas) [Japanese stores selling extremely low-priced goods in the 1930's]. Besides, the existence of the Canal treaty invites the USSR to sign the neutrality document, a commitment, which, because of its delicate nature, establishes links and relations which make the signatory countries respect the document. We are rendering a worldwide service through the canal. That service is also guaranteed by worldwide neutrality. Why not protect our country with trade treaties as neutral as the canal? Or is it that some Panamanians think that after the year 2000 it will still be a U.S. canal?

BELAUNDE'S FIRST HUNDRED DAYS IN POWER SURVEYED

Lima LA CRONICA in Spanish 9 Nov 80 p 2

[Text] The constitutional regime began on 28 July with the total reestablishment of freedom of expression. The owners of newspapers and radio stations returned to their press organs and the people, with universal applause, recovered the most precious of liberties.

Law of Brotherhood

One hundred days later, President Belaunde Terry promulgated the new brotherhood law in Coricancha, legendary temple where the renowned oral law of ancient Peru originated. It reestablishes the ancestral practice of popular cooperation. Its first goal is to connect all the isolated districts of the country just like the past constitutional administration connected the forgotten Andean provinces. A mixed economy was reestablished, a genuine national solution to Peruvian problems.

Build, Build, Build

In a memorable ceremony for the people, the Materials Bank was created; it is an original and dynamic credit instrument to raise the standard of living through initiative and effort. A new horizon opened for the slums. The middle class acquired new hope with the establishment of social interest mortgages that will open the way to ownership for them. To implement the new system, there was bidding for the construction of thousands of housing units. At the end of the 100 days, the Architects Association was filled with plans from the bidding groups; the 112 involved made it the largest competition held in the country. There was bidding for the massive urbanization program called "Land and Services" aimed at the poorer classes. Using the Materials Bank, they will have access to ownership through tenacious and dignifying individual work. Ownership will not be a gift that is granted but a conquest that is won.

Highways, Agricultural Expansion

The government undertook the task of achieving food expansion in the Lima region. Without delay, it opened three new work fronts on the edge of the jungle, the first of which is near San Alejandro in the pampas of Sacramento and is bubbling with creative activity. The plan for Puerto Inca, Mazamari and Atalaya began. An agreement was signed for the development of Palcazu and the corresponding promotion organization was created. The government asked for studies for large road rehabilitation projects beginning with the Olmos-Corral Quemado, Tarma-La Merced and Cusco-Nasca projects. This is part of the plan to asphalt the trunk highways in the country, including the longitudinal highway in the mountains. The skepticism of the mid-south ended when construction of the Huaytara bypass began, shortening the Via de Los Libertadores which Belaunde constructed during his first administration.

Elimination of Corrupting Transactions

A real plan to simplify sterile bureaucratic transactions was initiated. The tedious requirement for import licenses was eliminated and industrial tariffs were reduced. Corrupting and tedious requirements were reduced to the point that 34,000 files turned into only 7,000 which were quickly resolved. A bill to create free zones to promote new industries and to absorb large amounts of manpower was sent to congress.

Immediate measures were taken to reorganize prisons and public registers. The organic laws required by the new constitution were sent to parliament.

Reinstatement of Discharged Workers

The government rehired thousands of dismissed teachers and workers dismissed from state offices directly under the executive branch. The limitations that restricted union rights ended.

The Agricultural Promotion and Development Law was sent to congress and the bill that reestablishes regional development corporations was resubmitted.

More Electrical Energy

In energy, new powerplants were contracted for Lima and Arequipa; they will begin operating next year. The new line from Mantaro to Pachachaca and Callahuanca will be laid. The energy from Mantaro will be connected with Chimbote and Trujillo.

The expansion of the electrical system in Cusco Department was ordered. Plans for reforestation and rural electrification began.

In fishing, a memorable campaign in defense of the diminished ichthyological resources of the country began.

Responsible Authority

With a profound sense of responsibility, the government resisted the provocations of terrorist minorities and did not fall into the pit of repression. No victim was excessively mourned through police action which was controlled with calm firmness. The alarming hijacking of an international airplane was resolved with wisdom and courage that merited praise from the president of the United States.

With the armed forces pledged to an intensive civic action campaign, solid ties of mutual respect were established that strengthen civilian and military tasks.

Edifying International Results

The whole world applauded the constitutional restoration and the doors to credit for development opened for Peru through prestigious international institutions. This saved the country from the excesses of usurious credit which is so harmful to our economy.

Finally, in a significant ceremony due to the famous mediation of former president Bustamente y Rivero, peace between the fraternal nations of El Salvador and Honduras was signed in the Palacio de Gobierno in Lima. This historic event gave added international luster to the first 100 days of the administration of President Fernando Belaunde Terry in his second government period.

INFLATION, UNEMPLOYMENT CONTINUE TO INCREASE

Inflation To Pass 75 Percent

Lima LA PRENSA in Spanish 7 Nov 80 p 11

[Text] In the third quarter of the year (July to September) and 2 months after the new government took over, accelerated inflation due to less controlled prices and the substantial increase in the demands for higher wages, many of which led to work stoppages and strikes, were the main characteristics of our economic evolution during that period. It is predicted that inflation will reach more than 75 percent by December, according to INFORME ECONOMICO TRIMESTRAL published by CIEPA [Center for Action-Oriented Economic Research].

According to CIEPA, inflation accelerated due to the change in the price policy (reduction of subsidies, increase in rates for public services and less control of prices) because confidence in the official rates of price increases decreased and because a highly speculative economy is forming in the country.

As a correlation to the price increases, 444 strikes were recorded with a total of 4.5 million man-hours lost as of August.

The report stated that conclusion and added that the overall growth rate reached by our economy means a possible annual rate of only 3.5 percent, substantially less than the official projection at the beginning of the year of 5.3 percent for the gross domestic product.

This rate of growth, in spite of showing an increase over the recessive levels of previous years, still does not reach the rates recorded from 1973 to 1977.

Serious Economic Analysis

It should be noted that the CIEPA report is one of the most serious instruments for analysis and study of the development of the Peruvian economy. It also showed that the economic growth continues to sustain itself mainly on exports although it indicated that the change in the domestic market is already reflected in the increased production of the manufactured products, construction and trade.

Within this context, the report added that it was talking about relative growth. There are also serious problems in agriculture due to the drought, in fishing due to the scarcity of basic resources and an acknowledged decrease in the growth of mining production.

Inflation, Unemployment To Increase

Lima LA PRENSA in Spanish 8 Nov 80 p 11

[Text] Prime Minister Manuel Ulloa Elias's explanation of the Government Plan, considered one of the most important events of the third quarter of the year, did not suggest solutions to two of the most pressing problems in the country: inflation and unemployment. This was the evaluation of INFORME ECONOMICO TRIMESTRAL of CIEPA which came out yesterday.

That report said that the prime minister's explanation discussed some important facets of the Peruvian situation in a very general way and did not even mention others. It added that it can be concluded from the explanation that the main features of the new economic policy are: a) greater incentives and insurance to foreign capital, especially for mining, petroleum and banking investments; b) diminished state role in business and in control of the economy; and c) liberalization of foreign trade as a means to contribute effectively to economic development, based on "market efficiency."

INFORME ECONOMICO TRIMESTRAL stated that the contribution of foreign investment will only be effective if we have the ability to negotiate under favorable conditions to avoid the negative experiences of the past. It added that, in view of the experience of developed countries, the great importance of state participation in development should not be ignored.

With respect to the reduction of tariffs to 60 percent, the report said that it is obvious that that measure, the elimination of restrictions on imports and other measures that could be taken under a neoliberal economic policy will unfavorably affect national industry. The Argentine and Chilean experiences demonstrate this.

It explained that it is not necessary to consider industrial protection synonymous with high prices and low quality nor as indiscriminate support for every type of industry.

It felt that industrial protection should be assumed for a country based on its size, its possibilities for regional or subregional integration, its potential human and natural resources, the basic consideration of the urgency in satisfying the essential needs of its people and the current situation and the main international economic trends.

SOCIAL SECURITY REORGANIZATION--Since the strike of the workers of the IPSS [Peruvian Social Security Institute] has gone on for 100 days, the directorate of the institute could declare it in a state of emergency and even totally reorganize it, according to reports yesterday. Dr Manuel Fernandez Stoll, general manager of the IPSS, stated that the directorate has declared itself in permanent session in order to adopt any emergency measure that might be necessary to insure the regular functioning of the institute's hospitals and health services in the country. He also announced that next Monday a multisectorial committee of the senate headed by Dr Mario Serrano Solis will be formed at the IPSS to begin investigation of possible irregularities in the old Peruvian social security system. According to Fernandez Stoll, that committee's work might be frustrated by the strike of the administrative and service personnel since they have the keys to the files and there would be no one to supply the necessary information. The general manager of the IPSS revealed that the leaders of the unions that have declared the strike have rejected an advance of 25,000 soles for each worker for recategorization. On the contrary, they have presented new demands (100,000 soles in advance) that that institute is not in the position to accept. As a result of the strike, administrative and service activities in the IPSS hospitals and health centers have been paralyzed. Those most affected are the insured who were in the process of hospitalization. Limited emergency services are available 24 hours a day. At the national level, there are 18,000 IPSS workers affiliated with the CUT [Union Workers Center] and the CFT [Federated Workers Center]. [Text] [Lima LA PRENSA in Spanish 9 Nov 80 p 15] 7717

TRADE DEFICIT WITH CHILE--Peru's surplus in its trade with Chile in 1979 has become a deficit which, by the end of the year, will total some $80 million, more than 25 billion soles. The Standing Joint Peruvian-Chilean Committee must keep this in mind at its next meeting in December in Santiago. Augusto Ramos Bambaren, president of the National Federation of Chambers of Commerce of Peru and the Lima Chamber of Commerce, stated this after attending the constitution of the Chilean-Peruvian Chamber of Commerce in Arica at Chile's initiative. He said that this negative evolution in the trade balance reflects a decrease in our traditional exports to Chile, principally sugar and cotton, and, at the same time, an increase in imports of Chilean products like fruit, wine, lumber, manufactured products "and others that a short time ago were restricted or prohibited imports." He indicated that the new plan for bilateral trade "is not undesirable since it contributes to economic complementation." However, it is also necessary to secure a trend to stimulate Peruvian exports, especially of nontraditional products. He said that the evolution of trade relations between Peru and Chile generally shows the need to create new mechanisms with the twofold objective of procuring a balanced increase in bilateral trade and developing efforts toward economic complementation. OIL DRILLING EQUIPMENT MANUFACTURED DOMESTICALLY

Caracas EL UNIVERSAL in Spanish 5 Nov 80 Sec 2 p 4

[Text] Venezuela has begun to build parts of drilling units used by the oil industry in operations involved in exploration and production, with a view to increasing to 160 the number of rigs that will be working in the country by the end of next year.

Venezuelan Petroleum, Inc. is now using 137 drilling rigs, of which 50 are being utilized in the reconditioning of wells.

This information was supplied by Eduardo Bascope, manager of drilling-production operations of Venezuelan Petroleum, Inc. He has just returned from Mexico City, where he chaired one of the first working sessions of the Second Latin American Congress on Drilling, which just ended in that city.

Bascope went to Mexico City from Houston, Texas, and Albuquerque, New Mexico, in the United States, where he participated in a series of consultations and technical meetings concerning drill bits and the availability of offshore drilling equipment in the world.

Although he did not say so directly or specifically, Bascope's activities will certainly have an effect on the future acquisition or renting of new offshore exploratory drilling units by Venezuela. At present, Venezuela is operating three of these units: a floating platform and a ship that are being used by the subsidiary Lagoven, and a semisubmergible unit operated by the subsidiary Maraven.

Venezuelan Petroleum, Inc. has just contracted for another unit, a marsh barge, which will begin operations with Lagoven in early 1981 in the reactivation of the Pedernales oilfield and the exploratory planning of the Orinoco Delta.

Bascope also reported that Mexico and Venezuela are now making progress in talks regarding the exchange of experiences in drilling. A program will probably be set up in which Mexican drilling engineers will work in the activities that are taking place on land and in Lake Maracaibo in terms of deep drilling. In turn, under this program, Venezuelan engineers would participate in drilling in the marshy areas of Tabasco in Mexico.

At the Second Latin American Congress on Drilling in Mexico it was revealed that at present only the United States has more active drilling equipment than Latin America, with 2,659 rigs. Latin America has 460 active rigs, of which nearly half are located in Mexico.
